

ALLEN COUNTY PUBLIC LIBRARY

3 1833 01742 7102

GENEALOGY
F29.L01
F91FFI
1900-1901

THE
FRIEND

A

RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

---

VOLUME LXXIV.

---

PHILADELPHIA:
PRINTED BY WM. H. PILE'S SONS, 1901.

INDEX.

- Adams John, a ministering Friend. Anecdotes of, 229.
- Affliction. The blessings of, illustrated, 101.
- Africa. Effect of Divine life on a native of, 311.
- Agriculture. Notice of a Cornell summer school for teaching, 38.
- The value of toads and bats, in 141.
- A plea for the farm, 173.
- Air. The amount of, we breathe, 270.
- Allan Janet, of Dundee, Scotland. Notice of the religious character and death of, 287.
- Allen Charles J. Remarks on the valuable life of the late, 217.
- Altruism. Remarks on, 31.
- Aluminum. The growing importance of, in the arts, 67.
- "Am I His, or am I not?" Essay entitled, 118.
- "Am I going up or down?" Extract entitled, 287.
- Anarchism? What is, 35.
- Animals. Instances of kindness to, 126.
- Anti-Christ. The spirit of, the same under all names, 386.
- Apostolic succession. The error of the doctrine of, 371. 385.
- Appeal to Friends regarding militarism, 243. 266.
- Appreciation. The animating effects of sincere, 180.
- Arbitration League. Appeal of, against war, 360.
- The platform of the Seventh Mohonk Conference on International, 390.
- Arts. The effect of the fine, not to promote refinement, 140.
- Atkinson Samuel. Remarks on the religious character of, 194.
- Attainment of saving knowledge. Essay entitled, The, 283.
- Augustine. Anecdote of, 290.
- Babylonia. Extensive library of ancient learning discovered in, 47.
- Bad habits and society. The lasting evils of, 192.
- Baptism of water—a Jewish rite, The, 165.
- Barclay's Apology in Arabic. Notice of the appreciation of, 38. 166.
- Appreciation of, in Eastern Europe, in 1816, 230.
- An appeal for a better acquaintance with, 279.
- The doctrines of, as applicable now as ever, 295.
- Barclay Home, West Chester, Pa. Appeal on behalf of, The, 239.
- Bargain. An honest, 126.
- Barton Clara, in the relief work at Galveston, 101.
- Be a thoroughbred. Extract entitled, 383.
- Bearing and forbearing. Remarks of Thomas á Kempis on, 295.
- Beauty out of ugliness, 383.
- Bedell William P. Letter of, on the manner of worship by Friends, 276.
- Begging bread. Incident in the life of a religious woman entitled, 274.
- Bellows John. Account by, of the funeral of Queen Victoria, 298.
- Notice of visit of, and wife to Philadelphia, etc., 359.
- Brief mention of, 367.
- Address of, to a Friends' School, 395.
- A degree conferred on, and remarks by, 407.
- Benington John. Notice of, entitled, An honored centennarian, 14.
- Comments on the above, 18.
- Notice of the life of, 351.
- Birds killed by arc lights, 23.
- On fish-eating, 99.
- Rapidly of the flight of, 302.
- Blessings. On numbering our, 15.
- Blind. The Holy Scriptures in raised letters for the, 355.
- Book. Notice of the first printed, 166.
- Book Notices, etc. A proposed Bibliography of Friends' publications, 39.
- Some thoughts on the Quakers in the Revolution, by Isaac Sharpless, 67. 73. 75.
- Book Notices, etc. Some Fruits of Solitude, by William Penn (new edition), 87.
- The New Quakerism, by Jesse Edgerton, 90.
- Picturesque Galveston, 90.
- Samuel Tuke—his life work and thoughts, 93.
- The North Carolina Friend, 96.
- The Montreal Witness, the only Christian daily newspaper, 127.
- The history of the Life of Thomas Ellwood, G. P. Putnam's Sons, 143.
- A proposed abridged edition of George Fox's Journal, 143.
- The Baptism of the Holy Spirit, by Cyrus W. Harvey, 153.
- Barclay's Apology, in Arabic, 38. 165.
- A Quaker experiment in government, by Isaac Sharpless, 167.
- Isaac Penington, by John W. Graham, 170.
- A Journal of John Woolman, with introduction by J. G. Whittier, 173.
- The Tract Repository, 203. 216.
- William Everett's oration on patriotism, 209.
- The Methodist Weekly, 217.
- Maxims for daily use, by Rachel S. Steer, 219.
- The Prince of Peace; or, The Bible on Non-resistance and War, by Cyrus W. Harvey 265.
- An Inquiry into the Anti-War Views of John Wickliff, by Josiah W. Leeds, 265. 354.
- Immigration of the Irish Quakers into Pennsylvania, 1682-1750, etc., by Albert Cook Myers, 279.
- On kindness to animals, by Jane Budge, in Arabic, 289.
- Quakerism in England; its present position, by Edward Grubb, 330.
- "New England Primer," a facsimile, 343.
- The British Friend, 351.
- Report of the Tract Association for 1901, 365.
- Annual Report of the Peace Society, 1901, 372.
- Boy saved from reading bad books. A, 11.
- Anecdote of a, entitled, "Who knew best?" 63.
- A kind act of a, 74.
- An anecdote of a truthful, 79.
- A little, subjected by family discipline, 134.
- Anecdote of a, who had promised to read his Bible, 167.
- Anecdote of a, entitled, Doing our best, 190.
- Extract entitled, Only a, 247.
- The influence of a, against liquor-selling, 290.
- The politeness of a little, 308.
- Thanks experienced by a little, 311.
- How a, lost his character, 416.
- Boys. The injury done to, by cigarette smoking, 4.
- On the difference between two, 50.
- Advice to, entitled, "What the book said," 174.
- Advice to, entitled, "Straightening out the furrows," 219.
- The story of eleven poor, 227.
- On mothering, 275.
- Kindness and advice to, entitled, Dr. Byham, 342.
- Boys' Brigades. On the effects of, 172.
- Bravest are the tenderest. Instances of kindness to animals entitled, The, 126.
- Brethren or Dunkards. Religious views of, The, 316.
- Erick autograph and comments, The, 221.
- Brooks Phillips. Remarks on the late, 295.
- Browning Elizabeth Barrett. The effects of suffering upon, 111.
- Buddha. words of wisdom in the writings of, 191.
- Followers of, in Japan, appeal to professing Christians, 239.
- Business. On the office and value of the social secretary in, 186.
- The pressure of, and its effect on parents, 189.
- life. On a successful, 273.
- Remarks of John Woolman on, 277.
- On "acting conscience" in, 404.
- man's prayer. Extract entitled, The, 187.
- Butterflies. Extract entitled, Money in, 19.
- and moths distinguished, 38.
- Candor among kinsfolk, 349.
- Cathedral of Milan. Inscriptions over the entrance to the, 174.
- Calamities. The power of the Lord is shown in the present, 15.
- Calendar. On the introduction of the Gregorian into England, etc., 97.
- Camphor monopoly. The, 244.
- Cane or rattan. The, 400.
- Captain's vow. Account of a repenting man, entitled, The, 139.
- Card playing at home a training for gamblers, 363.
- Catawissa, Pa. Notice of the old Friends' meeting-house at, 238.
- Century. Remarks on the coming, 103.
- The upward progress of mankind during the past, 253.
- Child. A ministering, 234.
- Child study. No 9. Essay entitled, 286.
- Character. On the building up of, 20. 35. 43. 220.
- On the need in the world of a Christian, 28.
- Three things to observe in the formation of, 47.
- A test of, 241.
- Temptation the test of, 246.
- as capital in business. On, 263.
- Environment the due expression of, 303.
- On progress in Christian, 332.
- Charity. On the importance of cultivating Christian, 2.
- On the, of the early Christians, 403.
- Children should be treated respectfully, 19. 386.
- have a right to the loving companionship of their parents, 44. 189.
- On cultivating a taste for good literature in, 91.
- The duty of prayer on behalf of the, 94.
- The Christian nurture of, the duty of parents, 139.
- On helping, by showing sympathy with, 162.
- The health of, improved by out-door play, 293.
- On training, to assist their mothers, 307.
- On establishing friendships with our, 318. 386. 395.
- On answering the questions of the, 347.
- The safeguards of, when sent to school, 360.
- Remarks on the care of, as tending to develop the finer qualities of heart and mind, 374, 401.
- China. Remarks on the action of missionaries in, 7. 15. 263. 386.
- The present war in, not justly chargeable to missionaries, 9.
- The oldest newspaper in the world published in, 23.
- On the invention of silk weaving in, 27.
- Remarks on mischief wrought by secret societies in, 45.
- Extract entitled, How to understand, 84.
- The influence for good of missionaries in, 263.
- The birds of, 283.
- An incident in, the experience of a woman in, 299.
- Appeal on behalf of the famine sufferers in, 353.
- The horrible character of the war in, 353. 391.
- Three prime causes of the Boxer uprising in, 355.
- On the causes which led to the "opium war" with, 405.
- Minute of London Yearly Meeting of 1901, against the opium war with, 405.
- Chinese words. On the pronunciation of, 7.
- convert. How a, kept his faith, 28.
- On Pidgin English as spoken by the, 213.
- A proverb of the, 255.
- Murray's alphabet for blind, 260.
- Charitable giving to the poor. Hints on, 197. 235.
- should begin early in life, 2637.
- Cheerfulness. Essential to health, 245.
- Christ. On the character of those, who are chosen by, 14.
- On the recognition of, as the Mediator, 23.
- On the expediency of his going away in person from the earth, 52. 410.

- Christ. The blessed reward of faithfulness to, 55.
On belittling the character of, 55.
Remarks on a Christianity without, 87.
On the second coming of, 94.
The blessed ministrations of, 128.
Politics without, 159.
The antiquity of the religion of, 191.
the century's necessity, 193.
The possibilities for evil of this nation without obedience to, 209.
by his Spirit visits every heart, 209.
Experience by James Gough of the blessed presence of, 210.
our country's only hope, 249.
On the teachings of, in regard to war, 255.
The light of, the one thing to be looked for and obeyed, 261.
to be sought daily, 270.
Testimony of a dying Jewess to, 271.
Obedience to, would rid the world of corruptions, 273.
New knowledge received through, 325.
the Christian's foundation, 393.
- Christ's fulness. Essay entitled, 76.
- Christian. The faithful, is constantly under Divine protection, 36.
A, should live in the world, but not be filled with it, 41. 192.
Not a first-class, 63.
The benefits of suffering to the, 147.
- Christians. Notice of a benevolent man in Denmark, called the last of the, 129.
Parts nor learning do not make men the better, 150.
On the charity of the early, 403.
- Christian fellowship. The blessings of, 170.
- Christian life. What it is? 97.
- Christian disposition commends itself. A, 191.
- Christian League. On the valuable work of the, in Philadelphia, 367.
- Christian science. Remarks on, 31.
- Christmas. The observance of, as a superstition, 185.
Objections to the observance of, from debauchery, etc., 378.
- Christianity. The effect of, in the world in protecting childhood, 102.
Comments on the large increase of the adherents of, during the last century, 143. 253.
Notice of innovations upon primitive, 145.
The power of, greatly weakened by separating the clergy as a distinct class, 160. 190.
- Christianity was not born to die, 215.
What Christendom needs is, 225. 353.
On a revival in, 407.
- Church. On the qualification and work of an elder in the, 5.
On the demoralizing influence of tourists, etc., upon the, 23.
The present, compared with the, of the Apostolic period, 39.
The true, is under Divine protection, 106.
On the decrease of membership in the, 111.
Worldliness in the, the great cause of its decline, 151. 359. 391.
and State. On the evils from the union of, 165.
Remarks on the influence of the, on the masses, 165.
The, should emit a true light, 207.
The need of willing and able-bodied helpers in the, 239.
The mission of the, to prepare for peace, 263.
Steps by which the spirituality of the, is lowered, 275. 378. 391.
On the injury to the, by deputy work, 279.
What the, is not, 294.
On preparation for service in the, 345.
The sickening embrace of war by an apostate, 353. 358.
The power of the Holy Spirit necessary for effective work by the, 403.
- Cicero. Remarks of, on the immortality of man, 367.
- Clergy and laity. The mischievous distinction between, 190.
- Clock. A loud ticking, preferred by natives of South Africa, 151.
- Clocks of the United States. How they are set by the United States Government, 372.
- Coal. The power contained in a single pound of, 158.
- Coffman Wilmer. On the necessity of the Divine anointing in the ministry by, 366.
- Collins Comfort. Remarkable incidents in the religious experience of, 357.
- Colored man could do. What one, 54.
- Colored people in the United States. On the elevation of the, 337. 354.
- Colored youth. An appeal in behalf of the Institute for, 370.
- Comforting assurance that "the Lord knoweth them that are his." The, 114.
- Communion with God a cure for loneliness, 283.
The blessedness of Divine, 297.
- College prize transferred by a young man to his mother. A, 30.
- Composure of soul the gift of the Holy Spirit, 83.
Commit all unto the Lord, 107.
- Conscience is not the standard of right and wrong, 27.
- Cornell University in summer. Remarks on, 38.
- Courtesy and kindness never lose their charm, 14. 33.
- Confucius. The teachings of, in regard to retaliation, commended, 239.
- Congress. Incidents in the first meeting of the Colonial, 154.
- Conversation. Hints about, 87.
- Conscientiousness rewarded. Incident in the life of William Reed, 260.
- Content. Learn to be, 189.
- Courage. Every kind of merely human, must fail at last 166.
Moral, a rare virtue, 360.
- Court of conscience. Incident in the life of Ruth Follows, entitled, 347.
- Creation. The omniscience and omnipresence of God seen in the, 154.
- Crete. Important discovery of ancient writings in, 14.
- Crime. Remarks on statistics of, for 1900, 250.
- Cross. The need of a daily, 4.
- Cuba. Remarks on beneficial effects upon, of the recent invitation to Cuban teachers, 49.
- Culture. Remarks on, 146.
- Cry for preservation. A, 359.
- Darwin Charles. Remark of, on the evidences of design in nature, 107.
- Davies Richard of Welshpool, Wales. Notice of the life and ministry of, 6.
- Day. On the length of the longest, in different places, 334.
at a time. On the happiness of living one, 167.
- Days. On the observance of certain, as a superstition, 185.
- Dead line. Remarks on avoiding sin, entitled, The, 84.
Sea. Notice of the first steamboat on the, 143.
Observations on the late rise of the waters in the, 242.
- Death is often a successful teacher to survivors of the reality of the unseen world, 10.
A guilty and a clear conscience in the prospect of, 261.
Bodily, a departure to another world, 307.
penalty. A prisoner at the bar answers in reference to the, 187.
Advice of the Attorney-General of Massachusetts to abolish the, 218.
The, discussed in a South Sea Island parliament, 309.
- Deaths.—Sarah J. Bedell, 32; Deborah Baldwin, 72; John W. Buzby, 200; John Benington, 352; Betsy Ann Copeland, 8; Wilmer J. Clayton, 32; Thomas P. Cope, 144; Ann Cowgill, 288; Joseph John Chappell, 296; Sarah C. Copeland, 392; Edmund P. Copeland, 392; Ann Cheyney, 408; John F. Davis, 64; Martha G. Dewees, 232; Mary P. Dawson, 304; Joseph B. Dean, 376; Rebecca W. Dewees, 384; Cornelius Dewees, 384; Phebe A. Elkinton, 160; Ezra Engle, 368; Ann E. Griffin, 24; Ellen M. Griffin, 24; Mary W. H. Griscom, 56; Mary M. Gove, 352; Mary Hartley, 40; Enoch T. Harvey, 72; Lydia B. Hoge, 80; Samuel Hulme, 80; John Hoge, 160; Betsy H. Hollingsworth, 176; Job Huestis, 176; John G. Hovle, 200; Sarah Ann Hall, 208; Stephen G. Hollingsworth, 208; Elizabeth A. Hodgkin, 256; Phebe Hoge, 272; Benjamin Hayes, 296; Lydia A. Hamilton, 328; Mary Yearsley Hoopes, 360; Abbie Ann Hoopes, 360; Sarah R. Harmer, 408; David James, 96; Stephen Jackson, 136. 304; George Jones, 144; Amy John, 344; Erich Knudson, 8; Rebecca W. Kite, 16; Lydia T. King, 376; Eliza Larkin, 104; Ann Leech, 128; Thomas Leech, 256; Melena T. Meland, 48; Ellen D. Moore, 160; Robert N. Morris, 336; Albert J. Pennell, 24; Thomas S. Pike, 72; Oliver Parker, 160; John Raymond Parker, 168; Deborah S. Pennell, 240; Margaret A. Penrose, 248; Elizabeth Patterson, 304; Edward Pyle, 344; Elizabeth Rorke, 64; Rachel M. Sharpless, 8; Penina Shaw, 176; Nathan Satterthwait, 208; Sarah E. Smith,
- 208; Rachel Stratton, 272; Eliza Smith, 280; Martha Sankey, 312; Ebel R. Sears, 312; Deborah Standing, 344; Anna M. Townsend, 8; Mary Ann Taylor, 128; Nathan H. Vestal, 216; Joseph Vaughan, 288; Walter Worthington, 56; Henry Warrington, 104; Hannah B. Wray, 136; Charles Wood, 176; Henry R. Woodward, 200; Anna Wood, 264; Lydia L. Walton, 312; David Wickersham, 408.
- Denmark. Notice of a benevolent man in, called "the last of the Christians," 129.
Development through struggle, 101.
- Dickerson James and companions. Remarkable preservation of, 221.
- Did the ark of Noah contain a pump? 106.
- Dillwyn George. Letter of, to Henry Drinker, in 1799, 214.
- Discipline of life. On the, 235.
"Diverce faire Indian baskets filled with corn." Experience of the Pilgrims in 1620, entitled, 156.
- Divine power in the work of regeneration, 138.
will. Watch that thou may perform the, 249.
silence. Essay entitled, The, 297.
guidance vouchsafed to those who fear God, 303.
anointing the only qualification for ministry, 366.
law. The, 372.
grace. Obedience to the secret restraints of, 377.
- Doing our best. Anecdote of a boy entitled, 190.
- Don't hurry too fast, 43.
- Don't meddle with God's plans. Extract entitled, 237.
- Door. Extract entitled, The fatal, 172.
- Donkhorob. Caution against a spurious, 295.
- Doukhobors. Notice of a visit by Eliza H. Varney to the, in Canada, 6. 39. 70. 77. 148.
Notes of a recent visit by J. S. Elkinton and J. E. Rhoads to the, in Canada, 21. 26. 34. 42. 50. 58. 64. 107. 202. 205. 361.
Recent notes respecting the, 70. 148. 150. 162. 177. 259. 282. 346. 388. 401.
The attitude of, to legal authority, 122.
Account of the, in Canada, by Joseph Bancroft, 134.
the subjects for prayers and help, 205.
A letter showing the religious belief of, 252.
- Dream of Thomas Bundy, 266.
Oliver Paxon, 403.
- Dress. On the testimony of Friends in regard to, 37.
The testimony of Frances E. Willard and others to plainness of, 228.
Gaiety in, reproved by two clergymen, 268.
- Duel. Movement against the, in Europe, 334.
- Dust at sea an enigma, 224.
- Duty. Nine definitions of, 81.
- Each day its verse. Extract entitled, 86.
- Easter. Spiritual experiences appropriate to the season called, 305.
- Educational voices, 157.
- Edward VI., King of England. Brief account of the religious character of, 270.
VII., King of England. Address of Friends to, and his reply, 298.
- Editorial. From above, 1; A gospel divorced from its peace, 9; Mistakes of love, 9; Peace, as in the churches, 17; Excellent platform powers, 17; Comments on John Benington entitled, A hundred years' pilgrimage, 18; Overruling evil for good, 18; Voices from smaller Yearly Meetings, 25; Who made thee to differ from another, 33; Remarks on entertainments in meetings for worship, entitled Empty seats, 41; Co-operative physicians, 41; The Lamb that was slain worthy to receive dominion, 49; Responsibility of our columns, 65; A government appointment, 73; Our relation with the campaign, 73; Note in reference to "Some thoughts on Quaker government in Pennsylvania by Isaac Sharpless, 73; Shall we gain time to lose it or to save it? 81; Soldiers of the cross as viewed by the war spirit, 89. 105. 113; The new Quakerism, 90; The trappings of woe, 90; Notice of "Picturesque Galveston," 90; Quakerism not declining, 97; Isolated meetings, 105; Justice and peace, 105; Then and now, 113; "Whom to attract," 113; Open-mindedness, 113; "Cannot spend her income," 121; As unknown, and yet well known, 121; A progressive lot, 129; Voting still available, 129; Remarks on a self-made ministry, entitled Because it may be, therefore it is, 129; Militarism a menace to humanity, 137; The Pope's exaltation of the Redeemer, 137; An unauthorized exponent of Friends' doctrines, 137; Remarks on an article, entitled "Non-

- combatants," 137; Our primitive Christianity, 145; Notice of the baptism of the Holy Spirit," by Cyrus W. Harvey, 153; Remarks on conducting THE FRIEND, 153; Resisting the coming Conqueror, 153; Slavery in the Transvaal, 153; Inculcation of a call, 169; A remarkable leading, 169; An announcement denied, 169; Isaac Penington on Isaac Penington, 170; The Donkhor colonists not yet past the critical period, 177; Notice of Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting, held Twelfth Month, 1900, 177; The priesthood of days, 185; Christ the century's necessity, 193; A financial issue quieted that moral issues might be heard, 201; The white peril, 209; William Everett's oration on patriotism, 209; Echoes from Kansas Yearly Meeting, 209; The weight of private consciences in civil government, 217; Lives that still live, 217; A lesson on rumor receiving, 217; Notice of The Methodist Weekly, 217; Notice of maxims for daily use by Rachel S. Steer, 219; On the death of Victoria, 225; What Christendom needs is Christianity, 229; Thoughts, 233; Redeeming the time, 233; Revival, 241; Inspired psalmody, 249; Compulsory prayers, 257; Preparation of sermons, 265; Notice of a treatise entitled, "The Prince of Peace, or the Bible on Non-resistance and War," by Cyrus W. Harvey, 265; Notice of "An Inquiry into the suppression of the Anti-war Views of John Wicklif," by Josiah W. Leeds, 265; Fruit-pelting and root-killing, 273; A successful business life, 273; Patriotism, 273; Labor and its waste, 281; War looting abroad, temporary, at home perpetual, 289; On patriotism, 289; Notice of a letter from a Friend on the subject of war, 289; Proposed translation into Arabic of a book on kindness to animals, 289; Grace by calendar, 305; On the approach of the Yearly Meeting, 305; On unpaid ministry, 306; The old Quaker note re-echoing in others, 306; Notice of the famine in India, 306; On one way to help the sufferers in India, 306; Notice of the proceedings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, 313, 321; Moral law the same in all fields of operation, 314; The one man power, 329; Quakerism in England: its present position by Edward Grubb, 330; The elevation of our colored population, 337; Remarks on Friends as set upon a hill, 337; No "Holy Land" without Christ's spirit, 338; The workman is known by his tools, 345; The appalling famine in China, 353; The worse than famine, 353; Some misconceptions of Quakerism, 354; Echoes of hope for the negro, 354; Reception of Wicklif's anti-war views, 354; The holy witness to Holy Scriptures, 361; Short editorial comments, 369; On the Unitarian movement, 369; On original principles of truth, 369; The Czar still in hopes of the world's peace, 369; Danger rocks ahead under the paid pastorate, 369; An impediment of speech, 377; Singing without the spirit, 385; On the apostolic succession, 385; Recollections of Wm. Kite, 385; Anti-Christ the same spirit under all religions, 386; Carping may close the way for the main principle, 386; One's larger family, 401; Fragments of a symposium, 409; On carnal warfare, 410; On the spiritual presence of Christ, 410.
- Education. Remarks on studies not necessary to a liberal, 38.
Intellectual development not the most important part of symmetrical, 345.
- Egypt. Recent valuable discoveries in, 31.
On the valuable results to, expected from damming the Nile, 333.
On the antiquity of writing in, 397.
- Elder in the Church of Christ. On the qualification and work of an, 5.
- England. First-day school in, diminishing in number, 128.
Church of. On ritualism in the, 183, 190.
The mischievous effects of clergy and laity in the, 190.
Roman Catholic doctrines and practices advocated in the, 334.
The erroneous doctrine of apostolic succession held by the, 385.
- Entertaining angels unawares. Extract entitled, 258.
- Epistle to Friends in Ireland in 1762. Extracts from, 205.
- Eudisia the wife of the Emperor Theodosius. Incidents in the life of, 109.
- Evans William. Incident in the ministry of, 215.
The animating prospect of, concerning the younger Friends and comments, 246.
- Everyday goodness. Incidents entitled, 73.
- Evils. Social, to be cured chiefly by individual reformation, 140.
- Exchange of coats. Incident entitled, An, 75.
- Exhortation. An, 1.
- Explanation by John W. Foster. An, 38.
- Extravagance. An era of, 399.
- Eyes. On the manufacture of artificial, 237.
The need we have that our spiritual, may be opened, 303.
- Face about. On turning to the light, entitled, 106.
- Faith. The need for the exercise of, in the present day, 18.
The speedy answer of God to the prayer of, 70, 199.
Those who have, must expect trials, 139.
The, which gives victory over sin, comes by the operation of Christ in the heart, 161.
Incidents of, 199.
- Fatherhood of God. Essay entitled, The, 13.
Comments on the above, 67.
- Faith in ice. Anecdote of an African, entitled, 183.
- Faithful to principle. A taxpayer imprisoned for twenty-one months for refusing to pay a war tax, 402.
in a little thing, 410.
- Family. Hints to promote harmony in a, 359.
- Fanning Capt. Providential interposition experienced by, 394.
- Farnborough Mariabella. Brief mention of the religious life of, 70.
- Finding out how to begin. Extract entitled, 245.
- Finished and folded up. Remarks on character, entitled, 45.
- First day of the week. Conscientiousness regarding the observance of, rewarded, 260.
- Fish. A course of study of, in Cornell University, 69.
On tagging, in order to trace their movements, &c., 357.
- Followed by his mother's love. Touching incident, entitled, 238.
- Follows Ruth. Anecdote illustrating the integrity of, 347.
- Forbearance. The constant need of, 252.
- For using his brains. A brakeman rewarded for, 18.
- Forests. On the intelligent preservation of, 69.
- Forget. Things to, 181.
- Forgiveness. On, 12.
- Fox. The character of the, 46.
George. Remarks of Robert Ellis Thompson on, 193.
Notice of copper etchings to illustrate the journal of, 367.
An epistle of, to Friends in suffering, 406.
- FRIEND THE. On the relation of, to the political campaign, 73.
- Friends. Religious communications addressed to, 1, 119, 135, 138, 163, 213, 214, 244, 246, 266, 278, 283, 293, 335, 359, 393, 405.
On the state of the Society of, 9, 39, 41, 55, 65, 90, 101, 113, 129, 137, 143, 178, 204, 209, 247, 249, 263, 264, 296, 311, 330.
Remarks of Mary Peisley on the future of the Society of, 5.
Early, did not read the Bible in meetings for worship, 6.
On the views of, in regard to ministry, 17, 55, 129, 169, 265, 285, 291.
Remarks of David Gregg on the influence of, in this country, 20.
Reasons for the use of sound words, etc., by, 29, 37, 66.
Why, differ from other religious professors, 33.
The useful effect of historical and biographical accounts of, on the young, 47.
Preservation of a family of, during an Indian war, 53.
Regret of the New York Sun at the disappearance of the plain language of, 55.
Commendation of an American envoy of the peculiarities of, 55.
The mass of testimony left by the early, to the truth of their principles, 65.
Notice of a history of, in Pennsylvania, by Isaac Sharpless, 67, 73, 75.
On the preservation of, during the Irish Rebellion, 71.
Derogatory remarks of Theodore Roosevelt upon, noticed, 89, 105, 113, 119.
The loss to the Society of, of innovations in faith and practice, 90.
Remarks on, entitled Quakerism not declining, 97.
On the duty of, members of isolated meetings, 105.
A definition of, 111.
- Friends. Consistency with the profession of, commends their principles to others, 113, 121, 329.
Remarks on the Beacon controversy among, in England, 117, 122.
Historical notes on the title "Society of Friends," 134.
Unfaithfulness in little things has caused the fall of many, 135.
On unauthorized exponents of the doctrines of, 137.
The Christian nurture of the children of, the duty of parents, 139.
Notice of public meetings appointed by, 143, 167.
The profession of, is that of primitive Christianity revived, 145.
Counsel to, from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1900, 161.
The views of, in regard to baptism with water, 165.
Notice of the sale of a meeting-house at Plymouth belonging to, 167.
Remarks of John Morley on, 167.
Notice of the number of Friends removing from Ireland to Pennsylvania between 1682 and 1750, 167.
The danger to, from a theological training, 169.
Notice of Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting of, held Twelfth Month, 1900, 177.
Testimony to the value of silent meetings of, for worship, 178, 183, 276.
Counsel to a person about to join the Society of, 180.
The service of, not completed, 183, 311, 329.
Notice of a meeting of, at Merchantville, N. J., 183, 351, 384.
Letter of the Western District Monthly Meeting of, on the attendance of meetings, 183.
Caution to, against joining in party politics, 186.
Comments on the above, 210.
Remarks of Robert Ellis Thompson on the rise of the Society of, 193.
Honest answers to the queries addressed to, 205.
Notice of a memorial of, in England, against the South African war, 207, 215.
On worldliness in the Society of, 214.
Remarks on the leavening influences in the world of doctrines professed by, 217, 306, 329.
Appreciation of the writings of R. Barclay and others in Eastern Europe in 1816, 230.
Notice of the old meeting-house of, at Catawissa, Pa., 238.
Records of, used as statistics for longevity, 239.
Remarks on certain former members among, 239.
On a revival in the Society of, 241, 357.
An appeal to, regarding militarism, 243, 266.
An exhortation of Joseph James to, 245.
Statistics concerning, 247, 264, 391, 392.
On efforts to introduce the pastoral system among, 247, 265, 296, 369, 392.
On the intrusion of singing into meetings of, 249.
The paramount need of, is to be a living, faithful, spiritual people, 250, 311.
Faithfulness to convictions in, blessed, 250, 299.
Anecdotes of early, 251.
Invitation to, to hold meetings near Northbrook, Pa., 255.
On the belief of, in regard to prayer, 257, 285.
The reasons for the manner of worship of, 276, 285, 291, 302, 315.
A communication to, by Richard Jordan in 1821, 278.
Notice of, in the Eastern Quarterly Meeting, N. C., 279.
On preserving valuable historical information concerning, 286.
Testimony to the value of the week-day meetings for worship of, 287.
Memorial of, to the Legislature of Penna. against pool selling, etc., 295.
Notice of Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting of, held Third Month 14th, 1901, 295.
Remarks on using certain designations respecting, 295.
Address of, in England to King Edward VII, and his reply, 298.
Comments on the above, 329.
The attendance of week-day meetings of, 298.
The doctrines of, in relation to the Holy Scriptures, 308, 361.

- Friends. Reasons why, cannot approve of singing in meetings for worship, 315.
On the privileges and responsibilities of membership among, 322.
in England. On the present position of, by Edward Grubb, 330.
On views of, in regard to religious labor, as expressed by John Pease in 1845, 331.
Remarks of the London Spectator on, 333.
Remarks in the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin upon, and comments, 337.
A tract prepared for attenders or strangers at a meeting of, 341.
Notice of addresses of, to monarchs, 349.
The value of the efforts of, in using the plain Scripture language, 351.
Some misconceptions relating to, corrected, 354.
Encouragement to, in a communication of Christopher Healy, 357.
The influence for good of the mid-week meetings of, 373.
Remarks of John Morley in reference to, 375.
Notice of a proposed periodical under the name of, 375.
A valuable collection of books relating to, 391.
On taking part by, in public bodies, 392.
"The ten talents of Quakerism," 392.
Minute of London Yearly Meeting of, 1901, against the opium war with China, 405.
A plea for a peaceable spirit. An address issued by London Yearly Meeting, 1901, 406.
A concise statement of the doctrines of, 411.
- Freedmen. A moving school in the Southern States to teach industrial arts to the, 199.
On plans for the elevation of the, 337, 354.
- Fretting. The sin of, 314.
- FRIEND, THE. Remarks on conducting, 153.
An announcement against the editor of, denied, 169.
- Friends' Boarding School at Barnesville, O. Jesse Edgerton and wife, Superintendent and Matron of, 359.
- Friends' Freedmen Association. Appeal on behalf of, 127.
Thirty-eighth Annual Report of, 324.
- Friends' Temperance Association. Resolutions adopted by, 162.
- Funeral reform. Proposed, 90.
Comments on the above, 194.
at Orange Street Meeting-house, Twelfth Mo. 11th, 1900. A concern felt at, 213.
- Funerals. Extravagant expenses at certain, 320.
- Galveston. Clara Barton in relief work at, 101.
- Gambling. The social dangers of, 339.
The early lessons in, learned by card playing at home, 363.
- Genealogy. Remarks of Richard Claridge on, 340.
- Gentleness. Let us cultivate, 33.
- Girl. A, helpful to others by her sympathy, 5.
A remark of a, who had been disobedient, 39.
Brief hints for a bright, 53.
Remark of a dying, that she could see Jesus, 108.
Remark to a, on painting her own portrait, 123.
Remark of a, that she had found God, 138.
Advice to a, to learn domestic science, 159.
- Give while you can. Extract entitled, 235.
- Giving and getting. The connection between, 404.
- Glass. Some new uses of, 310.
"Go tell my church where they will find me," A vision, 172.
- Going to Meeting. Essay entitled, 276.
God seen in all his works, 150, 154.
- Godman. Dr. John G., Brief notice of the late, 300.
"Go on," Anecdote of Arago, the astronomer, entitled, 30.
- Good tidings of the Gospel. The remarks of a little girl upon the proper effect of, 49.
"Good old times" reviewed, 267.
- Gordon General. A prayer of, 413.
- Gospel of Christ adapted to all circumstances and generations of mankind, The, 143.
The effect of the, on life and character, 158, 273, 316.
The, an unchanging gospel, 166.
The, not the Scriptures, but the power of God unto salvation, 308, 315.
On the delivery of lectures, instead of preaching the, 367.
- Gough James. Experience by, of the blessed presence of Christ, 210.
- Governor's revenge. Incident entitled, A, 147.
- Governor of Illinois. Exemplary action of the, in regard to dancing and intoxicating liquor, 343.
- Grace by calendar. Remarks on, 305.
- Grasshopper plague of 1877 in Minnesota. Remarkable answer to prayer in connection with the, 274.
- Griffin Mary. Remarkable religious experience of, 357.
- Grubb Edward. Notice of, 263
- Gutenberg celebration. On the art of printing in connection with a proposed, 11.
Johann. On the life and labors of, 59.
- Haddon Elizabeth. Incidents in the life of, and settlement in New Jersey, 386.
- Hague Conference. Notice of the appointment of judges of the Court of Arbitration established by the, 207.
An account of the, 233.
Remarks in reference to the, 248, 272, 390.
Late remarks of the Czar upon the, 369.
- Hair. Observations on the growth of, 71.
- Hamlin, Dr. Cyrus. The labors of, for Turks in Constantinople, 55.
- Hampered by want of money, 318.
Comments on the above, 356.
- Hanbury, Elizabeth. Message of, in her one hundred and eighth year, to London Yearly Meeting, 383.
- Happiness as a habit. On, 238.
- Happy man. A description of the, 358.
- Hatton Robert. Notice of a minute granted to, 47.
- Hatton, Susanna Evens. The concern of, respecting the Scriptures, 374.
- Haverall Frances R. The religious concern of, in writing her poems, 198.
- Hawaii. Account of Kapiolani, a Christian convert in, 325.
- Hawk and the terrapin. Illustration of the danger of dallying with sin entitled. The, 122.
- Hazings. Tragic endings of, 188.
- Hearing in one's own language. Extract entitled, 363.
"He being dead yet speaketh." Extract from Wm. Evans' Journal, entitled, 246.
- Healy Christopher. Animating prospect expressed by, of the future welfare of the Society of Friends, 357.
- Health. How to avoid insanity, 29.
Facts as to winks, 30.
Two co-operative physicians, Dr. Diet and Dr. Quiet, 41.
The danger of violent exercise to elderly persons, 43.
Speak in a low cheerful voice in the sickroom, 66.
Certain bacteria beneficial to, 124.
On the use and abuse of, 175.
The secret of, and of a long life, 245.
A scheme for a sanitarium for consumptives in Pennsylvania, 260.
The habit of worry injurious to, 262, 347.
The importance of pure air to, 270, 301.
Out-of-door habit conducive to, 292.
The, of children helped by out-door play, 293.
Lectures to French soldiers on the effects of alcohol upon the, 316.
On the cause of sighing, 347.
The value of quiet to, 348.
- Hermit of the Wissahickon. Account of John Kelpius, the, 60.
- Heroes. Modern, 178.
- Hints on helping the poor, 197.
- Hints to promote harmony in a family, 359.
- Hindrances to international peace, 269.
Comments on the above, 301.
- Historical information. On the importance of preserving, 286.
- Holy Scriptures. Remarks on a prevailing ignorance of the, 3.
A translation of the, into Zulu, 7.
Remarks on the authorship of the epistle to the Hebrews, 7.
Notice of the Nazarine Bible—the first printed edition of the, 11.
The Apocrypha published by the Russian church with the, 31.
Notice of inquiry respecting the, in Japan, 31.
The Old Testament, what it has always been, 36.
The convincing authority of the, 45.
The style of the, the highest in literature, 47.
The Lord's teachings in the, the words of the Word, 52
On different renderings of a text in the, 63.
Remarks on the comfort of the, 86.
The, are not dependent upon monuments for credibility, 143.
The, to be profitably understood only by the help of the Holy Spirit, 151.
- Holy Scriptures. On the destructive criticism of the, 159.
A knowledge of the everlasting gospel recorded in the, a great blessing, 161.
On the want of a knowledge of the, among high officials, 178.
The passage of the, known as the printer's verse, 215.
Learn to love the, 235.
The blighting effects of insidious skepticism in regard to the truths of the, 305.
The doctrines of Friends in regard to the, 308.
Christ and not the, is the everlasting gospel, 315.
The, in raised letters for the blind, 355.
The Holy witness to the, 361.
On the art of writing in the days of Moses, 397.
The teachings of the, adapted to all periods and conditions, 403.
now translated into 320 languages, 407.
- Holy Spirit. The withdrawal of, from the heart by disobedience, 135.
On the inspiration and guidance of the, 202.
No true power in preaching without the, 363, 403.
- Home. The, is no place for the scold, 142.
On showing kindness and gentleness at, 163.
On good manners at, 188.
- Hone William, a noted infidel. Convincement of, 332.
- Honesty the shortest road to success in business, 254.
Dishonest men value, 271.
- Hoosier. On the origin of the word, 407.
- Hymn of Praise. A, 87.
- Impediment of speech. Remarks on the secret restraints of Divine grace entitled. An, 377.
- Indian. An, overcomes evil with good, 310.
"I am the way." Incident entitled, 173.
I'm going to do it. Anecdote of a boy who had promised to read his Bible, entitled, 167.
"I am my own master." Extract entitled, 398.
"I will not be afraid." On the confidence of faith, entitled, 399.
- Impossible. We are not to attempt the, 319.
"In season, out of season." Faithful service entitled, 123.
- India-rubber. On the origin and production of, 180.
- India. Two notable gifts towards relieving the famine in, 31.
A contribution by Friends in England for the relief of famine in, 81.
Account of the efforts of Ramabai for the help of women in, 162.
Remarks of a native of, on Christianity, 191.
The impression for good made by Christian F. Schwartz in, 212.
The great need of famine relief in, 306.
Account of Krishnu-Pal, a Christian convert in, 326.
The growing influence of Christianity in, 407.
- Indian chief. Noble words of a dying, 178.
- Indians. Experience of the Pilgrims with the, in 1620, 156.
Notice of a religious meeting held by Friends with, 179.
Remarks on the labors of Ebenezer Worth among the, in New York, 377.
- Inconsistency. The damaging effects of, upon personal influence, 31.
- Infidel. A Christian character an unrefutable argument to a, 43, 158.
A reply to an, 79, 158.
An, convinced of the Truth, 124.
Dishonest quotations from Scripture by an, 230.
Convincement of William Hone, a noted, 332.
- Insane in Palestine. Account of the opening of the asylums for the, by T. Waldmeier, 114.
- Insanity. How to avoid, 29.
On the brutal treatment of, in Syria, 338.
- Inn. The charm of the old English, 338.
- Institute for Colored Youth. Appeal on behalf of the, 370.
- Intemperance. Comments on the prohibition of the liquor traffic as an overwhelming issue, 119.
Testimony of a literary man against the use of stimulants, 127.
Eloquent testimony of a tramp on the blasting effects of, 135.
A prisoner at the bar, condemns, 187.
A law against the caution passed by Congress, 217.
The ill-gotten gains of the rum-seller the price of blood, 238.
Remark on the control of the liquor traffic, 239.

- temperance. A boys' influence against liquor selling, 290.
Lectures to French soldiers on the effects of alcohol, 316.
A boy's remark on avoiding, 319.
A billion dollars of intoxicants used in the United States yearly, 380, 391.
- Intellectual training without religion may blast instead of bless, 159.
- Ireland. On the misgovernment of, by England, 140.
Items concerning the Society, 6, 39, 47, 55, 96, 111, 119, 143, 151, 167, 175, 183, 207, 215, 232, 239, 247, 255, 263, 279, 295, 311, 327, 335, 343, 351, 359, 367, 375, 383, 391, 407.
- Japan. The smoking of tobacco by minors under twenty years of age prohibited in, 65.
Girls as coal-heavers in, 299.
- Jesus Christ the Christian's foundation, 393.
- Jews. Notice of a movement among in Russia, against the Jewish belief, 58.
Notice of colonies of, in ancient Philistia, 237.
The large number of, on farms in New England, 239.
- Jewess. Testimony to Jesus Christ of a dying girl, 271.
"John, look at your mother." On training children rightly, entitled, 307.
- Johnson Ellen C. Superintendent of the Sherborn prison for women, 100.
- Jones John, a minister. Memorial of North Branch Monthly Meeting, Iowa, concerning, 379.
- Jordan Richard. A religious communication by, addressed to Friends in 1821, 278.
- Judge not. Account of Stanislaus Stazzic, entitled, 102.
- Justified by faith, from Isaac Penington, 404.
- Kapiolani, a Christian heroine of Hawaii. Account of, 325.
- Keep the heart alive, 292.
- Keep your eyes open. The value of habits of observation, entitled, 307.
- Kelpius John, the hermit of the Wissahickon. Account of, 60.
- Kind act. The lasting effect of one, 343.
- Kindness. Instances of scattering deeds of, 66.
among animals, 83.
to animals. Instances of, 126.
On showing, at home, 163.
- Kings and queens. The weight of, 326.
- Kings. On independence in connection with, 326.
- Kite James. Recollections by, 102, 109, 220, 229, 251, 260, 274.
William. Account of the late, 300.
Remarks on the religious character of, 385.
- Knowledge. The attainment of saving, 283.
- Knowing God's voice. On, 94.
- Krishnu-Pal, a Christian convert in India. Account of, 326.
- Labor and its waste, 281, 391.
- Labor a blessing, 351.
- Lake Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration. Platform of the Seventh, 390.
- Langdale Josiah. Remarkable incident connected with the death of, 311.
- Language. The plain, does not admit of compliments, 39.
On the English, as likely to become the universal language, 306.
The value of the plain, as correct speech, 351.
- Leading. Remarks on rather than driving others, 4.
- Legal profession. Can a Christian consistently enter the 332.
- Learn to be content. Advice of a converted prisoner, entitled, 189.
- Learn to listen well. Essay entitled, 258.
- Lenten hypocrisy. Remarks on, 278.
- Letter of Esther Tuke to Martha Routh, 57.
M. de Martha to the abess of Port Royal, 226.
of John Machortoff, a Doukhorob elder. Extracts from, 252.
of Mary Peisley, 5.
- Liberia. An account of, 364.
- Life. Different views of, taken by two young men, and the result, 151.
is not a holiday but a discipline, 235.
The secret of health, and of a long, 245.
The powerful influence of a holy, 247, 397.
The need of Americans to return to simplicity of, 252.
Rules for acquiring a dissatisfied, 255.
Do not despise the common blessings of, 258, 414.
- Life. A, spent in harmony with the Divine will, 281.
On a regenerated, 314.
On saving one's own, by saving another's, 323.
- Lighthouses. On moral lessons to be learned from, 28.
- Lightfoot Susanna. A short account of that eminent servant of the Lord, 339, 348, 356.
- Lightning. Remarks on deaths by, 182.
On measuring a, flash, 338.
- Literature. The dissipating effect on the mind of much, 198.
- Little things. On doing, well, 390.
- Live thy own life. Extract entitled, 311.
- Longfellow. Anecdote of the poet, 383.
- Lord. On applying the term, to earthly potentates, 255.
- Love. The unconscious humility of, 1.
Remarks on mistakes made in, 9.
The need of particularly in those who speak upon religion, 244.
"Love is the fulfilling of the law." Incident entitled, 375.
- Loyalist. Anecdote of an American, 261.
- Luther Martin. Anecdote of, 261.
- Luxury. The immense growth of, 190, 252.
- Marriages. Henry Dutton Allen and Frances Armitt Worth, 112.
Arthur Howell Mott and Caroline Embree, 184.
Carver T. Bundy and Evalyn C. Plummer, 320.
Joseph Henderson and Mary R. Baitey, 328.
- Marriage customs. On, 323.
- Make friends at home. Extract entitled, 290.
- Man. Unregenerate, one of the lowest of animals, 170.
- Manners. A plea for good, 4.
- Mars. On signalling to, 396.
- Marriage ring. The, as a symbol of subjection, 365.
- Married state. The advantages and disadvantages of the, an allegory, 77, 82, 91.
- Marvin Hetty. A life saved by the truthfulness of, during the Revolutionary war, 110.
- Masonic orders. On the danger to the community of, 45.
- Match. Interesting incidents in the invention of the safety, 99.
- Maxims from Thomas C. Upham, 301, 370, 415.
- Means of grace in a closet door. Extract entitled, 239.
- Meek. It is the, who are to inherit the earth, 215.
- Membership in the Society of Friends. On the privileges and responsibilities of, 322.
- Memory. On the weakening of the, 319.
- Meditation. Essay entitled, A, 123.
- Memorial of North Branch Monthly Meeting, Iowa, concerning John Jones, 379.
- Memorial of Friends to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, against pool-selling, etc., 295.
- Memory. Marvels of, 13.
- Mennonites. On the objection of the, to voting, 223.
- Methodists. Three congregations of, in Manita, 128.
- Messengers of the Lord are those He himself puts forth. The, 249.
- Mind. On acquiring the power of directing the, 318.
- Minister. Remarks of a dying, 145.
On propriety of conduct in a, 151, 317.
- Ministry. On qualification for the, 17, 30, 55, 129, 169, 244, 265, 370.
On entertainments in meetings for worship in the place of, 41.
The great bane of a salaried, 142, 167.
A hired or man-made, incongruous with primitive Christianity, 145.
Experience of Ruth Newlin in yielding to a call to the 155.
A remarkable leading by the Holy Spirit in the, 169, 195.
Caution of North Carolina Yearly Meeting in 1843, against a hireling, 175.
Advice to a young Friend in the, 201.
The need of love as a qualification for the, 244.
The solemnizing, of Daniel Wheeler, 253.
The value of unpaid, 306.
Remarkable incidents in the, of David Sands, 317.
The necessity of holiness in the, 317.
Remarkable incidents in the, of Mary Griffin and Comfort Collins, 357.
The Divine anointing the qualification for the, 363, 366.
The work of the, not a hindrance to secular employment, 370.
- Misplacements. Essay entitled, 90.
- Minority. A, has achieved the moral conquests of the world, 326.
- Mission of the Comforter. Essay entitled, The, 52.
- Missions. Statistics of Roman Catholic and Protestant, 39.
- Mission work. Essay entitled, The new, 293.
"Modern thought." Comments on, 360.
- Modern shams in society, 402.
- Modest reply. A, 103.
- Moorman Clark, convinced of the evils of slavery, 106.
- Months. On the origin of the common names of the, 95.
Comments on the above, 97.
- Moral weight of small parties. The, 20.
- Morality. The duties enjoined by, and by religion cannot be divided, 195, 314.
- Movements of ministering Friends, 6, 39, 55, 96, 111, 119, 167, 175, 183, 232, 255, 279, 280, 295, 319, 327, 335, 343, 359, 391, 407.
- Mongoose a forbidden quadruped, 327.
- Montreal Witness, the only Christian daily newspaper. The, 127.
- Mormons. The activity of the, in proselyting, 316.
- Mormon. On the book of, 380.
- Mother. The happy retrospect of a devoted, 242.
A true, 295.
- Mourning. On the fashion of wearing black as a sign of, 180, 194.
- Murder prevented, 350.
- Music has no place in spiritual worship, 54.
- McCarthy Ellen. Anecdotes in the religious experience of, 189.
- McMullen Daniel Y. Remarks on the Christian character of, 319.
- Napoleon's characterization of Christ, 318.
Remarks on the above, 387.
- Nantucket. Notice of the disappearance of Friends from, 111.
On the balmy climate of, 180.
traditions, 404.
- Narrations from memory, by James Kite, 102, 109, 220, 229, 251, 260, 274.
- Nations. On the decline of military, 267.
Characteristics which show the prosperity of, 299.
- Natural History, etc. The clam, 2; Butterflies, 19; Strength of a beetle, 21; Migration of birds, 23; Military skill in ants, 26; The robin, 35; Moths and butterflies, 38; The fox, 46; Efforts to preserve some of our disappearing mammals, 69; The albatross, 76; Kindness among animals, 83; Fish-eating birds, 99; The emperor moth, 101; Bacteria, 124; The gyprotherium, 124; Starfish and oyster, 131; The beaver, 140; The value of toads and bats, 141; The buffalo, 150; The ant, 181; Weaver-birds, 235; Chinese pheasants, 283; The rapidity of the flight of birds, 302; The tears of animals, 303; The mongoose, 327; Codfish, 357; The fauna of the deep sea, 398.
- Negro authors. Notice of a Bibliography of, 159.
- Neighbors. How to make good, 159.
- New birth, the spiritual birth. Essay entitled, The 405.
- New bottles for new wine. Extract entitled, 382.
- Newlin Ruth. Some account of the early experience and subsequent travels of, 109, 116, 125, 132, 142, 149, 155, 164, 171, 179, 185, 195, 204, 211, 218, 227, 236.
- Newspapers. The demoralizing character of certain, 250.
- New York City. Address of Bishop Potter to the Mayor of, on the complicity of the police with loathsome vice, 167.
- Nineteenth century. Inventions, etc., in the, 359.
"Not by might, not by power, but by my Spirit." Essay entitled, 366.
- Notes from others, 7, 15, 23, 31, 39, 47, 55, 103, 111, 127, 143, 151, 159, 167, 183, 207, 215, 239, 255, 263, 319, 343, 359, 391, 407, 415.
- Nuts as food, 116.
- Oath. Truth better than an, 30.
- Obedience. When, counts for something, 370.
On, to the secret pointings of the Spirit of Truth, 377.
- Oil. On the use of, on roads for laying dust, 170.
- Old age. A happy, 345.
- Old bachelors and old maids. Essay entitled, 374.
Remarks on the above, 401.
- Old people. The appreciation which should be shown to the, 319.
- One thing needful. Remarks on the, 341.
- Oratory. Remarks of Bismarck on the evils of, 133.
- Overcome evil with good. Incident entitled, 310.
- Overruling evil for good. On, 18.
- Pacific Ocean. Observations on the bottom of the, 187.

- Paper. The Oxford India, 159. 348.
- Palm tree. The as an emblem of spiritual life, 374.
- Parents. The Christian nurture of their children, the duty of, 139. 372. 395.
- The pressure of business disqualifying, from their duty, 189.
- Pastoral system. Danger rocks ahead under the, 369.
- Paternal companionship. The happy effects of, on sons, 372. 395.
- Patagonia. Monsters domesticated anciently in Southern, 124.
- Patience. The blessings of, 293. 301.
- Patriotism. Failing and successful varieties of, 174.
- On true and spurious, 273.
- True, defined, 289. 314.
- Paul the apostle. The early and the later life and character of the, 134.
- Paxon Oliver. Incidents in the religious experience of, 403.
- Peace comes through submission to Jesus Christ, 17.
- On the battles of, 49.
- Hindrances to international, 269.
- Peace conference at The Hague. Account of the, 233.
- Society. Abstract of the Annual Report of the, for 1901, 372.
- Pearl buttons made from clam shells, 2.
- Pease John. An exercise of, delivered in Philadelphia in 1845, 331.
- Photograph likenesses. Remarks on, 341.
- Pidgin-English as spoken in the far East. On, 213.
- Peisley Mary. Letter of, 5.
- Penn William. Remarks on "Some Fruits of Solitude," by, 87.
- Observations of, on true Christians, 150.
- Notice of autographs and manuscripts of, for sale, 247.
- Pennsylvania. Notice of a history of Friends in, by Isaac Sharpless, 67. 73. 75. 167.
- Comments upon remarks by Theodore Roosevelt upon the government of, by Friends, 119.
- A scheme for a sanitarium for consumptives in, 260.
- Memorial of Friends to the Legislature of, against pool-selling, etc., 295.
- Penington Isaac. "What are good works?" by, 169.
- The conviction of, 170.
- On justification by faith, 404.
- Philippine Islands. Notice of the establishment of the first Protestant college in, 55.
- A report from travellers in the, 74.
- Notice of the harassing problem presented by Romanism in the, 167.
- Physicians. Remarks on the unnecessary number of, in the community, 167.
- Pig that staid at home. The 183.
- Pilgrims' Progress. Notice of a rare first edition of, 391.
- Pins. How, are made 134.
- Pirates. A remarkable deliverance from, 110.
- Place of safety—the quiet habitation. Essay entitled, A, 335. 338.
- Plea for the farm. A, 173.
- Plea for a peaceable spirit. An address issued by London Yearly Meeting, 1901, 406.
- Plants. Vegetable ivory, 46; India rubber, 180; Giant trees, 181; The annatto, 182; The whistling tree, 229; The cloth tree, 229; The stinging tree, 229; The palm, 260; The banana, 294; The rattan, 400.
- Poet laureate of England. The, 159.
- Poetry.—Original. Adrift, 12; Enoch walked with God, 76; Wherefore didst thou doubt? 86; Lines written in memory of Abigail Vail, 100; The message that never came, 132; The Christian pilgrim, 133; An appeal for India, 141; Leisure moments, 147; "There remaineth a rest," etc., 171; We'll call him Lord Jehovah, 173; Peace, 174; Ritual, 178; Lines on Isa. xliii, 4; Lovely things, 223; Meditations, 252; Between the centuries, 262; Lines on the death of a Friend, 284; Beyond dark clouds, 294; Lines, 318; The Author of praise, 393.
- Poetry.—Selected. The aged minister's prayer, 84; Arabia, 192; Alphabet of proverbs, 366; Called aside, 228; An evening scene, 396; On forgiveness of injuries, 276; Forget not all his benefits, 308; "God made manifest," 196; The guests of God, 276; Grandmother's sermon, 341; Gaining wings, 357; God's summer, 404; How long? 13; The hands drop off, the work goes on, 36; Hymn taught in a Yorkshire school, 239; The hill of age, 327; Home, 364; It must be settled right, 314; Lines, 20, 21, 28, 105, 123, 190, 196, 205, 276, 311, 324; Lines in remembrance of Margaret Hutchinson, 127; Little things, 205; The mother, 3; Mizpah, 71; My father's field, 165; My father, 317; Not knowing, 268; "Not as I will," 339; Oh, thou my soul, forget no more, 326; Put to sleep in the dark, 94; Patient with the living, 143; A prayer for the spirit, 157; A prayer in meeting, 204; The prayer of self, 396; The plodder's petition, 268; "Rock of ages," 221; Silent worship, 19; Shoe strings, 38; stillness, 45; The secret of his presence, 67; Seeking and finding, 156; The search for hidden treasure, 165; The silent battles, 188; Song of the Pilgrims, 292; Sowing seeds, 301; True courage, 270; The unbarred door, 33; A voice from heaven, 388; Wonderful, 60; War, 326.
- Political measures. The true test of the value of, 161.
- Power of God in the work of religion. The, 138.
- Political corruption. The nature of, 170.
- Poor. A few hints on helping the, 197.
- Post office. Statistics in relation to the, 196.
- Poverty not the greatest affliction, 356.
- Praise. The grace of, 284.
- Pray. Satan and his hosts cannot, 234.
- Prayer. An ancient, 23.
- The obligation to maintain the spirit of, 94. 132, 257.
- Answers to, 199. 274
- Remarks on compulsory, 257.
- The belief of Friends in regard to, 257. 285.
- Prayers. Reconstructing, 263.
- Praying. On the distinction between, and saying prayers, 98.
- Prejudice. The need for conquering, 396.
- Providential guidance, 75. 82. 123. 125. 126. 199. 229. 271. 378.
- deliverances, 110. 132. 219. 221. 274. 324. 350. 394.
- Preachers not necessarily ministers of Christ, 175. 391.
- The evil done by those, who advocate war, 255.
- Women engaged as, 391.
- Preaching. Remarks on modern, 31. 369.
- The probable effects of persecution upon, 81.
- When, loses its power, 103. 226.
- The bane of salaried, 142.
- On asking for the "success of our arms," 226.
- Lectures on religious subjects, not ministry, 265. 367. 369.
- On, by a badge, 292.
- On brilliant but useless, 341.
- Remarks on lay, 343.
- No true power in, without the Holy Spirit, 363. 366.
- Remarks on competition in, 369.
- Prescott William H. Anecdote of, 41.
- Priestcraft. The reduction of, to be expected, 215.
- Princess Louit-Seu and the worms. Extract entitled, 27.
- Presbyterians. An account of the Reformed, 223.
- On the proposed revision of the creed of, 343.
- Prisoner. Religious counsel by a converted, 189.
- Touching incident connected with a, 238.
- Progressive revelation of Truth. Essay entitled, 266.
- Proverbs. An alphabet of, 366.
- Purity of intention. The Divine regard to, 214.
- Quaker service. Account of a Friends' meeting, entitled, A, 371.
- Quakerism and the individual. Essay entitled, 44. 53.
- Remarks on the above, 113. 114.
- is a foreign tongue to most minds. Comments upon the statement that, 121.
- Quiet. The value of, to health, 348.
- Quietness and retirement. The need of, to our spiritual strength, 19. 111. 115.
- Quiet habitation. The blessedness of the, 335. 338.
- Railroad. A wreck upon a, prevented, 18. 219.
- Reading matter. Remarks on pernicious, 250. 343.
- Read. How and when to, 154.
- Real supplants the typical. The, 165.
- Reforms. On the gradual progress of, 382.
- Reformation not to be effected by soft sentimentalities, 184.
- Reflections on entering another year, 244.
- Religion. On the work of, in the soul, 73. 331.
- an acquaintance with God in spirit, 138.
- The difference between true and false, is that the latter leaves the heart unchanged, 161.
- on books in connection with, 165.
- A vision of the broad and the narrow way, 182.
- Remarks on the antiquity of the Christian, 191.
- The duties enjoined by, and by morality cannot be divided, 195.
- Fanaticism under the name of, 207.
- Comments on the above, 217.
- On the derivation of the word, 215.
- On giving instruction in, 226.
- Religion. The progressive revelation of Truth in the work of, 266. 331.
- On an expected revival of, at the beginning of the new century, 305.
- The exclusion of self, a characteristic of true, 319.
- Ready obedience in the work of, to Divine requirements essential, 347.
- Current literature as a foe to, 371.
- On the inward and the outward work of, 373.
- Clear spiritual vision in the work of, necessary, 399.
- Religions. Statistics of the world's, 391.
- Resignation to the will of God. The blessed effect of, 85.
- Religious bodies whose members do not vote, 223.
- Religious concern. Essay entitled, A, 335.
- Remarkable instance of the effect of holy living upon others, 220.
- Retirement. Advantages of solemn, 90. 111. 115. 289.
- Reverend. The false use of the word, 7.
- Rich poor man. A, 139.
- Rich man. Definition of a Christian, 193.
- Rome. Remarks on antiquities in, 369.
- Roman Catholics. False titles applied by, to their ecclesiastical superiors, 18.
- Circular issued by, in Manila, 23.
- Exaltation of the Redeemer by the Pope, 137.
- A danger to this country from the increase of, by the acquisition of the Philippines, 143. 167.
- Proposed curtailment of the power of, in France, 184.
- Extracts from an address of Cardinal Gibbon to, against war, 201.
- Priests of, in Cuba, apply for membership in "Friends' Church," 239.
- Sympathy among, for Christian Scientists, 320.
- Doctrines and practices of, adopted by Protestants, 334.
- Roosevelt Theodore. Derogatory remarks of, on Friends noticed, 89. 105. 113. 119.
- Russia. On the Stundists of, 228.
- Anecdote related by Daniel Wheeler of the son of the Emperor of, 255.
- On the evangelical sects of, 294.
- Letter of Leo Tolstoi to the Czar of, 350.
- The Czar of, still in hopes of the world's peace, 369.
- Sacerdotalism. Remarks on, 371.
- Salvation army. Notice of the operations of the, 343.
- Sands David. Remarkable incidents in the ministry of, 317.
- Sanscrit literature. On, 70.
- Saunders Hetty, a colored writer. Brief account of, 327.
- Scattergood Thomas. Incidents connected with a visit of, to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, 378.
- Scotland. Remarks on the union of the Free and United Presbyterian Kirks in, 165. 349.
- Scott Job. Extracts from, 250. 251.
- Scotton Robert. Memoranda concerning, a minister deceased, 215.
- School for teaching agriculture at Cornell University, A, 38.
- A, vacated on account of a horse-race, 127.
- A moving, in the Southern States teaching industrial arts, 199.
- children. Contributions by, in New York for the Galveston sufferers, 289.
- Schools. On paupering students in, 18.
- The useful influence of the literature of Friends in, 47.
- The advantages of day, and boarding, compared, 59.
- for the children of Friends in Western Yearly Meeting, 151.
- Advice to teachers of, 157.
- A harmful effect of training in theological, 47.
- On military drill in public, 212. 264. 273.
- On war excitement in, in England, 222.
- The importance of nature-studies in, 292.
- Prayer and a religious life, the safeguards of children at, 360.
- Sea. The fauna of the deep, 398.
- Secret societies. The capabilities for mischief of, 45.
- Tragic endings of initiations into, 188.
- Membership in, not allowed to the Brethren or Dunkards, 316.
- "Secr." What constitutes a? 295.
- Seek the beautiful at home, 79.
- Self-help, encouraged by Andrew Carnegie, 212.
- On forming the habit of, 358.
- Selfishness a great cause of loneliness, 175.

- aafesbury Earl of. Noble resolution of, upon entering Parliament, 322.
 Hackleton Richard. Letter of, to a person about to join the Society of Friends, 180.
 Sheep-shearing by machinery, 286.
 Showing his first pants. An incident of Providential guidance, entitled, 271.
 Northstream Charles. Brief account of, 86.
 North extracts, 111.
 Silence. On keeping, in the midst of trouble, 27.
 Silk. On the invention of weaving, in China, 27.
 Simply to serve God. Extract entitled, 12.
 Jesus Christ, the deliverer from, 111.
 must be displeasing to God, 111.
 The decay of the sense of, an alarming feature, 166.
 Sincerity. The value of, 239.
 Singing. On untruthful, 132.
 On inspired, 249.
 On, with the understanding, 255.
 Reasons why Friends can not approve of, in meetings for worship, 315.
 without the Spirit, 385.
 Singing. On the dangers of, and how to avoid them, 213.
 Slate pencils. The present method of making, 143.
 Slavery. A Friend convinced of the evils of, 106.
 in the Transvaal. On, 153.
 The, of artificial living, 391.
 Slaves not to be picked up unless intended, 59.
 Social Mary of Glasgow. Account of the late, 301.
 Soul of man. On the dealings of God with the, 177.
 Social secretary. The uses of the, among operatives, 186.
 Sound words. Essay entitled, 12. 18. 29. 37. 66.
 Sun-chamber. Extract entitled. The passing of the, 302.
 Speech. The longest, on record, 410.
 Studying profession and practice. Extract entitled, 31.
 Sulfur emits heat, 381.
 Sulfur that wouldn't rub off. The, 4.
 Suzzie Stanislaus. The benefactions of, to the city of Warsaw, 102.
 Stephen Caroline E. Essay by, on war and superfluities, 62. 68.
 Stepping stones. On making use of events in life as, 26.
 "Start me." Extract entitled, 319.
 Style and stylists. Remarks on, 364.
 Straightening out the furrows. Advice to boys, entitled, 219.
 Steamman, a loyalist in New York State. Anecdote of, 261.
 Strikes in business. The occurrence of, prevented, 133.
 Story Thomas. The Divine exchange by, and comments, 281.
 Swedish exile. Account of Vasile Panloff, a, 228.
 Success. Perseverance an essential element in, 30.
 Not always an indication of character, 33.
 Remarks on what constitutes, 242.
 Suffering. The blessed effects wrought by, 251. 293.
 Summary of Events, 7. 15. 23. 32. 39. 47. 55. 63. 71. 80. 88. 96. 104. 112. 120. 128. 136. 144. 151. 160. 168. 175. 184. 192. 200. 207. 216. 224. 232. 240. 248. 255. 264. 272. 280. 288. 296. 303. 312. 320. 328. 336. 344. 351. 360. 368. 376. 384. 392. 400. 408. 416.
 Sun. Notes on the solar eclipse of the, Fifth Month 28th, 1900, 1.
 Sunshine. The power of, 95.
 Superfluities in connection with a Christian life. On, 32. 68.
 Sweden church-building in Philadelphia. Historical account of the, 15.
 Sympathy would often be given if we knew the circumstances, 11.
 with the sufferings of others a fruit of the Spirit, 251.
 T. The value of, 52.
 Take time to be holy. Extract entitled, 284.
 Taylor William. An infidel convinced through the instrumentality of, 124.
 Teachers. The responsibility of, as Christian instructors of the youth, 342.
 Telephone. Much inconvenience saved by the, in Indianapolis, 151.
 Escape. Account of the great Paris, 253.
 Impartation the test of character. Essay entitled, 246.
 Thanksgiving Day. On the observance of, as a superstition, 185.
 Zoology. Notice of lectures at a summer school of, 43.
 "There is time enough yet." On the danger of putting off the day of salvation, entitled, 127.
 "There is always a guinea-hen." Anecdote of a discontented woman, entitled, 290.
 Things worth doing. Remarks on, 23.
 Thomas Joshua, a Methodist minister. Remarkable prediction by, 229.
 Titles of distinction. Remarks on certain, 15.
 Time. On the most important occupation of our, 83.
 Timepiece. A remarkable, 100.
 Tobacco. The injury done by cigarette smoking, 4.
 A wrong report of a bishop and his, 10.
 The smoking of, by miners under twenty years of age prohibited in Japan, 65.
 The evil of the example set by men to boys in smoking, 224.
 Eight indictments against, 381.
 Toilet articles. Valuable, 259.
 Tolstoi Leo. Notice of a recent letter of, to the Czar of Russia, 343. 350.
 Tommy's lesson. On going the right way, entitled, 381.
 Tract Repository. Annual report of David Heston on the publication of the, 203.
 Remarks on the above, 216.
 Tract Association of Friends. Notice of the proceedings of the, 295.
 Report of the, 365.
 Tracts. The distribution of, blessed, 125.
 Transvaal. On slavery in the, 153.
 Truth-telling. The need of, 55.
 Trees. On certain curious, 229.
 Truhold William. Faithfulness of, to religious convictions, 251.
 Tuke Esther. Letter of, to Martha Routh, 57.
 Tuke Samuel—his life work and thoughts, 93. 98. 117. 122. 130. 140. 146. 341.
 Twentieth century. Comments on the opening of the, 231.
 Tydmarsh Maud, an early Friend. Anecdotes of, 251.
 Unappreciated moral worth. Extract entitled, 274.
 Unconscious influence. Incident illustrating, 324.
 United States. The degradation of the, in connection with war in the Philippines, 20. 243. 266.
 Customs in use in, a century ago, 236.
 Remarks of Wayne McVeagh on the true mission of the, 249.
 The enormous apple crop of the, 268.
 The wars of the, 343.
 On the origin of "Uncle Sam" as a nickname for, 343.
 Upham Thomas C. Sketch of the life of, 292.
 Maxims taken from the writings of, 301. 370. 415.
 On the blessedness of the interior life by, 323.
 "Upon his shoulders." Remarks upon casting our care upon Him, entitled, 82.
 Vail Hugh D. Notice of the death and character of, 6.
 Victoria, Queen of England. On the death of, 225. 263.
 Brief account of the life and character of, 275.
 How, received information that she was Queen, 291.
 Account by an eye witness of the funeral of, 298.
 Vindication of the fathers. A, 207.
 Vision, A. "Go tell my church where they will find me," 172.
 Vision of the broad and of the narrow way. A, 182.
 Voice for peace. A, 203.
 The value of a sweet, 250.
 Washington, Booker T. Story of his life, 413.
 War. Declaration of Democratic platform against militarism, 7.
 Remarks on the injury done to the Christian character by missionaries who appeal to the sword when attacked, 7. 15.
 The present, in China and the responsibility for it, 9. 353. 355.
 will disappear, when Christ's peace is known, 17.
 The degradation attending the, in the Philippines, 20.
 A declaration of Albert Barnes against, 21.
 Contrasted with the Lamb's warfare, 49.
 The terrible responsibility resting upon the main promoters of, 52.
 and superfluities. On, 62. 68.
 The preservation of Friends during a, in Ireland, 71.
 Remarks of Theodore Roosevelt favoring, answered, 89. 105. 113.
 The great condemnation resting upon rulers who declare, 92.
 War. Scruple of a Friend in business in regard to furnishing materials for, 99. 206.
 Comments on a defence of, 103.
 The spirit of, to be combated successfully only by a peaceable spirit, 105. 124.
 Every, leaves the country with an army of invalids of mourners, and of idlers, 111.
 Kills off the strongest men physically, 128.
 Essay entitled, "Do you believe in war?" 132.
 Militarism a menace to humanity, 137. 243.
 Remarks on non-combatants in, 137.
 When, shall cease, 146.
 Remarks on the influence of boys' brigades in connection with, 172.
 The evils of a preparation for, 174.
 On the cost of a soldier, 183.
 shows the hollowness of the self-righteousness of Christ in nations, 193. 225. 353.
 Remarks against, to Roman Catholics by Cardinal Gibbons, 201.
 Encouragement to those who are opposed to, 203. 217. 372.
 Notice of a Memorial against the South African, by Friends in England, 207. 215.
 Remarks of Andrew Carnegie against, 212.
 In military drill in public schools, 212. 264. 273.
 Comments of The Methodist Weekly against, 217.
 The injury done to school children by, 222.
 A description of, as it is, 223. 326.
 The evidence against Christianity furnished by, 225. 353.
 On praying for the success of a, 226.
 The proceedings of the Peace Conference at The Hague, 233. 248. 369.
 Appeal of Buddhists to professing Christians against, 239.
 Appeal to Friends regarding militarism, 243. 266.
 On the mind of Christ in regard to, 255.
 The mission of the church is to prepare for peace, 263. 353.
 Testimony of a former soldier against the spirit of, 265.
 Notice of the testimony of John Wickliff against, 265. 354.
 The decline of military nations, 267.
 The armed nations fear, the most, 268.
 may be prevented by individually refusing to commit murder, 268.
 On hindrances to international peace, 269.
 The looting of, abroad temporary, at home perpetual, 289.
 The effective testimony of one man against, 329.
 Movement against the duel in Europe, 334.
 Instances in which the United States has been a party in, 343.
 The sickening embrace of, by apostate churches, 353. 358. 391. 395.
 is nothing less than organized thievery and murder, 358.
 Reasons why strenuous efforts against, should be made, 360.
 The cost of a soldier in different countries, 360.
 Notice of efforts of the Peace Society against, 372.
 The savage nature of man developed by, 395.
 A Connecticut man imprisoned for twenty-one months for refusing to pay one dollar tax for, 402.
 On the causes which led to the opium, with China, 405.
 Watching for faults. Remarks on, 14.
 Water. On the remarkable supply of, for quenching thirst in hot countries, 131.
 Water of separation. Remarks of John Woolman on the, 277.
 Ways of pleasantness. Extract entitled, 46.
 "We ought to obey God rather than men," 141.
 Weddings. On the extravagance of modern, 391.
 Wealth. The Christian view of, is that of a stewardship, 184.
 Remarks of a millionaire on, 263.
 On a successful business life, 273.
 The folly of eagerness in the pursuit of, illustrated, 319.
 Westtown School. Remarks of Geo. Dillwyn on, in 1799, 214.
 Westtown Old Scholars' Association. Notice of the fourth annual meeting of, 111. 119.
 Wedding ring, as a symbol of subjection. The, 365.
 What man could do. Extract entitled, 5.
 What Paul learned. Essay entitled, 134. 163.
 What of the future? Extract entitled, 231.
 What is success? Essay entitled, 242.

- Where to sail. On avoiding temptations entitled, 394.
- Which is the owner? Remarks on a fashionable woman's life, entitled, 402.
- Why not begin now? On beginning to be a Christian, entitled, 407.
- White William, ex-Mayor of Birmingham, Eng. Notice of the death of, 96.
- Whittier John G. An estimate of, 77.
- Who is to blame? Essay entitled, 92.
- Wheeler Daniel. The solemnizing ministry of, 253. Anecdote related by, respecting the son of the Emperor of Russia, 255.
- Wilkinson Elizabeth. Tender advice of, to a young Friend, 302.
- Wool. Record of the transformation of, into clothing in less than seven hours, 279.
- Woolman John. Remarks by Esther Tuke and others on, 173. First service of, in England, 221. On the water of separation, by, 277.
- Women. The Sherborn prison for, under Ellen Johnson, 100. Advice to young, on receiving gifts from men, 311. Advice to young, from Dorothea Klumpke, the astronomer, 343.
- Words. The use of sound, 12. The number of, spoken in an hour, 277.
- Words of wisdom from the writings of Buddha, 191.
- Works. Remarks of Isaac Penington on good, 169.
- Worry. On the habit of, 262. 404.
- Worship. On the benefit of silence in, 10. 19. 276. 359. On emptiness of the spirit of, in meetings for, 41. Music has no place in spiritual, 54. 249. On waiting upon God, for the performance of, 115. 245. 371. A waiting, belongs to primitive Christianity, 145. The pew system excludes free attendance at places of, 167. The example of Archbishop Leighton in attending public, 187. An earnest exercise of spirit against wandering thoughts necessary in, 245. Spiritual strength to be waited for in the performance of, 276. The reasons for the manner of, by Friends, 276. 285. 291. 302. 315. Testimony of a Friend to the value of week-day meetings for, 287. Reasons why Friends do not approve of singing in meetings for, 315. Rites and ceremonies in connection with, believed to be waning, 343. Incidents illustrating silent, entitled, A Quaker service, 371. On singing without the Holy Spirit in meetings for, 385.
- World. The friend of the, the enemy of God, 317.
- Worldling. The testimony of a, on the emptiness of fashionable pleasures, 285.
- Worth Ebenezer. Some reminiscences of, 377. 406. 414.
- Writing for the public. Helpful suggestions in regard to, 198. On illegible, 301.
- Yale University. A labor bureau to provide work for students in, 111.
- Yearly Meeting. Canada, 1900, 6. 10. Gleaning from Epistles to, 36. Dublin, 1901. Notice of proceedings of, 375. Kansas, 1900. Notice of proceedings of, 153. 157. London, 1900. Notice of proceedings of, 6. Number of members of, who take a vocal part in meetings, 111. 1901. Notice of proceedings of, 375. Notice of a Memorial of Meeting for Sufferings of, against the South African war, 207. 215. 1901. Minute of, against the iniquity of the opium war with China, 405. A plea for a peaceable spirit. An address of, 406. New England, 1900. Extracts from correspondence of, 25. 40. Claim of, in regard to age, 239. 1818. Religious counsel issued by, 306. 1901. Notice of, 408. North Carolina, 1900. Notice of proceedings of, 55. Historical account of, 279. Ohio, 1900. Notice of proceedings of, 105. Philadelphia, 1900. Counsel addressed by, to its members, 161. 1901. On the approach of the, 305. 311. 1901. Notice of proceedings of, 313. 319. 32. Western, 1900. Notice of proceedings of, 151. Notice of proposed new discipline for the "larger body," 7. 55. 96. 151. Young men in medical colleges, etc. Statistics of 18

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, SEVENTH MONTH 21, 1900.

No. 1.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,

(South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth.)
PHILADELPHIA.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

From Above.

He who said, "I am from above, ye are from beneath," did not, and does not speak to man's condition in order to accuse him or to condemn him, but to save him; to show us where we are by nature that we may rise to where He is by grace. He who is above all is "from above," not as one fallen, but as one descending to uplift us that we may rise with Him. Born from beneath by nature, we must be "born from above" by the Spirit, or "quickened together with Christ." By openness and submission to this life-giving process we are changed so as to "live not by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth from the mouth of God." Born from above, we take our interests from above, our motives, our joys, our discipline, our duties, our worship, our life. If thus we be "risen with Christ," we "seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth"—the exalted things of his Spirit, which are "the fruit of the Spirit." The first-named of these is love.

The duty and privilege of seeking and cherishing the things "where Christ sitteth, at the right hand of God," who is not far from every one of us, separates even in this life as to his right hand his sheep who hear his voice, from the goats at the left hand, who hearken to the voice of self. The first sign of this separation is love through acts of love. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples." In the judgment these are placed at his right hand and who have been so near his fellowship where He sitteth, as when He was hungry to feed Him, when He was thirsty to give Him drink, when He was naked to clothe Him, when He was sick or in prison to visit Him. And when Love in its unconscious humility can ask "When?" his answer is, "Inasmuch as ye have done it to the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me." "Come ye blessed of my Father, receive the kingdom prepared for you."

The Saviour of men did not descend from above that fallen men might be raised with Him in newness of life, without so identifying himself with humanity as in all their afflictions to be afflicted, and especially to feel the wounds of man's inhumanity to man.

For "THE FRIEND."

An Exhortation.

"Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord; though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."

This seems to me to be such persuasive language, so familiar, like an earthly parent talking to a child, "Come, now, let us reason together, saith the Lord." How can any resist, when they feel something in the secret of the heart, as that still, small voice, saying, "this is the way, walk thou in it," inviting to "come taste, and see that the Lord is good"—such as have not known Him fully for themselves, not yet been willing to give up and follow their Lord and Master in the way that He would lead them. How can such put away these gentle pleadings, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow." Such is the goodness of our blessed Lord to the willing and obedient ones. So that it is with me to encourage any that have turned a deaf ear to that inspeaking voice, to be willing to close in with the offer of Divine grace, and rejoice that you are counted worthy of his special notice; and to any little fearful struggling ones I would say, don't be afraid to trust the dear Master, only be willing to give yourselves up into his hands to be moulded and fashioned as He would, and He will do more for you than you can think or ask, and besides this the reward will be sweet peace, "not as the world giveth." And our blessed Saviour has said, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." We know that we have no lease of our lives, so that the present only is ours. It is dangerous to trifle with Divine goodness. Then be willing to allow the blind eyes to be opened, and the deaf ears unstopped, to see and know things as they really are, even by heartfelt experience, and be able to say, as some did formerly to the woman of Samaria, "Now we believe not because of thy saying, for we have heard Him ourselves and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world."

Then such as have come to feel this will indeed become new creatures in Christ Jesus, "when old things will have passed away, and all things become new," and "your joy no man taketh from you." And "Neither heights nor depths, things present or things to come, shall be able to separate from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." This has been and will be the experience of the Christian traveller, all those that are willing to follow Him with full purpose of heart. No matter who they are or what position in life, the dear Master is no respecter of persons, but will use all alike, that are willing to follow Him.

Neither is He a hard Master, but "his ways are ways of pleasantness, and all his paths are peace."

These are no new things that I am writing, for the Lord changeth not. "He is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever." "The Eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath is the everlasting arms," and to the faithful ones a Comforter, a Friend, in every needful time. Then, "Come now, and let us reason together," saith the Lord: "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson they shall be as wool."

E. C. C.

Chester Co., Pa., Seventh Month, 1900.

For "THE FRIEND."

Notes on a Solar Eclipse Trip to Virginia.

The total eclipse of the sun of Fifth Month 28th, 1900, was, with but few exceptions, successfully observed at all the principal stations along the path of totality. When we remember that this path extended in the United States from New Orleans to Cape Henry, Va., and, after crossing the Atlantic Ocean from Portugal to a point in Egypt, we may well congratulate ourselves upon the success of the various parties, many of whom had traveled hundreds of miles to make their observations.

A total eclipse of the sun is at once one of the most sublime and beautiful spectacles that the heavens present to the contemplation of man. The duration of totality is so brief and so many problems are there—and there only presented for solution that astronomers have literally gone to "the ends of the earth" to observe their occurrence.

I had for many years desired to witness the varied phenomena attending a total solar eclipse, and, especially, had I wished to see with my own eyes that object of surpassing beauty—the sun's corona. My desire has been granted, and at the suggestion of several Friends, I will give a brief outline of my trip to Norfolk, Va., where, in company with a few other observers, I made my observations.

I left Woodstock, Ontario, Canada, on Fifth Month 23d, and reached Philadelphia early the following morning. As I had never been in that city before, I at once looked up the various Friends' Meeting-houses and other places having an interest to members of the Society. I was just in time for the mid-week meeting, held in the Arch Street Meeting-house. This, to me, was a great privilege. Though anxious to get to my journey's end as soon as possible, a feeling came to me that it was indeed good and right for me to linger here in the presence of so many real Friends. And so it proved. After the meeting was concluded, I visited the wharf and found the steamer Gulf Stream on the point of sailing for Norfolk, Va. I should, perhaps, have had just time enough to go to the railway depot for my baggage; but an impression came on me that I had better take the next boat. This proved to be the Clyde Line steamer Yemassee; and as she did not sail for two days, I took the opportunity to make several visits to Friends, including an interesting visit to the office of THE FRIEND.

The Yemassee left Philadelphia on the afternoon of the 26th. We had a very pleasant sail down the Delaware, and did not reach the open sea till well on towards midnight. Riding at anchor, and not venturing out into the open sea (for a storm had been in progress) we passed the steamer Gulf Stream, the same boat that I had not felt clear in taking on the 24th. Then it appeared that I had done right in obeying the intimation previously referred to.

After passing Cape May, we found the Atlantic rather rough, and I became quite seasick. The morning of the 27th came after a night of broken rest, and, with it, a clear sky and comparatively smooth sea. We passed a very pleasant time watching an occasional passing ship, and, later in the afternoon, the gradual approach of the Virginian coast.

During the voyage I had formed the scattered observers on board into a regular eclipse party, and we did not disband till the eclipse was over, and we were obliged to return to our respective homes by different routes.

Upon reaching Norfolk we found the city overcrowded with visitors. To a Northern visitor there was much that seemed strange and novel. Even the white population seem a little different to our Northern friends, as they have a slight, but distinct, accent of their own in speaking, and in other ways. But let us leave matters terrestrial and prepare ourselves for the celestial glory of the morrow. This we did by securing a good night's sleep. After the experience of the previous night, I fully appreciated sleeping upon a bed that remained in a horizontal position.

The morning of the eclipse broke at last, and to my joy, I found the sky cloudless. After a visit to a carpenter's shop to complete the mounting of the photographic apparatus, we soon found ourselves in an electric car and rapidly leaving the city to escape the smoke usually found lingering over all large collections of houses. Reaching Camp Stella Bridge, between two and three miles east of the city, we decided to erect our apparatus in its vicinity, and, ere many minutes had elapsed, we were ready for the now rapidly approaching moment of totality. A sheet of white cotton, about eight feet long and six feet wide, was pegged to the ground, upon which we hoped to observe the shadow-bands. G. T. Beans and H. C. Coffeen stationed themselves near this and kept a lookout for the expected "bands." About two minutes before totality, the shadow-bands made their appearance. They resembled the shadows cast by a surface of water when a stone is thrown into it. The illusion was perfect. By this time there was a marked diminution of the brightness of the sun's light, and all objects appeared to be lit up by a strange, weird and unearthly light. The sky to the south was, near the horizon, of a peculiar reddish color, quite unlike the colors of sunrise or of sunset. A large buzzard, flying low, and apparently in search of a place of shelter, was seen passing over. Suddenly the shadow was upon us, and we were instantly involved in darkness. As the last ray of sunlight was cut off, the great object of our journey burst into view, and we saw for the first time the radiating glory of the sun's corona. As this beautiful object burst into view a strange unearthly shout of admiration arose from the city behind us. Thousands of voices, with one accord, testified to the sublimity and grandeur of the scene. But this was succeeded by a death-like silence, and the only sound afterwards heard was the "click" of the photographic shutter as the plates were being exposed. As seen by the unaided eye the corona appeared "fan-shaped" and to be of the type anticipated—that is, of the type usually associated with the period of sun-spot minimum. The planet Mercury was conspicuously visible and was much brighter than I had anticipated. One coronal streamer pointed in the direction of the planet and could be traced well on towards it. Another long streamer was seen well below this. On the other side (away from Mercury) the corona streamed away comet-fashion. Scarcely had we noted these details when a burst of light at the western limb announced the reappearance of the sun, and a moment later all was over.

I had secured four photographs during totality, and shortly after third contact I began making exposures again, in an attempt to secure the corona during the partial phase. Six plates were thus exposed. As these have not yet been developed, I cannot say whether my object has been attained or not. The exposures made during totality have, so far as they have been developed, given fair results, considering the rather small size of the image.

The examination of these photographs will be the work of several weeks, and, therefore, I must postpone for a future occasion a discussion of the scientific results of my journey. The memory of the few fleeting seconds, when the corona hung like a beautiful jewel in the high heavens, will never leave us, but will ever remain enshrined with us as a "joy forever."

T. S. H. SHEARMEN.

Woodstock, Ontario, Canada, Sixth Month, 1900.

CHRISTIAN CHARITY.—My mind was impressed so deeply with a lively sense of the excellency and necessity of true Christian charity, that I had to speak of it in our meeting, in the constrainings of the Father's love, laboring to encourage Friends to cultivate this excellent virtue, in their own minds and in each other.

If this was enough prevalent among us, we should more enjoy the Divine presence, in our solemn assemblies and sitting together; and it would prevent tale-bearing and back-biting among us, and supply a mantle of love to cast over each others' weaknesses and infirmities, so that though we might have occasion sometimes to advise and deal plainly with one another, yet we should be careful of entertaining hard thoughts, or using any hard speeches about each other. Indeed, there is too much work to do at home, when we are rightly engaged, to allow us either much time or much inclination, to be speaking or thinking lightly of others. A sense of our own weakness bows us to the root; and a travail of soul is experienced for our own, and others' preservation; and in this state, it is much more edifying to us to suffer with and for each other, than to indulge a whispering, tattling, tale-bearing disposition.—Selected.

Where the Pearl Buttons Grow.

Down on the bottoms of the Mississippi and Illinois rivers grow great gardens of clams. There they lie half buried in the mud with their shells open taking in their food from the water as it flows by. The inner shells of the mussels shimmer and glow with the colors of the rainbow, and it is because of this iridescence that during the last nine years people in this country have found out that they can make beautiful pearl buttons from these clams. The manner in which this is done is related by The Advance. These beds are raked over with dredges, and as the hooks, when caught in the open mouths, are firmly held by the closing shells, the clams are brought to the surface by the thousands. They are then put into great tanks over a fire and cooked, when the animals are easily scraped out. The shells are carried into a factory where they are sawed up into little round disks, then two or four small holes are bored into them, and when they are polished they become the pearl buttons that are sewed on little girls' aprons and dresses and small boys' waists—clam-shell buttons—that is all they are.

The little baby clams are held in the gills of the mother. Sometimes there are many thousands of them, and they stay there swinging back and forth in the current, until their tiny shells become quite firm, when they are thrown out into the river to look out for themselves. Each little clam has usually one or more pairs of spines, or hooks, on the base of its shell, and when thrown out it lies on its back with the valves opened very wide. A long filament floats up from this baby clam, which in some way attaches itself to the fins, gills or scales of the fish swimming by. It pulls itself up by this thread and snaps its shell on to the fins, gills or scales of the fish, and burying its little hooks in the flesh, irritates the fish, causing it to throw out a fishy substance which covers over the baby clam, just as an oak leaf covers up the egg of the gall insect that is laid in it. This little cyst, or covering, is air and watertight, and the prisoner stays here about seventy days developing its body. In the meantime the fish may carry the little clam many miles away from the spot in which it left its mother's gills. It then works its way out and drops to the bottom of the stream and is ready to start a little colony of its own.

There are countless dangers that await these millions of baby clams besides the floods and droughts. Fish eat them, when they are quite small, with eagerness. Muskrats and raccoons carry them to their houses and tear the soft animals from their shells and eat them, and crows carry the large mussels to a considerable height in the air and drop them on the rocks, where the shells are broken, thus enabling them to feast on the animals. Besides these enemies, people along the river banks dump refuse and sewage into the river, and that not only destroys the clams, but the fish, too.

Since it was found that these clams in the Western rivers make such good pearl buttons, many factories have started up in the cities near by where the buttons are so quickly and easily turned out that a great many children are able to assist in their manufacture.

THE MOTHER.

A little ring of gold—a battered shoe—
A faded, curling wisp of yellow hair—
Some penciled pictures—playthings one or two—
A corner and a chest to hold them there.

Many a woman's fondest hoard is this,
Among her dearest treasures none so dear,
Though bearded lips are often her's to kiss
That once made only prattle to her ear.

The sturdy arm, the seasoned form, the brow
That arches over eyes of manly blue
Mean all joy to her living memory now,
And yet—and yet—she hugs the other, too,

With that rare love, mysterious and deep,
Down in a mother's heart through all the years,
That placid age can never lull to sleep
And is not grief, yet oft brings foolish tears.

She often goes those hoarded things to view,
And finger the wee treasures hidden there—
To touch the little ring and battered shoe,
And kiss the curling wisp of yellow hair!
—New York Press.

Ignorance of the Bible.

Some interesting experiments have recently been made by a very competent person, and under very favorable circumstances, to test the knowledge of Holy Scripture which is possessed by the average freshman on entering an average college. The experiments were made on several occasions by C. F. Thwing, President of Western Reserve College. The number of students subjected to examination was about one hundred. On the first occasion there were thirty-four, sons of professional men, merchants, farmers, all but one connected with some ecclesiastical body. Nine were Congregationalists, nine Presbyterians, five Methodists, three Baptists, two "Reformed," two Jews, one Free Baptist, one Unitarian, one Roman Catholic, and one of no church connection. To these, President Thwing set an easy examination paper, composed of extracts from Tennyson, each containing a Biblical allusion. He did not seek the more recondite references with which the poetry of Tennyson abounds, but took twenty-two of the most obvious, requiring the meaning of the allusion to be given. Here are a few of the questions:

1. My sin was as a thorn
Among the thorns that girt Thy brow.
5. Like Hezekiah's backward runs
The shadow of my days.
9. Ruth among the fields of corn.
11. A Jonah's gourd,
Up in one night and due to sudden sun.
15. Perhaps, like Him of Cana in Holy Writ,
Our Arthur kept his best until the last.
20. The godless Jephthah vows his child . . .
To one cast of the dice.
22. Follow Light, and do the Right—for man can half-control his doom—
Till you find the deathless Angel seated in the vacant tomb.

Surely it would require no great knowledge of Scripture to explain such Scriptural allusions as these; but here is the record just as it was made by president Thwing and published by him in the Century for Fifth Month:

"Nine failed to understand the quotation,
My sin was as a thorn
Among the thorns that girt Thy brow.

Eleven failed to apprehend the 'manna on my wilderness.' Sixteen were ignorant of the significance of 'striking the rock.' Sixteen knew nothing about the wrestling of Jacob and the angel. Thirty-two had never heard of the shadow turning back on the dial of Hezekiah's lengthening life. Twenty-six were ignorant of 'Joshua's moon.' Nineteen failed to indicate the peculiar condition of Esau's hand. Twenty-two were unable to explain an allusion to Baal. Nineteen had apparently never read the idyl of Ruth and Boaz. Eighteen failed to indicate the meaning of 'Pharaoh's darkness.' Twenty-eight were laid low by the question about Jonah's gourd. Nine, and nine only, had knowledge enough to explain an allusion to Lot's wife. Twenty-three did not understand who 'Arimathæan Joseph' was. Twenty-two had not read the words of Christ sufficiently to explain, 'For I have flung thee pearls and find thee swine.' Twenty-four had not so read the account of Christ's first miracle as to be able to explain a reference to it. Eleven did not understand the mark which Cain bore. Twenty-five were as ignorant as a heathen of the foundations of the Church on Peter [as well they might be]. Twelve, and twelve only, had gathered up knowledge sufficient to indicate certain truths about the serpent in Eden. Twenty-seven were paralyzed by the allusion, 'A whole Peter's sheet.' Twenty-four were unable to write anything as to Jephthah's vow. Eleven were struck dumb by an allusion to Jacob's ladder. Only sixteen were able to write a proper explanation of 'the deathless Angel seated in the vacant tomb.' In a word, to each of these thirty-four men, twenty-two questions were put, which would demand seven hundred and forty-eight answers. The record shows that only three hundred and twenty-eight were given."

Five years later the same questions, with a single exception, were put before fifty-one members of the freshmen class for women in the same college. The women were practically of the same social position and the same ecclesiastical affiliations as the men. Thirteen were Presbyterians, ten Methodists, nine Congregationalists, five Baptists, four Episcopalians, three Roman Catholics, two disciples, one Unitarian, one Jew, one Universalist, one Lutheran, one Quaker. Not to enter into details, the result of this examination did not materially differ from that of the former. The general average was somewhat in favor of the women; but in both men and women there was a revelation of simply incredible ignorance of Holy Scripture and of hardly less incredible unintelligence of its contents.

President Thwing fairly concludes that "the knowledge of the Bible as literature is exceedingly meagre among people whose knowledge is supposed to be most ample." Of that there can be no doubt; for if men and women take little knowledge of the Bible with them into college, they are not likely to come out with more. It is one of the strangest facts in the educational system of this country, that the one Book to which English literature owes more than to all others put together, is the one Book that American colleges and universities most consistently ignore! The consequence of this neglect of the purest fountain of modern English is very certain to become apparent soon or late. There was a time when the English Bible set the style, so to speak, for English letters in all departments. A recent writer in the New York Evening Post, quoted by President Thwing says: "It is impossible to overestimate the importance of the Bible as a promotive influence in English literature. Its variety of style, its marvellous felicity of phrase, and its dignity and impressiveness, early entered into the very fiber of our literary expression, and long remained there a potent force. Everybody read it from childhood, every one quoted from it, every one's memory was stored with its incidents and its forms of words." How is it now? Let Dr. Thwing reply: "The Bible societies may print the Book by hundreds of thousands, but the people do not read it, or if they do read it, they are not impressed by it. Its history, whether received as veracious or as fabulous, is not known. Its heroes are less familiar than Jack the Giant Killer. Its poetry is not appreciated. The majesty and the magnificence of its style, its deftness of phrase and sweetness of allusion, its perfection of literary form, as well as the profound significance of its ethical and religious teachings, are ceasing to be a part of the priceless possession of the community. Explain the condition as best we may, point out the results as one ought, yet the first emotion is one of grief over this impoverishment of humanity."

What are the causes of this decadence? President Thwing mentions these:

1. The multiplication of books. The English people were once a people of one Book; now they have "a hundred books and five hundred papers to the one Book and the one paper of two hundred years ago."

2. The decline of family life and the decay of family instruction. Only a generation or two ago, the reading or telling of Bible stories was a daily family exercise to which the children looked forward with delight. Now, where is this good custom continued?

3. Decay of family religion. Family prayers are seldom offered, and when they are, the Bible reading is usually very short.

4. The Sunday school, which is often called the Bible school, has by no means taken the place of the family as a teacher of the Bible, and the teaching of the Sunday School is exceedingly inadequate, the teachers themselves being ignorant of the Book they are appointed to teach.

5. The elimination of the Bible from the public school. It may be true that such reading of the Bible as was once practised in the public school could never be of any great value; and still the complete exclusion of the Bible from the school is a loss in itself, and all the greater a loss since it must make an impression upon hundreds of thousands of the young that the Bible is really not worth studying.

6. The decay of the observance [of the first day of the week], has also had, and still has, a prodigious influence in the neglect of the Holy Scriptures. Attendance on Divine worship, at least in Protestant churches, always secures at least the hearing of one or more lessons from the Bible, but the habit of church-going has been badly shaken. The day is becoming a holiday, and in the use of it as a holiday the hearing of the Scriptures is lost.

7. Dr. Thwing properly asks whether one of the causes contributing to the neglect of Holy Scripture may not be a profound change in the point of view from which the Bible itself is regarded. We are inclined to agree with him that it is so. We are undoubtedly at present in a reactionary state, and the extravagant unscriptural and uncatholic views of the Bible which have been widely taught and held as of Divine authority, are now abandoned, with a mingling of resentment and contempt that they should ever have been entertained. The destructive process has been frightfully rapid. We are not sure that it has even yet reached its end; but we believe that it has, and therefore we hope to see something like a counter-reaction, in which men shall desire to know what the Bible says for itself rather than what other men choose to say against it.

What we have heard, and heard with apprehension, is that the Church of Rome is dexterously taking up the cudgels for the Bible; and just as surely as the Church of Rome or any other Church is "mighty in the Scriptures," and jealous for them, just so surely will that Church—with or without a pope, and with or without an apostolical succession in its ministry [but not without the spirit of Christ]—in the long run win and hold the people of this country.—Adapted from the Church Standard.

A PLEA FOR MANNERS.—Manners still go a long way toward making a man; they still count for something in estimating one's character, and yet there is a danger that good manners will die out from lack of appreciation in these democratic days, when every one thinks he is as good as his neighbor. It will be a keen pity when we become too busy to think or care much for the rights or comforts of others; too busy to be good-mannered; too busy to make the petty sacrifices of which Emerson says good manners are made.

Give the newsboys of the streets a newspaper to sell, and note how few will say, "Thank you." Notice the habit of the young man of to-day of rushing in and out of offices and banks, and letting the door slam back in the face of the man just behind him. Notice the lack of manners—the little thoughtfulness of life—in the trolley car, in the railway train, on the street. We are all more or less to blame. We are all more or less selfish, and selfishness is the root of ill manners.—S. S. Visitor.

"THEY'LL follow!"—Leading is sometimes far more effective than driving. Parents and teachers and guides in all walks of life are the gainers in every way when they recognize this. A striking illustration of this truth was recently afforded in one of our western railway stations. Among the hustling, bustling crowd pushing its way toward the exit was a foreign emigrant family with nearly a dozen children, frightened in the din and uproar, huddling together and hanging back to keep near the father, who was trying to surround them from the rear. He was poking and thrusting and calling orders, all unheeded, until it seemed the train would leave them, when the gruff gate-keeper caught him by the shoulder, and shouted, "Go through yourself, they'll follow!"—S. S. Times.

The Stain that Wouldn't Rub Off.

He was but six years old, and a boy of six cannot be expected to know as much as a boy of twelve. That was one reason why Charlie needn't have been quite so sharp in his rebuke, and then mother showed him another reason that evening.

Charlie and Freddie were "cutting across fields," and, as they went along, were gathering flowers for mamma. Charlie was walking ahead, and so far had spied all the flowers, which he then, with gracious condescension, allowed Freddie to gather. Suddenly the little boy caught sight of a bunch of yellow beauties with deep brown centres. They were down at the bottom of a little hill, and the grass around them was most brilliantly green and velvety. Charlie had evidently not seen them, and Freddie darted down the slope.

"Here, Freddie!" shouted Charlie, glancing over his shoulder, "don't you go down there. It's all muddy."

But the warning was disregarded, and the next moment Freddie had sunk in the slime half-way up his fat little legs.

"Now, how'm I goin' to get you out of that?" demanded Charlie, crossly. "I told you not to go in, and you went. Now I'll have to get all muddy myself pullin' you out. Stand still!" this more sharply than ever. "Don't try to get in any deeper than you are. Quit your blubberin' now. I'll get you out some way."

But it took a long search for a limb of suitable length before Charlie, standing on the edge of the swamp, pulled poor little Freddie on firm ground again, though in doing it he nearly threw the little fellow on his face.

Freddie's sobs broke forth afresh, and the older brother relented a little.

"Here," he said in a gruff tone, that was assumed to hide the tenderness which he feared might show, "now I'll scrape off the mud with a stick, and when your shoes dry they can be blackened, and will look most new. I tell you though, Freddie, you ought to have listened when I told you the mud was there."

"I didn't see any mud," whimpered Freddie, "the grass was prettier there than anywhere else."

"That's just it," replied the brother, "when you see such awful green grass as that you can know there's a swamp."

"But I didn't know," protested the little fellow, "and I couldn't see any mud."

"Then that's just why you ought to have listened to me," declared Charlie, feeling that he must not lose this opportunity of rebuking still further. "You see I'm twice as old as you and ought to be supposed to know twice as much." This last sentence had a sarcastic tone that hurt Freddie, though Charlie was pleased with this conceit.

In fact he was so well pleased that he couldn't forbear repeating it to mamma, though he really had not meant to be too hard on his smaller brother.

"You see, mamma," he said, "I told him I was twice as old as he was and know about twice as much. That's what he got for not minding me."

Then Freddie could bear the reproaches no longer. He was sitting on mamma's lap, with his little bare feet rubbed quite dry, and she was wiping away the tears, and telling him it might have been much worse, and that he was her own baby boy, and the rest of the nice things mothers say when their children are in trouble. So this last speech of Charlie's was really too much.

"Why don't you always mind?" Freddie burst out, sitting bolt upright and digging his fists in his eyes to stop the welling tears. "He don't mind papa, mamma, for I saw him smoking a cigarette in the barn. I peeked through a hole and saw him. He'd better tell himself to mind, hadn't he, mamma?"

Mamma only looked at Charlie, but it made the blood rush around his throat and up his face to the very roots of his hair. That evening, though, she came in his room after he was in bed. She turned out the light—for she was one of those mothers who know a fellow can tell things better in the dark—and then she said:

"How about the smoking, Charlie? Did Freddie tell me the truth?"

This time she couldn't see the blush (though it was there), and she could barely hear the whispered, "Yes."

Then, like all wrong-doers since the time of Adam, he began to excuse himself.

"I didn't do it to disobey papa, I truly didn't, mamma. But half the boys in our class smoke cigarettes, and I don't see where's the harm in it."

"Neither did Freddie see the mud, and you were very cross with him because he did not obey you who were twice as old. Papa is more than three times as old as you. Don't you think, then, that he should know at least three times as much as you? Don't you think when he tells you that cigarettes are very harmful, that you should believe he knows the truth of what he is saying? He tells you that the boy who smokes cigarettes can never be as strong and healthy a man as the boy who does not smoke. He tells you that the man with a weak body can never do as valiant service for God or the world as the man who is strong. He tells you that the boy who deliberately does those things that will injure the body, is not only committing a great wrong against himself and the world in which he is to be a worker, but he is sinning against God.

"Remember, dear," she was bending over him for a good-night kiss, "remember that Freddie's mud was easily brushed off; but every act of disobedience or wrong-doing of any kind leaves an indelible stain on the soul."—Presbyterian.

A PROPER USE OF LAWFUL THINGS.—If the Christian religion admitted the possession of this world in any other sense than the simple and naked use of those creatures, really given of God for the necessity and convenience of the whole creation; for instance, did it allow all that pride, vanity, curiosity, pomp, exchange of apparel, honors, preferments, fashions, and the customary recreations of the world, with whatever may delight and gratify their senses; then what need of a daily cross, a self-denying life, "working out our salvation with fear and trembling," seeking the things that are above, having the treasure and heart in heaven, no idle talking, no vain jesting, but fear and meditating all the day long, undergoing reproach, scorn, hard usage, bitter mockings and cruel deaths? What need of these things, and why should they be expected in order to that glorious immortality and eternal crown, if the vanity, pride, expense and gratifications of the world are allowable to the followers of Christ.—W. Penn.

Extract from a Letter of Mary Peisley, Afterwards Mary Neale.

WRITTEN TO JOHN PEMBERTON, OF PHILADELPHIA, IN THE YEAR 1755.

Respected Friend: . . . . . But some of us have believed and seen in the visions of light, that the day of Gospel light which has lawned will rise higher and higher, notwithstanding some clouds may at times have intercepted its beauty and brightness, as has sorrowfully been the case amongst us, a people who have been highly favored. And although we have not the least intention to derogate from the real worth of those honorable sons of the morning who were made instrumental, in a great degree, to break down the partition wall which carnal, selfish men had erected between the people and the Sun of Righteousness, yet I am not afraid to say and give it under my hand, that it was and is the design of God that his people in future ages should make an improvement on their labors, and carry on the reformation even further than they did. And notwithstanding a night of apostacy has come over us as a people (as day and night naturally succeed one another in their season, and God keeps his covenant with both), yet I am of the judgment that day has begun to dawn, in which the Sun of Righteousness will rise higher and higher and with greater lustre than heretofore. But if those who are called of God to be sons of this morning look back to the night and to them who have slept and been drunken in the night by sipping of the golden cup of abominations, or even to the latter day, they will frustrate the designs of Providence respecting themselves, though not respecting his own work. For it is his sacred determination to be glorious in heaven and glorified on earth, though these who would be called his Israel be not gathered. And I am of the faith that, where the Gospel has first been preached to them, as it is meet it should, such as neglect to embrace it, thereby rendering themselves unworthy of so great salvation, will be left, and the feet of the messengers turned another way, even to the highways and hedges, with a power of impulsive love, which will prevail on the halt, the maimed and the blind to come to the marriage of the king's son, and by coming they shall be made strong, beautiful and lovely as a bride adorned for her heavenly husband, who shall not look back to those things that are behind, but press forward toward the mark, or the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus, following no man's example further than they follow Him. And what if I say, in the faith that is given me, that God has designed to carry some of this generation, in these parts of the world, higher and further in righteousness than their forefathers were carried, even such as were honorable in their day and have fallen asleep in Christ. Therefore let them take heed that they limit not the Holy One of Israel, nor circumscribe the leadings of his blessed, unerring Spirit by looking too much at the example of others; for this has been the means of stopping the gradual progression of many glorious, well-begun reforma-

tions. Instead of going forward they have looked back, and even sunk below the standard of the first reformers. Such as will be happy instruments to labor for a reformation in this degenerate age must differ in their trials from the sons of the former morning, and will find them to be of a more severe and piercing kind; theirs were from the world, and such they might justly expect therefrom, not exempt from false brethren; ours will chiefly arise from those under the same profession, clothed with the disguised spirit of the world, and that amongst some of the foremost rank (so-called) in society.

And what if I say (though my natural eyes may not see it), that God will divide in Jacob and scatter in Israel before that reformation which He designs is brought about in his Church.

MARY PEISLEY.

SOME THOUGHTS ON THE QUALIFICATION AND WORK OF AN ELDER IN THE CHURCH OF CHRIST.

The work of an Elder in the Church of Christ appears to be very weighty, and not to be moved in, but as the mind is brought under a right concern, and influenced by that wisdom which gives a right understanding in those things that belong to their office.

To take the oversight of the flock, and to judge of the ministry, requires that such as are selected for those services should be well grounded in religion and acquainted with the mystery of Godliness; it requires a deep going down to feel after the mind of Truth in all their movements; it requires clear discerning and sound judgment; it requires deep humility of heart; it requires the Divine anointing, and without a portion thereof the duties of their office cannot be discharged to the honor of Truth, nor to the edification of the Church. For without these qualifications, they are likely to err both in judgment and conduct; and their being set forward in religious society exposes them rather more to some peculiar temptations, and I fear hath lifted some up to think more highly of themselves than they ought. Where this is the case, they are very likely to err respecting the ground of ministry; though they may be capable to judge of words, whether they agree with sound doctrine or not; but if they go not down and travail in spirit with those that minister, they cannot know from what spring the words flow, and for want of this knowledge they are likely to err in judgment, and instead of helping forward the true birth, become the means of stifling or slaying it. And for want of clear discerning and sound judgment, they may err by nursing a false birth. And if there is not a dwelling in deep humility, there is danger of erring in conduct, and instead of being ensamples to the flock, they be tempted to lord it over the heritage.

When I consider the weight and importance of the work confided to the Elders, this query arises in my mind: "Who is sufficient for these things?" For such weighty services, the sufficiency must be of God, or the work cannot be rightly done. For without a Divine perception, they cannot be qualified to discern, and give the living child to the right mother. And if there is not wisdom and skill to use the snufflers with judgment and discretion, they may extinguish the light when they ought only to remove that which obstructs its brightness, that it may shine with greater clearness. If the selection for this weighty service is made in and by the Church (Acts 1: 15-26) when under the Divine influence, no doubt but the right will be named, and the lot rest upon the rightly qualified; and these, "dwelling in that which gives ability to labor in the Church of Christ, can speak a word in season to them that are ready to faint."

On looking over the advices of our Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders in the year 1755, I find the following lines, which appear to me worthy to be transcribed, and with which I close this little essay, viz: "And when the Elders appointed to assist them and have the oversight of the flock, have faithfully followed the heavenly leadings, they have been as Aaron and Hur to the ministry, in strengthening their hands to war with the enemies of God's Israel, and leading the people on their way from victory to victory over their enemies into the dominion of Truth."

MARY MITCHELL.

Eighth Month, 1807.

Reprinted, 1888.

The writer of the above was a member and minister of the Society of Friends, who lived during the last twenty-two years of her life on the Island of Nantucket. She was the wife of Joseph Mitchell, an esteemed Friend, who had a gift in the ministry, and traveled in Truth's service—an uncle of our late valued Friend, Peleg Mitchell.

What Nan Could Do.

Nan was in the cozy sitting-room, her rosy face resting in her hands, watching the bright tongues of flame in the cheerful fireplace, now darting up in spiral beauty, only to fade away again in a tiny volume of smoke.

"I'm just like them!" she exclaimed, slowly. "I try to do something to be useful, and sometimes I can never accomplish anything."

"If we do the best we can," reproved Grandmother, gently, "we are not the ones to measure the good we do!"

"I—suppose—so," said Nan, slowly, "but then, what can a girl no older than I do? If I had money I might establish reading-rooms for the poor, or lunch counters, where poor working girls could get a nice warm lunch without paying anything for it, or something else really worth doing."

"Never mind, child, there are things you can do just as worthy as those you mention—things, too, that perhaps nobody else could possibly do."

Just then the warning bell rang, and with a kiss Nan gathered up her books and hurried away to school.

All the morning she kept thinking of Grandmother's remark, "Things that perhaps nobody else could possibly do."

"I wonder what that can be?" and Nan rested her serious little face in her hands, with her elbows on the desk.

As she was standing near the cloak-room door at recess, she overheard Maud Atkins refer to Beth Johnson's grief at her mother's death.

"I pity her," said Maud, "but I don't feel that I can do anything for her: she's not of our set. Her mother has done our washing for years, you see—that's how I happened to know of her."

Nan turned, and as she did so she saw Beth, who hadn't left her seat at recess, with a mournfully pinched face, fondly regarding a tiny plain gold ring, worn very thin.

"Her mother's," thought Nan.

Quietly slipping to her side, Nan took one little hand in hers, and when the girls came back to their seats at the ringing of the bell, Beth's face wore its first smile since her mother's death.

All the remainder of the session Nan felt happy. "I guess it's what Grandmother meant," she thought.

The next day, and the next, she found some little way to help, all unconsciously, somebody about her. The old colored janitor felt pleased all day long at the smile with which she greeted him as she passed him in the entry.

"Bless her; she's a sunshine ray fo' sure," he murmured, as he closed the door behind her.

The teacher, as Nan took her hand and bade her good night, felt the cares of the day grow lighter and her work less irksome.

"I tell you, Nan," said her brother Ted one morning, as she whispered to him not to mind the weather, for another day would surely come in which he could try his new bicycle, "you do a fellow good just by your sympathy. I'd advise you, little sister, to put out your card—'Sympathy Bureau! conducted by Nan Armstrong, who is always ready to sympathize with any one in trouble. Office hours, from morning till bedtime.' And as for pay—"

"Pay! O Ted," interrupted Nan, smiling, "that comes without asking. Ever since I've tried to be kind and helpful to others—"

"You've found," broke in Grandmother Allen, "a joyful, contented little self all the time—and that there are some things that nobody else could possibly do!"—Zions Herald.

Richard Davies.

[In a mention of meetings lately held at Welshpool, Wales, there is given in the London Friend a picture of the jail in which Richard Davies was confined, and the following account of him:]

Richard Davies, in the record of his "convincement, exercises, services, and travels," gives a lively account of the spreading of the Truth in North Wales. This work is now being republished by John Edward Southall, of Newport, Monmouthshire, and shows what the Children of Light endured in early times. Richard Davies was a hatter in Welshpool. When he appeared before Lord Herbert with his hat on, his lordship was told that he was a Quaker, a haberdasher of hats; and Lord Herbert replied, "Oh! I thought he was such an one, he keeps his hat so fast upon the block." Nevertheless, the priest who was with the nobleman was so drunk that Lord Herbert, who was a very big, fat man, wisely preferred leaning on the arm of Richard Davies to the uncertain hand of the high professor.

On another occasion Justice Corbett told Richard Davies and his friends that "If they would go to church and hear Divine service they should be discharged." Richard informed the justice that the last time he was at their church he was turned out, and might suffer the same treatment if he went there again. The justice forthwith entered into an engagement that if he would go to church "he should not be turned out." The Friend then replied, "I know nothing to the contrary, but that I will come there." The justice was satisfied, but the bailiff said, "Mr. Corbett, do you think that the old Quaker will come to Church except to disturb our minister?" Justice Corbett asked Richard Davies whether he would disturb the minister. He answered: "If God puts something into my heart to speak to the people, I hope they will not impose upon me to hold my peace." "God forbid they should do so!" replied the justice, and Richard Davies entered into an engagement to go to the steeple-house, and the three prisoners were discharged. The report spread that the Quaker would go to church.

"The next First-day, when the bells began to ring, Thomas Lloyd, Samuel Lloyd, and Richard Davies proceeded to the steeple-house. Richard Davies "took his Bible under his arm,"* and went to Justice Corbett's house, and asked him whether he was also coming. The prudent justice replied that he was "not disposed to come that day, but would send his man to see that the Friends were not affronted." So the three Friends went, and sat in a pew opposite the pulpit. But there was only the curate to read common prayer, and there was a great multitude of people, more than had been at church for several years.

Richard Davies said nothing until the curate had finished, and then stood up and said to the people: "I suppose you are not ignorant of the cause of our coming here this day. The magistrates of the town came to our meeting, and found us upon our knees praying to Almighty God. They were civil while we were at prayer, and when we had done they took our names and committed us three to prison, most of the rest that were at the meeting being prisoners before. And the magistrates told us if we would come to church we should be discharged, and now you see we are come, according to their desire. But I find that your priest is not here, and now I would have you to inform him that I say, 'If he proves this to be the true Church of Christ, and that he is a true minister of Christ, and that his maintenance is a gospel maintenance, and this worship of yours to be the true worship of God, then we will be of your religion and come again to you. But if he proves not this, then we must conclude your Church to be a false Church, and he to be no true minister of Christ, that his maintenance is no gospel maintenance, and that your worship is not the true worship of God.'"

The people said: "If Mr. Langford (which was the priest's name) will not prove us to be the true Church of Christ, and our worship to be the true worship, then we will pay him no more tithes."

In the evening the Friends went again, and, the clergyman being present, Richard Davies, after the conclusion of the service, repeated his queries. But the clergyman turned his back, and went away and gave no answer. Richard Davies then preached to the people outside in the graveyard, and the Lord's presence, life, and power were with him.

*Such straws as this have been seized upon with much avidity by modern introducers of Bible readings into what for two and a half centuries was Friends' mode of public worship. There is no sign in the ancient chaining of a Bible to a spot in one meeting-room, or in an early Friends' having a Bible with him for verifying texts on occasions of public disputation, that the practice of Friends in their meetings for Divine worship included any outward reading.

Justice Corbett says he was "very sorry Mr. Langford was so uncivil and did not answer the queries, which he thought were very reasonable." One of the neighbors said: "Mr. Corbett, we think you will be a Quaker, too." He replied, "I wish I were a Quaker in my life and conversation."

Meetings continued to be held for forty years at Cloddie-Cochion, some two miles out of Welshpool. At Cloddie is the Friends' graveyard, with fine old trees around it, and here Richard Davies was buried. It is in an exquisitely beautiful and sequestered glen, hid among the hills. The meeting-room is still there in the old farmhouse, and the flags are still on the floor in the kitchen in which the meetings were held. Lovely views are obtainable from the windows, and the whole surroundings breathe an atmosphere of peace and repose.

Items Concerning the Society.

Our Friends, Jonathan E. Rhoads and Joseph S. Elkinton, completed their visit among the villages in the North and South Colonies, and were at Yorkton on the 17th inst. They were then starting for the settlement in Saskatchewan, and were well.

A writer in the London Friend reports ninety-nine as speaking in the business sessions of their late Yearly Meeting, at an average between three and four times each. Of these six spoke from ten to sixteen times each.

A letter from Canada of Sixth Month 27th says "Our Yearly Meeting is just over, and we had a remarkably favored one; although few in numbers our hearts were greatly comforted, as it now appears as though the mantles of the fathers and mothers in Israel are falling upon the sons and daughters. There were no strangers present, which made us feel there were none to look unto but the Lord alone, and grace and strength and help were mercifully given, and the meeting closed under a precious solemnity."

Eliza H. Varney expected to leave home near the middle of this month to spend some time among the Doukhobors at the colonies and at Good Spirit Lake. A cousin of hers (not a member among Friends) expects to go with her, and to keep a school for the Doukhobor children, in order to teach them, without pecuniary compensation, to speak English and read and write. E. H. Varney adds, "I wish other young women who want a summer's outing would go and do likewise." Last year they expressed hope that Eliza H. Varney would return and "bring some good young woman with her to teach their children."

Many of our readers in and about Philadelphia, who so long knew our friend Hugh D. Vail as a teacher, a business and a scientific man, will regret to learn that he departed this life on the twenty eighth of last month at his home in Santa Barbara California, whither he removed with his family in 1881. "His life," says the Santa Barbara Mornin' Press, "had been well spent, devoted to the happiness and well-being of those about him. He gave willingly of his time and means for the public good, never seeking emoluments, and to his memory Santa Barbara owes a debt of gratitude." On the subjects of astronomy and meteorology "he was widely quoted as an authority, and his local weather reports, most carefully and accurately kept, and with which all are familiar, have been of untold value to the city."

The proposed "Uniform Discipline" is now coming before the successive larger Yearly Meetings for their adoption, having already passed New England Yearly Meeting. Its salient points, as shown The Interchange, are as follows:

[1] THE FIVE YEARS' MEETING. This has no direct authority over the Yearly Meetings. Even the matter of Discipline every Yearly Meeting at adopts the 'Uniform Discipline' has a right to a year's consideration to adopt any amendment to it that it chooses, and this amendment, as explained by a member of the sub-committee New England Yearly Meeting will go into effect once, only it must be reported to the next Five Years' Meeting for its consideration and advice, which may or may not be accepted by the Yearly Meeting. The new feature in this Five Year's Meeting is in its permanent Committees. These are made up of members appointed by the several Yearly Meetings, and report to the central body. Great care has been taken to guard the rights of the individual Yearly Meetings, but there is no doubt that the general tendency is toward centralization. [2] THE MEMBERSHIP OF CHILDREN BY BIRTHRIGHT. These will hereafter be Associate Members, until such time as there shall be a personal profession of faith in Christ as a Saviour and acceptance of the views of Friends, the child birthright member is to make application in the usual way for membership. Monthly meetings are at liberty if they deem best to drop from their list members such as have reached the age of majority without having made a profession. [3] THE PROCESS OF ACKNOWLEDGING MINISTERS instead of retching over one Quarterly Meeting as now, will not come to the Monthly Meeting till after it has been twice before the Quarterly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight, which is to have a committee appointed to examine into the question carefully. From the Monthly Meeting it goes to the Quarterly Meeting at large. [4] THE ELDERS are to be appointed for three years, and as far as possible there is to be rotation in office allowed, by a third of the number having their term expire every year. [5] THE MEETING ON MINISTRY AND OVERSIGHT in each meeting to be, unless a special committee is appointed, the Pastoral body of the Monthly Meeting. [6] THE CALLING OF PASTORS is provided for. [7] NO PART OF THE DISCIPLINE INAPPLICABLE to existing conditions in any Yearly Meeting is to be null therein. [8] EVERY YEARLY MEETING IS THE FINAL COURT to decide the meaning of any portion of the discipline for itself. [9] There is no provision made for answering the Queries. [10] THE NAME OF THE DENOMINATION as given in the New Discipline is either the Society of Friends nor Friend's Church, but 'THE FRIENDS.'

Notes from Others.

The Churchman says: "For our civilization there is no ideal that is not spiritual, and no spirituality that is not of Christ."

The Zulu Bible, translated by the missionaries of the American Board in Natal, is being circulated much more widely than ever before.

"Take religion out of scholarship and the key-note falls from the arch. Make religion an elective study, and it will soon cease to be the informing principle of education."—Conaty.

The Morning Star says: "The recognition of the comparative excellence of the character of Jesus Christ and of the respect due Him as a teacher of spiritual truths has gone far ahead of the merely materialistic growth of Christianity."

The Missionary Herald says: "It is not without reason that many benevolent and educational bodies are protesting loudly against the excessive inheritance tax imposed by government upon bequests made to religious and public institutions."

G. W. Shinn says in the North American Review: "Men of our day have overlooked retribution in seeking to get rid of materialistic notions concerning hell. The time has come to recall the awful fact of retribution. But it must be done discreetly and always with those exceptions in mind which so greatly modify it."

Protap Chunder Mozoomdar says in an article on the "Dispensation of the Spirit" in the Christian Register: "There is something graven on your own moral nature from which you judge that the government of the world is a moral government, that wickedness shall surely bring its own retribution, and goodness, though secret, shall find its reward."

We oppose militarism. It means conquest abroad and intimidation and oppression at home. It means the strong arm, which has ever been fatal to free institutions. It is what millions of our citizens have fled from in Europe. It will impose upon our peace-loving people a large standing army, an unnecessary burden of taxation and a constant menace to their liberties.—Democratic Platform (which, however, approves of war).

THAT FALSE WORD REVEREND AGAIN.—(Special to the N. Y. World): "RICHMOND, Va., June 21st.—The Rev. J. E. Roane Riddick, the Methodist preacher who shot and killed Dr. Wm. H. Temple, was put to work in the penitentiary to-day. He is to serve three years there. His head has been shaved and he has donned the striped garb of the convict. Riddick will work in the tailoring department, and will assist in making clothes for the prisoners. He is one of the greatest revivalists in the Methodist Church in this State, and it is expected he will often conduct religious services for his fellow-convicts."

CHINESE NAMES.—An acknowledged authority on the pronunciation of Chinese names as transliterated into English assures us that there need be no serious difficulty in sounding the many Chinese names now appearing in the newspapers if the speaker will remember that the vowels in these names are uniformly those of the Italian or Continental alphabet, namely: (1) A always about as a in far; e always approximately as e in they or then; i very like i in machine or pin; o as either the o of song or how, and u always as the u in rule. (2) Also, it should be remembered, every syllable has an independent value and should be given that value in pronunciation. (3) As for consonants, they are pronounced exactly as written. These three rules will secure as correct a pronunciation of Chinese names as can be secured without oral instruction.

The authorship of Hebrews has perplexed Bible students ever since the Reformation, yea, since pre-Reformation times. The chief cause of the perplexity is the absence of any superscription or signature. All the other New Testament Epistles, with the single exception of 1 John, begin with the name or the office of the writer. In 1 John, the personality of the writer is so transparent in the style that there can be virtually no question but that the beloved disciple wrote it.

But with the Hebrews it is different. It can hardly be proved that an apostle wrote it. This conclusion Luther arrived at after a careful study of Heb. ii: 3. But that a Jew wrote it is undeniable. The perfect familiarity of the writer with Mosaic types is sufficient proof of this. But though of Jewish blood he [or she, for Harnack suggests that Priscilla wrote it], must have been a devout Christian, for there is not within the limits of the New Testament a more noble and beautiful interpretation of the office and work of Christ. It may be regarded as an introduction to Leviticus, and, more still, an inspired commentary on the whole Mosaic dispensation. But no matter whether a woman or a man was employed in its production; the Spirit of God wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews.—The Mennonite.

MISSIONS TAKING THE SWORD TO PERISH BY THE SWORD.—The Church Standard says: "The missionaries not only enter China as foreigners, but their missions, without exception, remain to all intents and purposes foreign establishments, which is all sorts of blunders rolled into one. It keeps them ever before the eyes and minds of the people as foreigners, with a menacing of foreign gunboats behind."

To the same purport appears the following from the British Friend: "Lord Salisbury on the 19th ult. delivered an address to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, which we would gladly quote in full did space allow. Some have thought he was pouring cold water on foreign missions, but nothing, we are sure, was further from his intention. As we read his words, he was urging, and that in a most impressive way, the terrible consequences that ensue when missionaries trust to the secular arm of force to protect and to avenge them. In early days, he said, an evangelist 'faced the difficulties, he underwent the martyrdom, he braved the torments to which he was exposed, and the whole of the great moral and spiritual influence of his self-devotion acted without hindrance upon the people whom he addressed. But now, if a Boniface or a Columba is exposed to these martyrdoms, the result is an appeal to the consul and the mission of the gunboat. . . . They have a proverb in the East, 'first the missionary, then the consul, then the general,' and that as a matter of fact has too often been the case. . . . This cannot be avoided; but do not hide from yourselves that it is a great hindrance to your work, and that while secular results of this character follow from the results of Christian teaching, a Christian faith, a Christian cross does not shine upon the people of the world with unblemished splendor.' These are true words. The Chinese have too much cause for looking on missions as simply traps laid by the Powers they hate, to get an excuse for grabbing their land. Would that all Christian missionaries would adopt the line of action which we are assured our own will use, if attacked, and refuse not only to defend themselves by force, but to appeal to their Government either for aid or vengeance."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The note which has been addressed by the United States government to the European Powers, respecting its attitude towards China, has been made public. It states: "The purpose of the President is, as it has been heretofore, to act concurrently with the other Powers, first, in opening up communication with Peking and rescuing the American officials, missionaries and other Americans who are in danger; secondly, in affording all possible protection everywhere in China to American life and property; thirdly, in guarding and protecting all legitimate American interests, and, fourthly, in aiding to prevent a spread of the disorders to the other provinces of the empire and a recurrence of such disasters."

Wu Ting Fang, the Chinese Minister to this country, has delivered to Secretary Hay a copy of a cablegram from the Chinese Imperial Government, disclaiming responsibility of the Imperial Government for the "Boxer" troubles and asserting that the engagement at Tien-Tsin was the direct result of the bombardment of the Taku forts by the foreigners. These forts are said to have been under the control of regular Chinese troops, and not under that of the "Boxers."

A missionary recently returned from China to Philadelphia, says of the "Boxers": "In organizing their societies they appealed to the spiritualistic and superstitious side of the people, and claimed that those joining the societies would be invulnerable to knives and rifle bullets. They taught also that foreigners were coming to seize the land, and when it is remembered that all missionaries are looked on in a measure as agents of their foreign government, sent out as spies, the reason for hostilities is largely explained."

The Calcium, one of the fleet engaged in bringing cryolite to Philadelphia from Greenland has arrived here after a voyage of forty days. She is the first vessel to arrive since the Arctic winter set in, in the Tenth Month last. There are three other bark in the so-called cryolite fleet, and three more are building to meet the increasing demands for the Greenland product, which is converted into soda ash and other soda chemicals in this city.

At the close of the war in 1865 the debt of the United States was nearly three hundred millions of dollars. In the space of thirty years there was paid of that sum over two thousand millions of the principal, twenty-five hundred millions of interest and one hundred and eighteen millions of premium, making a total of four thousand five hundred millions of dollars paid in thirty years, or at the rate of one hundred and fifty millions a year.

Pennsylvania produced of pig iron in 1899, 6,542,998 gross tons, or more than 70 per cent. of the entire production of Great Britain, over 48 per cent. of the production of the United States, and over 94 per cent. in excess of her production in 1894.

Reports from the drought-stricken sections of Arizona are to the effect that every water hole and most of the wells have gone dry. In consequence cattle are dying by the thousands.

In the island of Hawaii immense subterranean streams of water have been uncovered from 1,500 to 2,000 feet above the sea level. This water will be flumed down to the sugar plantations at lower elevations, affording an abundance for irrigation.

There were 633 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 89 more than the previous week and 151 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 321 were males and 312 females; 65 died of consumption; 36 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 21 of apoplexy; 17 of diphtheria, and 25 of cancer. There were 33 cases and 3 deaths from scarlet fever, and 27 cases of typhoid fever and 11 deaths.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 103 to 104; 3's, 108½ to 109; 4's, 114½ to 115½; new 4's, 134 to 134½; 5's, 113½ to 113¾.

COTTON closed on a basis of 10¼c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.50 to $2.65; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.70 to $3.85; Western winter, straight, $3.75 to $4.00; spring, straight, $4.00 to $4.20; city mills, straight, $3.75 to $4.00. RYE FLOUR—$3.20 to $3.50 per bbl., as to quality, the latter for fancy Western patent.

GRAIN—No. 2 red wheat, 75 to 75½c.

No. 2 mixed corn, 48½ to 48¾c.

No. 2 white oats, 31 to 31½c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5¼ to 5½c.; good 5½ to 5¾c.; medium, 5¾ to 5¾c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4¼ to 5c.; good, 4½ to 4¾c.; common, 2 to 3c.; spring lambs, 5 to 7½c.

HOGS.—7½ to 8c. for best Western; others, 7½ to 7¾c.

FOREIGN.—The origin of the "Boxers" is thus explained by the Privy Council in Peking in a public decree: "In the first place there arose in the provinces of Chih-Li and Shan-Tung a kind of rebellious subjects, who had been in the habit of practicing boxing and fencing in their respective villages, and at the same time clothing their doings with spiritualistic and strange rites. The local authorities failed to take due notice of them at the time. Accordingly, the infection spread with astonishing rapidity. Within the space of a month it seemed to make its appearance everywhere, and finally even reached the capital itself. Everyone looked upon the movement as supernatural and strange, and many joined it. Then there were lawless and treacherous persons, who sounded the cry of 'down with Christianity.' About the middle of the Fifth Moon these persons began to create disturbances without warning. Churches were burned and converts were killed. The whole city was in a ferment. A situation was created which could not be brought under control."

Although the news from China of recent date is not regarded as entirely authentic, yet the general impression from concurrent reports is that all the foreigners in Peking including the European ministers and their attaches have been killed. They had been defended by some of the regular Chinese troops, which were finally overpowered by the "Boxers." Wholesale massacres in different parts of China of native Christians continue. The Americans at Shanghai have united in an appeal to their fellow citizens at home, setting forth their precarious condition.

A despatch of the 13th inst., from Tien-Tsin says "that 7,000 of the allied troops attempted on that day to storm the walls of the city which was defended by Chinese troops estimated to number 20,000. Great loss of life has resulted."

According to one of the Shanghai correspondents, "there is war between the Dowager Empress and Prince Tuan. In a recent edict the latter boldly discards his mask, and signs himself as Emperor. He warmly commends the prowess of 'his faithful Boxers,' and in flowery language appeals to their cupidity and fanaticism."

The newly signed reciprocity arrangement between the United States and Germany names the articles upon which Germany secures a reduction of duties. The amount of the reductions in each case is fixed in the Dingley act. In return the United States secures the most favored nation treatment, or, in other words, the minimum tariff rates on articles exported to Germany. Germany has several tariffs, one reserved for commercial friends and the others for nations with which the relations are not so close.

It is thought nearly 50,000 Japanese troops will be sent to China. The Japanese press asserts that a large measure of responsibility for the troubles rests upon Russia and Germany, because of their arbitrary action in China.

General rain has fallen over nearly all India during the past few days, and the prospects of the crops have greatly improved. The famine areas have generally been benefited.

While it is said that peace prevails in the Philippines, the situation continues to be feverish and threatening. Rumors are reaching Manila in regard to the whereabouts and operations of Aguinaldo, and a number of proclamations by the Filipino chieftain have appeared recently inciting the Tagals to continue their struggle for independence and freedom.

Kangaroos which used to be a plague in Australia, are now getting so scarce that it pays to raise them in herds.

The demand for wheat flour throughout the Orient is rapidly increasing, the best points of consumption at present are the Russian possessions in Northern China and Eastern Siberia.

Severe earthquakes in the Kars and Kargyrmand districts of the Caucasus Mountains have resulted in the destruction of five villages and many houses. Additional shocks are still being reported.

Bethlehem, a town in the Orange River Colony, held by the Boer Commander DeWet, has been captured by the British. It is said that a feeling of submission prevails among the Boers.

Twelve samples of Japanese coal have been received by the War Department for test. So far as the tests have gone they have demonstrated that the coal compares favorably with the product of American coal mines.

A despatch from Accra, Gold Coast Colony, of the 12th inst., says: "Sir Frederick Mitchell Hodgson, Governor of the colony, who recently arrived here, after having been besieged at Kumassi by rebellious tribesmen, and who bears signs of the hardships and privations to which he has been subjected, in the course of an interview said he considered his escape the most marvelous on record. He attributed its success to the secrecy maintained concerning the route chosen. The carriers who accompanied him became so weakened by starvation that everything was abandoned, and the party subsisted upon plantains. They endured great hardships. Fortunately the rains were not heavy. Had it been otherwise all would probably have succumbed."

RECEIPTS.

Unless otherwise specified, two dollars have been received from each person, paying for vot. 74.

Mary Randolph, Phila.; Mary Ann Haines, N. J.; Josiah A. Roberts, Penna.; Thamine M. Haines, for A. Engle Haines, N. J.; Mary A. Osborne, Ind.; Alice H. Carter, N. J., $6 for herself, Sarah C. Satterthwaite, Pa., and Sarah Ellen Carter, O.; David J. Brown, Phila.; Thomas S. Pike, N. J.; Martha Mickle, N. J.; Daniel Paeker, N. J.; George P. Stokes, N. J.; Hugh Foulke, Phila., $4 for himself and Susan Y. Foulke, Pa.; Henry Haines, Phila., $6 for himself, Hartie L. Deacon, Kty., and Newbold R. Haines, Phila.; William G. England, Nova Scotia; Charles Darnell, N. J.; Elizabeth C. Dunn, N. J.; Joseph Warner Jones, Pa.; Joshua T. Ballinger, N. J.; Rebecca A. Cox, N. J.; Ellen L. Lightfoot, Pa.; Mary C. Satterthwaite, Pa., per S. E. Satterthwaite; Ruth Anna Sharpless, Pa.; John Bishop, N. J.; Ruth Anna Harned, N. J.; William Bishop, N. J.; Tacy M. Bines, Phila.; J. Elwood Hancock, N. J., $6 for himself, Robert Taylor and Elizabeth Ann Aaronson; William Biddle, Jr., Pa.; Mary S. Walton, Pa.; A. F. Huston, Pa., and for Elizabeth B. Calley; James G. Biddle, G'tn; John W. Biddle, Pa.; Anne E. Howell, G'tn, and for Aubrey Howell; Samuel L. Fox, Pa.; Sophia R. Pusey, Pa.; Susanna S. Kite, G'tn; R. T. Osborn and for E. L. Post, N. Y.; W. H. Gibbons and for Sean Miller, Pa.; Thomas K. Wilbur, agent, Mass., $14 for himself, Isabel L. Gifford, Sarah E. Mitchell, Jesse Tucker, James H. Tucker, Job S. Gidley and John S. Wright; William C. Reeve and for Hannah H. Acton, N. J.; Henry B. Leeds, agent, N. J., $50 for Ebenezer Roberts, M. and R. Matlack, Sallie A. Kaighn, S. N. and A. B. Warrington, William Matlack, Joseph H. Matlack, Margaret C. Venable, Elizabeth G. Buzby, William E. Darnell, Anna W. Hooton, Miriam L. Roberts, Edwin R. Bell, Uriah Borton, Howard H. Bell, Henrietta

Haines, Allen H. Roberts, Beulah S. Leeds, Isaac I. Roberts, Mary Anna Matlack, Allen Maxwell, Id. Deborah W. Buzby $6 for herself, William M. Winne and Walter S. Reeve, N. Newlin Stokes, M. D., $4 for himself and Gideon Contant, O.; George Jones, Phila. and for Charles C. Haines, N. J.; Ephraim Smith Phila. $12.50 for himself, Morris S. Cope, Elizabeth Hughes, Pa., Joel J. Smith, Ia., Dr. L. M. Williams, Cal. and Henrietta Green, Ireland.

Remittances received after Third-day noon will not appear in the Receipts until the following week.

NOTICES.

A YOUNG woman Friend wishes to engage for the position of housekeeper. Add. "H," Office of THE FRIEND.

WANTED.—A young man to assist in a grocery store one who has had some experience preferred.

Address "K," Office of THE FRIEND.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—A stated meeting of the Committee on Admissions will be held at Fourth and Arch Streets, on Seventh-day, the 28th instant at 10 A. M. JOHN W. BIDDLE, Clerk.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. 16th St., Phila.—During the Seventh and Eighth Months the Library will be open on Second and Fifth-day afternoons from 3 P. M. to 6 P. M.

DIED, at her residence, Twelfth Month 1st, 1899 Betsy ANN COPELAND, widow of the late Deme Copeland, in the ninety-third year of her age; she was an elder of Piny Woods Monthly Meeting of Friends, a firm believer in the orthodox principles of the Society of which she was a member. We have the consoling belief that her end was peaceful, after many years of suffering and feeble health, at his home in West Branch, Iowa, Fifth Month 12th, 1900, ERICH KNUDSON, a beloved member and minister of West Branch Monthly Meeting (of conservative) Friends, in the eighty-seventh year of his age. Almost from a child he was deeply impressed with the value of spiritual things, and in early manhood, while yet in his native country, Norway, he was convinced of the principles of Friends, and was concerned to be governed thereby. He came to the United States in 1839, and not long after became united with Friends at a Salem Monthly Meeting, Iowa. Laboring industriously to provide things honest in the sight of a man, his conduct harmonizing with the simple Quaker faith he had espoused, the life he manifested in his general surroundings, as well as among Friends, was marked and acknowledged by those who best knew him, as eminently that of the Christian. He felt called to bear public testimony to the mercy of God through Christ Jesus; was particularly favored in the service, especially among a large number of Norwegians. Many of them looked to him as a father for council and help in many ways, several of whom became members of the Society of Friends. His gift in the ministry was recorded by the aforesaid Monthly Meeting in 1867. His long-continued appreciation of the gospel of Christ was evident till the time of his departure. His widow, and only daughter, as well as his numerous friends, sensible of their bereavement, thankfully recognize that the savor of his life will long remain as a precious heritage. The words of Truth being applicable, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth, yea, saith the spirit that they may rest from their labors and their works do follow them."

at her home in West Chester, Fourth Month 6th, 1900, ANNA M. TOWNSEND, in the seventy-sixth year of her age. There is no doubt that through the mercy and atoning blood of our precious Saviour, this dear Friend, who through her early life endured much suffering, is now among those whom the evangelist John saw surrounding the throne. When, besides other beautiful Scripture declarations, this was quoted to her: "It is through much tribulation ye enter into the kingdom," she would reply in her hopeful, Christian faith, "I do not see the tribulation." She was much beloved by a large circle of friends, especially by the young.

on the fifth of Fifth Month, 1900, RACHE M. SHARPLESS, wife of Casper T. Sharpless, member of Chester Monthly Meeting, N. J., in th fifty-fifth year of her age.

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, SEVENTH MONTH 28, 1900.

No. 2.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,

(South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth,) PHILADELPHIA.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

A Gospel Divorced from its Peace.

There is a disposition in some quarters to blame the missionaries with the present outbreak in China. Blind fanaticism in that land may confound them with all foreign invaders indiscriminately, but we cannot join with those who would heap the chief responsibility on those self-sacrificing workers. Those lusts of gain and of empire in men, from which wars and fightings come, have indeed caused the missionaries to be misunderstood as spies, fore-runners and agents of a war-making Christendom, insinuating themselves in advance to undermine the ancient traditions of the empire. But it is aggressive covetousness of others, backed up by arms, that has forced the Chinese to read war between the lines of such gospel as was preached unto them. And yet the missionaries had the opportunity, had the Christendom that sent them believed in the doctrine, to have made their learners read peace and not war;—to have assured them that the undivided interest of the Christian missionary is the kingdom of one whose teaching was, "My kingdom is not of this world, else would my servants fight."

While the covetous encroachment of nations as naturally, to the Chinese mind, made missions mean war; and while some missions may have taught the same thing by appealing to the military arm to sustain their foothold within the empire; yet it is not because too much of Christianity was taught that war found entrance, but rather because not enough of it was taught. If the part that is usually omitted had been consistently taught, it would have disarmed suspicion against the missionaries, at least. To this extent only—the error of omission rather than of commission—may we hold missionaries, along with their churches at home that taught them, responsible. Had modern Christianity faithfully represented that of the disciples of the first two centuries, whose brave answer was, "I am a Christian. Therefore I cannot fight!" Christians need not have been understood in China as the pioneers of gunboats and bombshells.

We do not say that Christians before savage men would invariably escape massacre by abstaining from carnal weapons and appealing to the protection of the Prince of Peace alone. Yet, as a rule, marvellous has been the protection of such as have done so. The blood of some martyrs of Peace may be expected to fall to the ground as the seed of the Church of the Prince of Peace. The testimony of some missionaries of such a gospel may be blessed and confirmed by being sealed with their lives. But how soon would the carnal sword drop from hands unnerved by the sword of Love in the spirit of those whom they were slaughtering! Such passive bravery for Christ's sake is courage with its eyes open. Enmity could not stand before it.

But let every breath of blame be hushed towards those volunteers for Christ who willingly took their lives in their hands to labor among a benighted people. We arraign not them but the Christendom which kept back a part from their outfit for the work—the peace-making part of the whole counsel of Christ. Was not his warning enough, when one tried to defend his cause by the sword, that a Christianity that takes the sword shall perish by the sword? Never will the free triumph of the Christian faith among the nations appear, till the weapons of its warfare are not carnal.

Mistakes of Love.

A father was recently telling us that at a certain time he was pushing hard at a log to roll it over, when his little boy seeing his efforts and wishing to help his father, ran up to the other side of the log and pushed with all his might, though the way he pushed was the opposite way. He thought he was helping his father. Being called to the other side he then pushed along with his father, where it would help, "but," said the father, "I loved him just as much, whichever way he pushed."

A mother busy at her sewing was called away by some visitors. Her little girl wishing out of love to make up for her mother's interruption, plied the needle at the garment as vigorously as she knew how. The mother on returning found the stitches made anywhere, long or short, over all the crumpled and disordered material, requiring more time than she could spare to pick out the stitches, and undo the labor of love. But joy rather than vexation was made in the mother's heart by her daughter's saying, "I tried to help you because I love you so!" The little girl in a few hours falling ill, the next day she died; and the mother keeps that spoiled garment just as her little daughter left it, full of those most precious errors which she can see only as a legacy of love.

There is one consolation about our imperfect work of faith and labor of love, that whereas the Almighty can do his own work far better than his willing children can, yet whatever may be the mistakes which their love makes, love itself is no mistake; and far more acceptable to our Father is our love with any of our blunders made in love, than the most correct work of our own wisdom or righteousness without love.

But though true love is the highest success of the soul and no mistake, and though it may cover a multitude of errors, it could hardly be love if it lapsed into an indifference to error and engendered slipshod work. Love is the fulfilling of the law, and will be concerned to do its best. It rejoices in the truth, and rejoices not in iniquity or error. The zeal of those children was according to their knowledge, and their will taken for the deed.

In passing over the country among professed Friends, we behold errors. Some are pushing the wrong way, but are doing it in love. They have consulted their first impulse rather than the Father's voice. He is bringing by his voice some over to the right side, to be workers together with Him, not because of their early error but because their heart is right towards Him. He still would say: "I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, when thou wentest after me in the wilderness, in a land that was not sown." And as for ourselves, when we remember the errors of our youth, and the long process of gradual correction since, and how the mistakes of love were not treated with condemnation, we are brought into a measure of the same mind towards those who from our standpoint seem to be working erroneously. The Lord is our common judge, and looks at the integrity of the heart rather than at the perfection of our work. What must be perfected He would do himself; but He leaves practicing exercises to his children for their training and discipline: when one is a child, expecting him to think as a child and speak as a child, but when better developed to put away childish things, but not a childlike spirit towards Him.

In our zeal for the correctness of doctrine and practice let it be for the truth and against error unflinchingly, but have no part in personal condemnation, till we are able to judge as the righteous Judge can of the sincerity and love of those who would serve Him.

Silent Worship.

Wm. Penn said, "Love silence even of the mind." Another has said, "Silence is the element in which great things fashion themselves." J. R. Miller, of Philadelphia, a minister of the Presbyterian persuasion, in his "Silent Times" says, "In Wellesly College a special feature of the daily life of the household is the morning and evening silent times. Both at the opening and closing of the day, there is a brief period marked by the strokes of a bell, in which all the house is quiet. Every pupil is in her room. There is no conversation. No step is heard in the corridors. The whole great house with its thronging life is as quiet as if all its hundreds of inmates were sleeping."

Every true Christian life needs its daily silent times when all shall be still, when the busy activities of other hours shall cease, and when the heart in holy touch shall commune with God. One of the greatest needs of Christian life in these days is more devotion. Ours is not an age of prayer so much as an age of work. The tendency is to action, rather than to worship; to busy toil rather than to quiet sitting at the Saviour's feet to commune with Him."

Similar to this custom of Wellesly college was that of the excellent Mary Lyon, founder of Mount Holyoke Seminary. She required each of her pupils to spend a given period of each day in their own rooms, in silence; no study, no reading even in the Bible except as they might wish to refer to a text which had impressed their mind, and it has been said she was wont to remark "that there were more conversions from that silent half hour, than from any other religious service."

"This, this is the worship the Saviour made known,
When she of Samaria found Him;
By the patriarch's well, sitting weary alone,
With the stillness of noontide around Him.

"How sublime, yet how simple the homage He taught
To her, who inquired by that fountain,
If Jehovah, at Solyma's shrine would be taught?
Or adored in Samaria's mountain?"

"God is a spirit, they who aright
Would perform the pure worship He loveth,
In the heart's holy temple will seek, with delight,
That Spirit the Father approveth."

THE CONVICTION OF THE UNSEEN.—Death is a very successful teacher of that faith we all long to possess—the conviction of the unseen. We may play with the arguments against another life when our affections are neutral, and may even pretend that the case is not proven. Let one of our flesh and blood bid us farewell and pass within the veil, and reason surrenders the place to love. A young child with Christ does more to illuminate the other world than all the books that ever have been written, and it has often come to pass that at the touch of this unseen hand, hard and skeptical men have arisen and set their faces toward God, for the hope of seeing again a golden head on which the sun was ever shining.—Watson.

For "THE FRIEND."

Canada Yearly Meeting.

Canada Yearly Meeting of Friends convened on the 26th ult. The number of Friends present was smaller than usual, nor were there present any ministering Friends from other Yearly Meetings, a favor for which our hearts in former years have been truly thankful, but He who is Head over all and who by his love constrains his servants to visit this portion of his heritage, was not unmindful of us to bless us by his promised presence, and our hearts were renewedly cemented together in the bonds of gospel love, and ere its close our souls were clothed in garments of gratitude and praise to the Giver of every good and perfect gift, who never passes by unheeded the feeblest cry of his needy children, but openeth wide his hand to scatter blessings in his path.

Our dear friend, Eliza H. Varney, after a few months' sojourn in California, and amongst the Doukhobors in the northwest of Canada, returned therefrom in time to attend her own Yearly Meeting.

Friends gathered under a deep sense of their own unworthiness and inability to do any good thing, or to advance the kingdom of God, either amongst themselves or the world at large; but remembering that help is laid upon one who is mighty, and able to save to the uttermost all who come unto Him in faith, asking in accord with the divine will, the spirit of prayer and supplication was poured out, craving assistance from on high, and that wisdom essential to perform the purpose of our coming together might be vouchsafed. This we humbly believe was granted. To Him, and Him alone, be all the praise.

Our epistolary correspondence with our sister Yearly Meetings continues to our comfort and edification. Harvey H. Haight was led to dwell on the necessity of the obedience of faith as the only legitimate and indeed essential fruit of the work of faith with power; being itself an evidence that our faith is that of the saints, of which "Jesus is," as He ever was, "the author and finisher." And since God judgeth according to every man's work, his approval and our acceptance by Him, are sealed to us by the Holy Spirit, in that peace and joy which He bestows upon his obedient children, who are found doing their Heavenly Father's will. It is only as we thus come into obedience to Christ's spirit, that God's purpose in Christ, in giving Him as a propitiation for the sin of the world, is fulfilled in us; and this purpose is "to redeem us from all iniquity," to purify our souls through faith. "He is righteous who doeth righteousness." It is the doers of Christ's law written on the heart who are justified of God. We are "Friends" only as we are found keeping his commandments, obeying his word.

After serious deliberation Friends came to the judgment that the time had come to appoint women Friends also as members of the Representative Meeting, with which women Friends concurred; and such appointment was made.

As many Friends have to come a great distance to the Yearly Meeting, and more especially to encourage the attendance of our younger members, it was unanimously agreed that board should be provided free to all who may come, whilst in attendance, and steps were taken in accordance.

Sweet harmony, brotherly condescension, and a concord of love were experienced amongst us, and with all praise to Him, who alone is worthy. His presence was felt and known amongst us as the crown and glory of our assembly; and we parted in brotherly love, again to meet next year, if the Lord so will.

A CANADA FRIEND.

A Wrong Report of a Bishop and His Tobacco

There occurred in a local paper of the 6th inst. the following paragraphs:

"Mr. President," said Bishop Stevens at the recent General Council of the Reformed Episcopal Church, in Baltimore, "I smoke, and shall continue to smoke. I don't believe the use of tobacco is as bad as it has been described. I believe it is all a piece of will worship. Go has never said anywhere that we shall not be ministers of his Gospel if we do use it. Go provided for every need in nature, and I thank God for my cigar."

In the Episcopal Recorder, immediately following the date of the General Council, I read the detailed report of its action upon the tobacco matter, and there was contained in the remarks of Bishop Stevens no such mischievous enunciation as that given above. But, furthermore, the Bishop himself, in writing from Wilmington, North Carolina, to the Recorder, explains his position in offering an amendment to the Canon requiring a pledge from candidates for the ministry that they refrain from the use of all intoxicants as a beverage, and from the use of tobacco, saying, it was upon the ground of expediency he advocated the change, and quoted Paul: "All things are lawful to me, but all things are not expedient. He then adds (this is over his own signature

"My experience is that the judgment of the world is against the use of strong drink and tobacco as unbecoming to high and holy character of the minister of the Gospel. Does not in some degree lessen the respect due the minister of the Gospel in a beholder, who sees him walk the streets smoking, or go into a smoker (assuredly second-class), or take a drink at the invitation of a friend? In every such case is it not the involuntary feeling of the beholder, a minister of the Gospel should be above that? I have heard conductors of railroad and many others comment upon the incongruity of these things with the ministerial character

"I will just remark that under the Gospel there would appear to be no difference as touching the requirements of 'high and holy character,' between bishops and ministers generally, and so-called laymen. The redeemed of the Lord are spoken of as being made by His kings and priests unto God and his Father."

Recurring to the debate of the General Council, one of the clerical speakers did "thank God for my cigar," averring that he had "the honor in the use of it to be associated with that noble man, Charles H. Spurgeon;" but alas, this speaker leaned upon a broken reed being evidently unaware that the eminent Baptist preacher, about three years before his death, becoming effectually convinced that the practice was doing him harm, and that he had made a great mistake—would have gladly r alled what he had previously said in extenuation of it. He thereafter gave up smoking altogether.

George Torrance, of Pontiac, Illinois, who is Superintendent of the Illinois State Reformatory, in a recent address on "The Relation of the Cigarette to Crime," stated that "cigarettes are destroying and making criminals of more boys than are the saloons," instancing the fact that of the 278 boys in his Reformatory, 256 were cigarette smokers.

Bishop Fallows, in the debate in the General Council, in which he declared for the suggested amendment made incidental allusion to this startling fact in juvenile criminology. It must be remembered that the cigarette was not known to our immediate ancestors of only a generation ago. Their liberty, mayhap, becomes our indefensible license. The traffic has now come to be associated with highly immoral accompaniments, of which every tobacco user must be cognizant, so that when the cleric, who is a parent, "glories in his cigar" and "thanks God for it," he may miserably reflect that his own will pattern after him with the cigarette, and may come even to curse the day when fatherly example led him into the depraving habit. We have not forgotten the personal incident of my early manhood, thirty years ago, when, being in the company of Bishop A. de Schweinitz, of the Moravian denomination, he made the remark that he had forsaken his cigar, because, though it might not hurt him, it might bring anger to his young son. Herein he had right regard for the Scripture (Paul to the Corinthians) which says: "Take heed lest by any means this liberty (or power, in the margin) of ours becomes a stumbling block to them that are weak. . . . Wherefore, if meat (may we not also say, tobacco) make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend."

Within the space of a month the recent General Conferences of the Methodists, Methodist-Protestants and Reformed Presbyterians have adopted or reaffirmed their position concerning tobacco for the ministry. Perhaps in another four years the reformed Episcopalians may be free to go as far. Meanwhile, without waiting for any order in Council, it will be well to remember that the price of the indulgence of a single five-cent cigar, would keep for a whole week an India famine sufferer from danger of death by starvation.

JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

OFTEN, if we knew the struggles that poor weak brothers are making, criticism would give place to sympathy. An incident recently occurred on a train which illustrates the thought. By the side of a man bowed down under a great sorrow was a little girl that never ceased crying. Passengers began to make remarks and criticise the father and girl. Much was said that was unkind. The father finally arose and said: "Friends, I know my little girl is disturbing you. I am very sorry; cannot comfort her. Her mother is in her coffin in the baggage car. Her poor childish heart is broken. Bear with us." There was not a dry eye among the passengers. Complaining at once ceased. Thus, if we understood the sorrows of others, our unkind remarks would often be changed to sympathy and help.—Zion's Watchman.

The Gutenberg Celebration.

There is no measure by which we can estimate the influence on civilization of the art of printing. By some it has been regarded as the greatest invention of man, in its widespread effect on human thought and knowledge. Its value was at once discovered, as it began to hasten the revival of learning that followed the long and deep slumber of the Middle Ages. The city of Constantinople had just fallen into the hands of the Turks, and the Greek learning that centered there began to scatter, as men of knowledge and scholarship fled throughout Europe and carried their learning with them. The time had come for a more rapid method of producing books than with the pen, and a more speedy way of diffusing knowledge. With the awakening of the human mind in other directions, also came the awakening of inventive genius. The providence of God was leading in this, as certainly as in many of the events that followed. That two persons in different places, one in Holland and the other in Germany, began efforts in the same direction, only shows that the inventive spirit was abroad. But we think of Gutenberg of Mentz, in Germany, as the father of the wonderful art of printing. He was the first one to produce a book, printed with movable types, that has come down to the present time.

Preparations are now made for a great celebration in his native country of the five hundredth anniversary of the birth of John Gutenberg. It is a repetition of the common story of an inventor, laboring in obscurity and poverty, to give to the world a priceless blessing; little appreciated in his day and yet more and more honored as the centuries roll on. He gained by his genius neither wealth nor honor, but lived in absolute poverty and so overburdened by debt that he was soon brought into dishonor. The money-lender obtained his secret, and finally seized on all his moulds and type and rude machinery. But in the face of everything he labored on, till the great thought in his mind became a reality, that it was possible to print the Bible on types, so as to multiply its copies. The work was finished in 1456, after many years of labor had been spent on it. It was called the Mazarine Bible, the first book ever printed from movable types. It was called the Mazarine Bible, from the Mazarine library in Paris, where a copy was found. It was the Latin Vulgate version, and only a few copies are now in existence. It is eagerly sought after by collectors, and the most extravagant prices have been paid for a copy of it. One copy that had belonged to the library of the late Earl of Ashburnham, printed on vellum, was sold in 1897, it is said, for $20,000.

The first rude efforts of Gutenberg were soon improved upon by others, and one invention has followed another in these intervening centuries, till we have the modern printing press driven by steam or electricity, capable of printing from the roll of white paper 50,000 daily newspapers in one hour, ready to be distributed to the readers. Every year the facilities are greater for the distribution of knowledge.

Often has the press been abused and made an instrument of evil, but the good that it has done outweighs the evil. In the publication of the Bible in the languages of earth and in the good literature that goes forth, how mighty is its power for the good of man! To attempt to estimate it is bewildering. Well may honor be given to the memory of the man, who is recognized as the earliest inventor of the art of printing, and well may all the world take time to study the evolution of the printing press, in the four and a half centuries of its existence.—Presbyterian.

The Boy and His Father.

BY W. S. PHILPOTT.

Many men do not discover the true relation of father and son until it is too late to save the boy. But some who have been neglected take warning in time, and apply that "love that covereth a multitude of sins"—in the boy. Not long ago a gentleman related his experience to me as follows:

"Once a friend said to me, 'Do you know that your boy is reading bad books?' I said, 'No, I don't believe any such thing.' My friend said, 'Perhaps you would better investigate.' I was inclined to treat the whole matter with contempt, for I did not think it possible for my boy to be reading bad books without my knowing it. Finally, however, I decided that common sense is better than pride, and I would investigate. So I went to my boy's room, looked over his belongings, and at last, under the mattress, found the books. I put them back where I found them, and hunted up the boy. I said to him, 'My boy, what kind of books are these you have been reading lately?' He was taken by surprise, and did not know just what to say. So I said to him, 'I would like to see the books. I've made up my mind to read the same books as you do.' Finally he stammered out, 'Papa, I don't think you would like those books very well.' I said, 'I would like to look at them. I want your opinion of them.'

That threw him into a very peculiar state of mind, but we went up to the room, and he brought out the books. We sat down side by side. I put my arm around him, and as we turned the pages of the books I said to him, 'Well, what do you think of that?' as we looked at the pictures and I read here and there a sentence. His only reply was, 'Well, papa, I guess it isn't very good.' Then I said to him, 'Lay the books aside, and this evening let us come up and read together. I have something I want to read to you.'

"My boy was delighted. The evening came, and we went to his room. I placed the lamp beside the bed, and laid down where he had lain to read his book. I read a story from the Youth's Companion. Before I had finished he had crawled up and was leaning on my side. Then I read him a story, with illustrations, from Science. When I stopped he laid his head upon my shoulder, put his arm around me, and said, 'Papa, why can't I have such reading as that?' As soon as I could control myself—for he had shown me that I was the sinner—I said, 'My boy, you shall have all you want. Let us go down stairs.' I led the way right down to the stock I had lain in, and put out my books and papers before him. He looked at them a moment, then picked them up and fairly hugged them. We soon decided what to do with the bad books—we took them out into the back yard and burned them.

"Then and there my boy and I started out on a new career. When I can spend the evenings with him, one reads and the other listens.

Henceforth my boy and I are going to be confidential friends, even if it takes a little time from business."

That father discovered some very important and valuable secrets. Would that others would set about the same work! Usually, when the Christian teacher approaches the wayward boy or young man, he finds the boy's father—by his neglect or wrong example, or both—standing between him and the boy. Quite frequently the father is a professing Christian, and his influence decides the boy's case against religious influence. The question is often asked, "Why does not the Church reach the boys?" and it usually suggests the still more perplexing question, "How can we reach the fathers, and through them the boys?"

The gentleman referred to above said, "I believe God has forgiven my sinful neglect of my boy. Henceforth my service of God will include a loving and watchful care over the precious soul He has committed to me."—Michigan Christian Advocate.

For "THE FRIEND."

ADRIFT.

Out on the shoals of life,
Braving the tempest's wrath,
As it sweeps on, before
The gloom in its stormy path,

Is the wreck of a noble barque
That was launched on the sunny tide,
With buoyant sails at the eastern gate
Of manhood's joy and pride.

Out on the dark, cold rocks
Shivered each mast and spar
Of the ship that sailed thus gladly,
With the light of hope's bright star.

That soul, as clear as the light
In an hour of temptation fell;
And its anguish of keen despair
No tongue or pen can tell.

Others may sit in their homes
And ignore drink's terrible crime,
But to rise from this grip of death,
Requires a courage divine.

'Tis a wife whose bitter tears
Have withered before her feet,
The joy of a fair young life
That was beautiful and sweet.

Ah; yes, you may sit in your home
And ignore this pitiful shame,
But if you were that drunkard's wife,
You would long for a tongue of flame.

Out on the shoals of life,
Crushed by the tempest's wrath;
As it sweeps on before
The death in its gloomy path!

RACHEL G. STEER.

TACOMA, O.

SIMPLY TO SERVE GOD.—Now, let us be quite sure that if we do every day just set ourselves simply to serve God, to live as his children and servants, doing the right thing, crushing down the evil and clinging to the good, that it assuredly means growth, a development, a getting further on and higher up, step by step, nearer to the divine ideal. There are no mile-stones on the way to heaven by which you can tell how far you have come, or how far you must go. But being in the right road, you do know where it goes to. "Tired I may be, but I will just keep right on."—Mark Guy Pearse

For "THE FRIEND."

Sound Words.

Hold fast the form of sound words, which thou hast heard of me, in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus (2 Tim. i: 13).

In doctrine shewing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity, sound speech that cannot be condemned" (Titus ii: 7, 8).

Words are signs of ideas, and if carelessly used are liable to lapse from the original idea as expressed by the user. In case this has taken place it is difficult to gather the true meaning of an author. The above passages of Scripture are quoted from Paul's epistles to two ministers of the gospel, and go to show how important he deemed the right use of words. Words are closely allied to doctrines, and doctrines to practice. Pervert the meaning of the first, and it becomes easy to vitiate the second and the third.

Dark and thick was the veil drawn over the glory of primitive Christianity, until the light of Truth almost suffered a total eclipse. And the beginning of this gloomy period called the dark ages, was ushered in by the abuse of words. This has been, and is in our day, a favorite net of our watchful and crafty enemy whereby to inveigle unwary souls. Many new-fangled words of unsettled signification are being used now-a-days by lovers of science—falsely so called—which is but another name for the mind of unregenerate man seeking to define the things of God, which alone the Holy Spirit can unfold to the understanding; "for the things of God knoweth no man, but the spirit of God" and this spirit is only bestowed on the willing and obedient ones who hearken to its reproofs and follow its guidance. He who sends it has the key to the treasure house of God, nor does He delegate this to any man. All such unsavory words darken the counsel of God, and leave the door of the heart unlatched for disguised enemies, to enter as though friends.

Now the Book of books for Christian doctrine is, as it ever has been, the Holy Scriptures, having for its author God's Holy Spirit, for one of its writers declares, "Holy men of old spake as they were moved of the Holy Ghost."

It is Jesus Christ the eternal Word who was with God and was God, who thus declared his will to man by his spirit through these men, made holy and sanctified by that same spirit, that hearing and seeing in his light, they might clearly declare his divine will. Jesus Christ himself declared of the Spirit of Promise "He shall testify of me," whilst the Apostle Peter declares that it was "the Spirit of Christ which was in the prophets of old who testified beforehand, the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow" (1 Peter i: 11). What means then the apostle Paul when he defines what sound words are, and enjoins Timothy, whom he calls his son in the faith, to use "wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 vi: 3)? And to prove their use as all essential to the holding of sound doctrine, he intimates in the context that false teachers, who taught unsound doctrine, used unsound words (see verse 3). The Holy Scriptures are then as originally written the words dictated by the Spirit of Christ, which is the spirit of prophecy, and as such clearly declare the Divine will, and bear testimony or witness to Christ, the Word, in whom is life, and the life in the Word is the light of men (John i: 4). The same apostle declares of the words he wrote, which being by inspiration of the Holy Spirit and a part of Scripture, is true of the whole, "these are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through his name" (John xx: 31).

This testimony or witness of the spirit in these holy men of old, was then to lead men to Christ Jesus, the only foundation of the saints' faith in all ages of the world, and believing (that is through faith in Him) they might have life through his name. The apostles were such witnesses to Jesus. All true ministers of the Gospel, commissioned and empowered by Him going forth in his name, are like witnesses. For God's promise through Joel, quoted by Peter on Pentecost's day (amongst the Jews: the day of presenting the first-fruits of wheat the harbinger of the harvest to come), when the prophecy was fulfilled, when God in the name of his beloved Son now glorified at the right hand of power, poured out his spirit upon all flesh, Jews and Gentiles, from every quarter of the world; and Peter under that spirit of prophecy there and then declares that this promise of God, this gracious outpouring of this same Holy Spirit, this spirit of prophecy should be not only to them in that day, but "to your children, and to all that are afar off; even as many as the Lord our God shall call" (Act ii: 39.) And many in our days, believing his word of promise, and having sought have found it fulfilled to them.

Are not then all such words spoken under the influence of this spirit of Christ, who has promised to be by his spirit present always with his people, even to the end of the world, are not they the prophesyings we are commanded not to despise? Are they not the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and as spoken through faith, and heard and received by the hearer through the same? They are, as thus received, "the words of God;" and the vessel so used by the Head of the Church is truly minister of the word, having spoken to God's people what he himself has received of God his word, as making known his Divine will concerning those to whom the word of God thus comes, as it did of old in God's will and time to his people.

And since the only true testimony to Jesus is this spirit of prophecy, need we wonder if the same Divine author should in every age of the church use the same language of the spirit and give to words a definite meaning, which is neither safe nor expedient for us to depart from. To the attentive reader of Holy Scripture, with a mind turned towards the Sun of Righteousness and enlightened by his rays such indeed is seen, and that plainly, to be the case.

(To be continued.)

SENTIMENTALLY we may feel, and lightly we may say, "To err is human, to forgive divine" but we never taste the nobility and divinity of forgiving till we forgive and know the victory of forgiveness over our sense of being wronged over mortified pride and wounded sensibilities. Here we are in living touch with Him who turns his back upon the past and bids us journey with Him into goodness and gladness, into newness of life.—Forward.

HOW LONG?

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Some days when the sun is brightest,
And the wind is soft and sweet,
When the ripples feather the lightest
Over the ripened wheat;
When the world is fullest of music,
And life is thrilled with song,
The cry of my soul is lifted,
"How long, O Lord! how long?"

For against the rich, blithe summer
The pain of the world is set;
I hear the moans of the shipwrecked,
And the groans of vain regret,
The wail of the heavy-hearted,
The grief of the one gone wrong,
And the cry of my soul is lifted,
"How long, O Lord, how long?"

Then, stilling my thoughts that struggle,
And bidding the tumult cease,
As sweet as an angel's whisper
Comes a blessed word of peace,
And the Lord himself, says, gently:
"Hush not thy thankful song,
I am yet the Father in Heaven,
And I list to thy plaint, "How long?"

In the days of the years eternal,
Beginning and end I see.
The world is glad and sorrowful both,
And the world is safe with Me.
The trouble and loss shall vanish;
Believe and await the song,
Untouched by the minor of discord,
Where the ransomed legions throng.

Marvels of Memory.

William Wotton was born in the year 1666, and took his B. A. degree at Cambridge some twelve years and five months later. He could remember almost any sermon he heard, and on one occasion repeated every word a certain bishop had just delivered from the pulpit in the course of his address. As the bishop was his auditor doubtless the wonderful retentive faculty of his mind was duly appreciated. The brother of the publisher of the letters of Julius, another William and another "W"—Woodfall—had so wonderful a memory that he could attend a debate and, without notes, accurately reproduce the same the following morning. In this instance the faculty was of articular value, for until 1772, when he became the editor of the Morning Chronicle, he was by profession a parliamentary reporter. No doubt Wotton could have recalled every word of a parliamentary debate had he tried, and Woodfall presumably could have repeated sermons he had heard but once until his auditors wearied of them, or possibly before, but strangely enough the faculty they possessed lives in our remembrance in connection with their professions. Dr. Thomas Fuller, the writer of the "History of the Worthies of England," 1662, could, however, in addition to repeating sermons, at which he was an adept, though not in a libelous sense, dissociate himself from his professional surroundings and perform prodigies of memory quite foreign to his calling.

It is related of Fuller that he had once to attend at a court of sequestration, and naturally enough the subject of his marvelous memory cropped up. "'Tis true," gentlemen, said the doctor, "that fame has given me the report of being a memorist, and if you please I will give you a specimen of it." The counsel thereupon suspended further business and settled down with relish to enjoy an eleemosynary entertainment. "Gentlemen," continued the worthy, "you want a specimen of my memory, and you shall have one. Your worships have thought fit to sequester a poor but honest parson, who is my neighbor, and commit him to prison. If you will have the goodness to release him out of prison, I pledge myself never to forget the kindness while I live." This pretty wit so influenced the committee that they proceeded to stultify themselves and quash their former decision.

The advantages that accrue to the ordinary schoolboy from the possession of inordinate powers of memory are self-evident. The Regius Professor of Greek at the close of the last century, the same being Richard (his memory was so remarkable that we are surprised he was not called William) Porson, discovered that fact when still at Eton. Having lent his "Horace" to a practical joker, who returned to him another volume without his noticing the fact until too late, on being called upon to read and construe from the works of Quintus H. Flaccus, Porson accomplished his task so admirably that it was not until the class, who were in the secret, smiled more or less loudly, that the master said, "Porson, you seem to me to be reading on one side of the page, while I am looking at the other. Pray, whose edition have you?" When he came to examine the volume it turned out to be an English Ovid. Porson, however, on being ordered to go on, finished the ode with the utmost promptitude and dispatch.

Another William, surname Lyon, by profession a strolling actor, and possessing an extraordinary memory and an inordinate thirst, on one occasion, at Edinburgh, is said to have wagered that he would at the rehearsal next morning repeat the whole of The Daily Advertiser from the beginning to the end. Needless to say, he accomplished his task most successfully, not omitting an advertisement, the price of a stock, or, we will guarantee, a syllable of any laudatory notice of his own performance on the boards that appeared therein. It is recorded by the Percys that an individual, name not mentioned, could not only repeat every word in an ordinary newspaper from beginning to end, but could do so from end to beginning.

Of Lord Macaulay it was said that if the works of Milton had been lost he could have restored them all from memory. It is related of him (and the story only proves that every silver lining has its cloud) that on one occasion, when waiting for a postchaise, he picked up a country newspaper, read two political articles through once, and forty years later repeated them without omitting a single word. Undoubtedly a great memory has its drawbacks. To sufferers from the restless activity of the waves we would commend the essayist's preventive for mal de mer: While crossing the Irish Channel he repeated to himself the whole of "Paradise Lost."

Early this century there lived one known as "Memory-Corner Thompson," who possessed a remarkable memory for buildings and objects, and an excessively poor memory for what he heard. In two sittings and twenty-two hours he drew from memory a correct plan of the parish of St. James, Westminster, and parts of the parishes of St. Marylebone, St. Ann and St. Martin, and the plan was so accurate that not only were streets, private and public houses, etc., indicated, but pumps, trees, bow-windows and the projections of buildings. He would take an inventory, from memory only, of a complete house from the attic to the ground floor, and write it out afterward, which feat he performed at Merten, Lord Nelson's seat. Nevertheless he could hear a comedy once or twice, and after an interval of a few days it would be entirely new to him.—London Standard.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Fatherhood of God.

"Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection; not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God, of the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment" (Heb. vi: 1, 2).

A correspondent writing to the (English) Friend of Sixth Month 22nd, on the above subject, asks the question, "Do the writers (those who in previous letters repudiate the Universalist doctrine), really mean to contend that the thousands of millions of black and brown people who have never heard of Christ, and large numbers who have only heard of Him in connection with the devastation and ruin of their homes at the hands of 'Christian' soldiers—do they really believe that these people are foredoomed by their Creator to everlasting punishment from his presence and favor?" This question raises the further profoundly all important inquiry of "Who is Christ, and how is He heard of and from?"

Can it be possible that any disciple of George Fox really believes that Christ is only heard of or from, through the natural ear, or the human voice? The earthly manifested Christ declared "Before Abraham was, I am" (John viii: 58). The spirit of Christ taught the prophets beforehand of the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow (1 Peter i: 11). The Israelites whilst in the wilderness, "did all eat the same spiritual meat; and did all drink the same spiritual drink: for they drank of that spiritual rock that followed them; and that Rock was Christ" (1 Cor. x: 3, 4).

God is an omnipresent, omnipotent Spirit—a living, unseen Word or Influence, very nigh to every living being—even in the mouth and in the heart (Deut. xxx: 14; Rom. x: 8). That Word, or Spirit, which was in the beginning, is the same true Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world (John i: 9); and the same was made flesh—or tabernacled in the body prepared for Him (Heb. x: 5), and dwelt amongst us (John i: 14). He came to his own, and his own disobedient, self-righteous (and so blinded) people, received Him not. So the heir of the vineyard was put to death by the wicked husbandmen, as many of the Lord's servants had been, before Him. But as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God. Many (may we not say all), are individually called, but comparatively few (because obedient and persevering), are chosen to inhabit eternity. God, being a living, unseen Spirit, Christ, the Son of God is also a living, unseen Spirit, as also is the Holy Ghost.

We who believe that only those who have been reconciled to God, and inwardly born again by this Holy, life-giving Spirit, are the real children of God, and true heirs of the commonwealth of Israel, also believe that our infinitely loving Heavenly Father, through the Spirit of Christ appeals to, knocks at, or in some way pleads with the heart of every human being in the world. Surely the universal grace of our adorable Lord—that Light, Spirit, Guide or Influence, which no man can define, or even fully comprehend—offers his great salvation on his own terms and conditions, and by an infinite variety of operation and administration to each individual of the human race, whether black, brown, or white. God is no respecter of persons, and his spiritual law is written on the fleshly tables of the heart; and those only who faithfully obey, or patiently suffer his holy will, unto the end of their earthly pilgrimage, will inherit the unseen, everlasting kingdom of heaven. “No man can come to me, except the Father which sent me draw him, said Christ” (John vi: 44).

To his own omnipotent and all-wise Master every man is responsible, and no man can judge his neighbor except by Divine authority, without breaking the law of Christ. This great unseen light of the world seeks in some way or other, entrance into every heart (being unwilling any should perish), but many deliberately choose darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil, and their natural dispositions are unyielded to Divine requirements.

The Scriptures of truth fully warrant the belief that God is the Father of those only who receive and obey his spiritual manifestations, in spirit and in truth. Prayerful consideration of the following list of Scriptural contrasts will assist in clearing our views on this momentous subject.

Oh, the all-importance of searching out and holding fast unto, sound doctrine, lest shipwreck be made of faith, and we become ensnared by the lying enemy of our souls, who has the mysterious power of being able to come to us even in the appearance of an angel of light, so seeking to deceive even the children of God.

There are children (or servants) of God, and children (or servants) of the wicked one.

There are children of light, and children of darkness.

There are the quickened in Christ and there are the dead in trespasses and sins.

There are true born sons of God, and there are deluded bastards only.

There are the redeemed in Christ and the hardened children of wrath.

There are true ambassadors of Christ, and false teachers who wrest the Scriptures to their own and other's destruction.

There are wise virgins, ready to meet the Bridegroom, and foolish, unready virgins that will be shut out from the marriage feast.

Amidst the Lord's good wheat, or Holy Seed the enemy's worthless tares grow also, until the harvest.

There will be the welcomed “sheep” of the Heavenly Shepherd, and the cursed “goats” that will be driven away into the outer darkness.

There is the present day of God's grace and mercy, and there is the appointed day of God's wrath on the ungodly.

In devoutly pondering and praying over the life and work of the earthly manifested Christ, may we be led into a true knowledge of his spiritual being, and work, from everlasting to everlasting, and as indeed one with the Father from the beginning. These vital truths cannot be acquired by the human intellect only, but are revealed by the Holy Spirit of Truth to those who hunger and thirst after righteousness.

FOR “THE FRIEND.”

An Honored Centenarian.

The closing years of the century bring somewhat prominently into notice the men and women who have been contemporaneous with its history and its progress. Especially is this the case when these have lent their influence and effort to the promotion of those things which can alone make a century truly memorable, and who exemplify the words of the wise king, that “the hoary head is a crown of glory if it be found in the way of righteousness.”

One week ago, our venerable friend John Benington reached his one hundredth anniversary. He was born in Skeffling, Yorkshire, England, the twentieth of Seventh Month, 1800: was educated at Ackworth school, and upon the expiration of his apprenticeship to a grocer in Wakefield, came to this country to learn farming, a predisposition to lung trouble rendering open air life desirable.

Soon after his marriage with Phebe Pierce in 1824, he settled on a farm in London Grove, Pa., where he remained for twelve years, and then moved within the limits of Concord meeting; still later to the farm at Westtown, and in 1877 settled at Media, where he lives honored and beloved by his fellow citizens.

Though now debarred through physical weakness from active participation in the affairs of our religious Society, of which he has been a deeply interested and valuable member, or in those connected with the welfare of his fellow men, we cannot doubt that the prayerful solicitude of his spirit for the promotion of the kingdom of his Redeemer will receive the blessing of Him who sees in secret and who rewards openly.

The serenity of his countenance bears witness to the peace which reigns in his soul; while his patient acceptance of the increasing infirmities which attend the gradual decline of his physical powers, also testifies to the fulfillment in his experience of the gracious promise, “Even to your old age I am He; and even to hoar hairs will I carry you; I have made and I will bear; even I will carry and will deliver you.”

MANY persons who are kind and courteous in company, are rude and careless with whom they love best. Emerson says: “Good manners are made up of petty sacrifices,” and certainly nothing can more thoroughly secure the harmony and peace of the family circle than the habit of making small sacrifices for one another. Children thus learn good manners in the best and most natural way, and habits thus acquired will never leave them. Courtesy and kindness will never lose their power or their charm, while all spurious imitations of them are to be despised.—Zion's Watchman.

Do to-day's duty, fight to-day's temptation, and do not waken and distract yourself by looking forward to things which you cannot see, and could not understand if you saw them.

Watching for Faults.

“When I was a boy,” said an old man, “I was often very idle, and used to play during the lessons with other boys as idle as myself. One day we were fairly caught by the master. ‘Boys,’ he said, ‘you must not be idle; you must attend closely to your books. The first one of you who sees another boy idle will please come and tell me.’”

“‘Ah,’ I thought to myself, ‘there is Joe Simmons that I don't like; I'll watch him, and if I see him look off his book I'll tell the teacher.’”

“It was not long until I saw Joe look off his book, and I went up at once to tell the master.”

“‘Indeed,’ said he, ‘how did you know he was idle?’”

“‘I saw him,’ said I.

“‘You did? And were your eyes on your book when you saw him?’”

“‘I was caught, and the other boys laughed and I never watched for idle boys again.’”

If we watch over our conduct and try to keep it right, and always do our own duty, we will not have time to watch for faults or idleness in others. This will keep us out of mischief and make us helpful to others.—Our Young Folks.

IMPORTANT DISCOVERIES IN CRETE.—Tradition says that the city of Cnossus (pronounced nos-sus) was the capital of King Minos of Crete. Just lately English explorers have unearthed on the site of that city evidences showing the truth of this tradition and establishing the important fact that here on the Greek island there existed a civilization which had developed a written language at least six centuries before the Phœnician alphabet had been introduced on the Greek mainland. This Cretan script is distinct alike from the Phœnician and the Hittite. Large numbers of small tablets are being found covered with records made in this language. In the royal palace there are evidences of a conflagration having taken place which destroyed nearly everything. But chests have been found filled full of the tablets, these coffers being locked, sealed and countersealed with clay seals in just the way a box of valuables might be sealed up to-day.

CHRIST has no need to call the highest class for He can take the lowest and make the highest. He can take the poor and make them rich; the foolish, and make them wise; the weak, and make them strong; the baseborn and make them highborn. He does not ask what the pedigree of a man is, but what is his character. He does not require that he shall be born of a prince, but that he shall be born of the Spirit. He is not concerned about nobility, for He is the Son of God, and to those that receive Him He gives power to become sons of God. They may not trace their pedigree back to a king, but they trace it immediately to the King of kings. According to the world's standard they are weak, but according to the true standard they are mighty. The world considers them worthless, but in the eyes of God one of them is worth ten thousand. They are his chosen ones.—Christian Adv.

Do not think it wasted time to submit yourself to any influence which may bring upon you any noble feeling.—Ruskin.

Notes from Others.

"Liberty in religion is well established. Religion in liberty is slowly coming."—Christian Register.

Dr. Barrows, of Oberlin, says: "Men must beware lest they limit the infinite God who moves in all life to the stunted measure of their own mental development."

"It is ever the peril of organized religion that the organization will get the better of the religion. We need not go far for proof and illustration of this peril. Christendom is full of it."—George L. Cheney.

"One reason, and an important one, why the great daily journals are dealing with theological questions is because they can. There is a theology to-day that is printable, readable, acceptable, and these papers reach to multitudes who never go near the church."—Universalist Leader.

The Examiner has the following: "It is the worldling's great misconception of Christianity that it is merely a system of restraints. It is rather a great and generous plan of blessings. The restraints are incidental."

Nerves are strange things, even to physicians. As a minister, I am free to say they can be controlled in many cases by a pure, healthy trust in God, and by an active, happy, determined life. A nervous religion is abnormal. A balanced religion exercises self-control as its first necessity, and asks God for it, and takes it as from Him.—Congregationalist.

AND NOW CHINA.—The Peacemaker says: "We cannot help thinking there is a want of wisdom, of tact and charity in the missionaries residing in China. Having more education, coming from Christian lands and avowedly upholding the principles of Christ, they should be consistent. It pains us to find them appealing in the following language: 'Arouse the Christian world immediately to our peril. Should this arrive too late, avenge us.' This is not Christian. If in their hearts they desire to 'avenge,' we fear they will reap the results of that unrighteous course."

"A far better way would be to withdraw deadly force and show no desire or intention to divide up or conquer Chinese territory. We have in the United States in excluding the Chinese and showing a discrimination against the people of China caused bad feeling and sown the seeds of enmity. Far different was it with Burlingame and his treaty and with Grant and his visit."

Helen M. Knowlton writes to a Boston paper: "Why all these terrible calamities that make our journals groan with the weight of human suffering? The Lord is showing his power! He wishes to have people realize the transitory nature of all earthly possessions. A vial of wrath has been opened, and will continue to pour forth until the world realizes that every living soul is in the Lord's hands. There will be no cessation until the whole world is brought to feel his power."

"The world is too much given over to the love of material wealth and possession. It has forgotten the need of spirituality. A few people are recognizing the fact, and are turning their attention to spiritual affairs. It may be through one belief or another. There are many roads to the kingdom which is to come some day on earth as in heaven. We must cease this undue worship of material prosperity. The kingdom of heaven is at hand! We are to go through terrible trials and become perfect through great suffering. The majority will be under the tremendous pressure."

The Watchman has the following items: "Write in one column all the things you can think of for which you should be thankful to God, and in another the reasons why God should be thankful for your existence, and see how they compare." "It is safe enough for the ordinary Christian to stand in the old paths until he is sure that the new lead out into the sunlight."

OLD SWEDES CHURCH BUILDING IN PHILADELPHIA.—One of the most interesting old church buildings in America is Old Swedes, in Philadelphia, the two hundredth anniversary of which was celebrated on First-day, Sixth Month 17th. For two hundred years it has been continuously open; for two centuries religious services have been held in it each First-day, and in this country there is no other building of which that can be said. The history of Old Swedes, or Gloria Dei, as the building's true name is, goes back to a blockhouse—the blockhouse of Wicaco. This building, in 1677, certain Swedish colonists dedicated because the existing Swedish church at Tinicum was too far away from them. Jacobus Fabritius was the first pastor. The blockhouse upon the sight of which the church building stands was a little wooden fort, with loopholes through which to "wing" approaching enemies. The men of the congregation then brought their guns to service, "ostensibly," the historian says, "to shoot wild game that they might meet on the road." And even after the blockhouse had been dedicated, a number of women, their husbands being away, once took refuge in it from an attacking party of Indians, and, as they had been soapmaking when attacked, they used kettles of boiling soap for their defence and with these kept the red men off till help arrived. Fabritius died in 1692, after serving the church for fourteen years, during the last nine of which he was blind. The congregation was poor, and paid him little, it would seem, for in the colonial records appears his application to the council, Sixth Month 19th, 1685, for a permit to open and keep an inn. The council refused to let him do this, and so he took up fish curing. William Penn, in a letter to his steward, said: "You may procure fine smoked shads of the old priest." An interesting reference to the old edifice is made by Longfellow in "Evangeline," when describing "the Sunday morning scene," toward the close of the poem; he speaks of "the sound of psalms sung by the Swedes in their church at Wicaco." For many years the congregation of Old Swedes has belonged to the Episcopal communion.

NO TITLE.—The proper title of an ex-President is his plain name, without prefix or annex. A writer in The Outlook tells an incident illustrative of this fact. Colonel Hay once had occasion to write to Mr. Buchanan:

Wishing to be very correct and civil, I asked Mr. Hunter, as the depository of all official traditions, what was the proper title to use.

He told me that the rank of an ex-President was so high that no title could properly be used, and that the only address for the Sage of Wheatland was James Buchanan. I afterward found that this was the law observed by the State department. I imagine that very few correspondents know or regard such a rule.—Exchange.

On this the Bible Student asks: "Is it not true that when a man passes from under the dominion of the world into the glorious liberty of the sons of God, he also needs no title? Often in church assemblies men are called Reverend, Doctor, Professor, when the endearing name of Brother, or even the Christian name with no appellation prefixed, would much better express the lofty equality of the children of God, the foregoing of all titles in view of our common brotherhood in Christ."

As regards the title "Esq.," which some Friends who wished to avoid writing "Mr." have sometimes affixed to a man's name, we have lately met the following: "In England 'Esquire' is a title of dignity next in degree below that of knight, and is properly given to the eldest sons of knights and the eldest sons of the younger sons of noblemen and their eldest sons in succession. Sheriffs, barristers, justices of the peace while in commission, and others, have a right to the title. It makes a difference in England whether a man is legally rated as 'Esquire' or 'gentleman,' as the former can claim exemption from certain jury duties to which the latter is subject."

"In this country the title is generally considered as belonging especially to lawyers, although it is not now used so commonly as formerly."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—A despatch alleged to come from Minister Conger, in Peking, and written in the State Department cipher, has been received by Secretary Hay through the Chinese Minister. It was in answer to one sent by Secretary Hay on the 11th through the same channel. It is as follows: "In British Legation. Under continued shot and shell from Chinese troops. Quick relief only can prevent general massacre." The message is not dated, but it is understood it was sent from Peking on the 18th, and is accepted as genuine.

It has been decided at Washington that the present situation in China does not require an extra session of Congress. If, however, it is said, subsequent developments demand it, an extra session will be called promptly to authorize the President to raise more troops.

W. W. Rockhill, Director of the Bureau of American Republics, has been appointed a special commissioner from this country to go to China and investigate and report upon the situation. He was formerly Secretary of Legation in Peking and speaks Chinese.

Chinese merchants and representatives of the several Chinese companies in this city adopted a card to the people of Philadelphia expressive of their horror and repudiation of the outrages being perpetrated in China, and their joy at the reported safety of the United States Minister to China.

The British steamer Queenswood has been chartered to carry 4,000 tons of bituminous coal from Philadelphia to London—the first cargo of the kind ever sent to that city from Philadelphia; but two other cargoes have ever been sent to London from this country. The present shipment is due in a great measure to the labor difficulties in England and the scarcity of coal in both Germany and England. Exporters claim that the next few years will undoubtedly place Philadelphia among the leading export coal centres of the world.

In Utica, N. Y., a block of new apartment houses has just been furnished with complete installation of electric cooking utensils in each flat. The electrical kitchen furniture consists of three round platters, or "stoves," an oven and a broiler.

It is not quite seventy years since there was no school in the limits of Chicago. There are now 250 public school-houses, with 5,000 teachers and over 255,000 pupils.

Two hundred natives were killed and 130 surrendered or were captured in the Philippines last week.

The foreign commerce of the United States during the fiscal year 1900 was $320,000,000 greater than that of 1899. The total was $2,244,193,543. The imports of the year increased $152,000,000, of which increase two-thirds was in manufacturers' materials; and the exports increased $167,000,000, of which one-half was manufactured articles.

The announcement is made from Washington that steps are being taken for the organization of an independent government in Cuba, and that in eight or nine months the United States troops will be withdrawn from the island and the Cubans left to govern themselves. This is in accordance with promises, made in the Teller resolution of Fourth Month 20th, 1898.

The President and Governor General Wood have agreed upon Ninth Month 15th as the time for holding elections for the Constitutional Convention in Cuba. It is said in Washington that the Constitution will be closely scrutinized in Washington, and Cuba will not be permitted to make treaties with foreign countries, except through the United States, nor will the people be allowed to involve the island in debt, unless authorized to do so by this Government.

The amount of land in cultivation in Cuba is said to be double what it was last year. The number of schools has increased, and about 130,000 children are in attendance.

The Bank of Montreal in New York City has lately received what is said to be one of the largest lumps of gold that has ever reached that city. The metal was of cone shape, thirteen inches high and thirty-four inches in circumference at the base, and is valued at $135,275. It had probably been melted in a crucible, which had been afterwards broken away from it. The usual form of gold bricks is that of an ordinary brick, the very largest being valued at about $30,000 and weighing about 1500 ounces.

Heavy rains fell in Northern Kansas, from the Missouri River half way across the State, breaking a drought of five weeks' duration and it is said saving the corn crop.

The pineapple crop of Florida exceeds all previous records. The value of the crop on the east coast alone will be in excess of $300,000.

A letter has been received by President McKinley, signed by the Hawaiian National Committee, expressing their appreciation and thanks for the liberal laws which Congress has enacted for the Territory of Hawaii.

The Government's holdings of gold reached the highest point in its history, on the 23rd, and amounted to $427,498,482, including the lawful reserve of $150,000,000.

There were 564 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 69 less than the previous week and 54 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 288 were males and 276 females: 45 died of consumption; 26 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 18 of cancer; 13 of apoplexy, and 9 of diphtheria.

Markets, &c. — U. S. 2's, new, 104 to 104½; 3's, 110 to 110½; 4's, reg., 115½ to 116; new 4's, 133¼ to 134½; 5's, 114½ to 115.

COTTON closed on a basis of 10½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.40 to $2.60; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.50 to $3.75; Western winter, straight, $3.65 to $3.90; spring, straight, $3.90 to $4.10; city mills, straight, $3.60 to $3.90. RYE FLOUR—$3.25 per barrel, as to quality, the latter for fancy Western patent.

GRAIN—No. 2 red wheat, 75½ to 75¾c.
No. 2 mixed corn, 41 to 41¼c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 31c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5½ to 5¾c.; good 5½ to 5¾c.; medium, 5½ to 5¾c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4½ to 5c.; good, 4½ to 4¾c.; common, 2 to 3c.; spring lambs, 4½ to 6¾c.

HOGS.—7½ to 7¾c. for best Western; others, 7¼ to 7½c.

FOREIGN—After three days' fighting at Tien-Tsin the allied forces completely routed the Chinese: The number engaged, as reported, were: Japanese, 1,600; British, 900; Americans, 800; Russians, 4,000; Germans, 300. The native city has been destroyed by fire. The losses of the Chinese are stated to have been upwards of 3,000.

A provisional government has been established at Tien-Tsin. A proclamation was issued by the allies declaring that they are not warring upon China, but are suppressing rebels.

Statements continue to be made that the European ministers at Peking are safe under the protection of the Imperial Court, except the German minister, whose death has been announced. Much doubt is felt in regard to the truth of these statements.

An imperial ukase, issued at St. Petersburg, orders that a state of siege be proclaimed in the military districts of Siberia, Turkestan and Semiretchinsk, and that all Reservists in these districts be called to the Russian colors.

The memorial to the throne, which Li Hung Chang induced the Viceroy to sign, insisted upon protection of foreigners and the rescue of the ministers at Peking, if still living, an apology to the German Emperor, full compensation for all losses and an assurance of China's good intentions in the future.

The Berlin correspondent of the Paris Temps says: "It is asserted in Berlin that the Emperor of China has sent a telegram to Emperor William deploring the assassination of Baron von Ketteler by the rebels, and declaring that the murderers are being actively sought and will be punished."

France has been asked by the Chinese Government to mediate between that empire and other Powers, and has replied, in effect, that it cannot do so until its own claims have been satisfied.

An imperial edict issued on the 17th instant thus defines the position of China, "The present conflict between China and the foreign Powers had its origin in the standing antagonism between the people and Christian mission. The subsequent fall of the Taku forts precipitated the meeting of force with force. The Imperial Government, having due regard to the importance of international intercourse, still refused to go so far as to interrupt the existing relations. We have already repeatedly issued decrees providing for the protection of the foreign Legations, and also commanded the provincial authorities to protect missionaries. Inasmuch as there is still no cessation in the employment of force, foreign merchants and subjects residing in China, who form a numerous body in the country, should be protected without distinction."

A Russian transport was attacked by Chinese on the Amur River, and nearly all the escort killed. The town of Blagoveschensk was attacked, the garrison overwhelmed and nearly all perished. In Manchuria, stations of the Eastern Siberian Railway have been burned, bridges destroyed and the tracks torn up. This has been followed by movements by the Russian troops and the defeat of the Chinese at different points along the Amur River, who were obliged to retire.

St. Petersburg despatches represent the situation in Manchuria as far more serious than had been supposed. It is asserted that the Chinese have occupied Heilar, where the Russian Railway staff is surrounded and in desperate straits.

The correspondent of the Associated Press at Berlin states that the question of the chief command on both land and sea in China still forms the subject of diplomatic negotiations, and that nothing has yet been settled.

Reports from Boer sources state that there has been heavy fighting in the Transvaal for the past three days, and that the British losses have been large.

The commander of a British relief column reached Kumassi on the 15th. Upon its arrival a scene of horror and desolation was presented, burned houses and dead bodies were visible on all sides. On its way it encountered large bodies of the Ashantis.

Great heat has prevailed in England on the continent during the past week. The 17th was the hottest day on record this year in London, where the temperature rose to 94.6 degrees Fahrenheit. In some parts of the country the excessive heat culminated in severe thunderstorms, accompanied by a heavy rainfall. Much damage was done to fruit trees, and the streets in many towns up the country were flooded. Considerable damage was done to numerous buildings by lightning.

In Paris, the 17th is spoken of as "exceedingly hot," the temperature having been nearly 89° in the shade.

A convention of Christian Endeavor Societies has lately been taking place in London. The total enrollment, outside of the United States and Canada, is 12,540 societies, and this figure, augmented by the greater number in the United States and Canada, makes an interdenominational brotherhood of 59,712 local societies, with a total membership of 3,500,000; 50,000 persons on the 18th were present.

Germany has given up the Reaumur thermometer, and after First Month 1st, 1901, will use only the Centigrade. In the Reaumur the division between the freezing and the boiling point is into 80 degrees, in the Centigrade it is into 100 degrees.

The hot wave has been broken in Berlin, and there have been terrific rain and thunder storms in many parts of Germany. An enormous amount of damage has been done.

Mount Azuma, in Japan, broke into violent eruption on the 17th inst., and the lava engulfed several villages. Two hundred persons were killed.

A despatch from St. John's says that the Straits of Belle Isle are still blocked with ice floes. Almost 1,000 fishing vessels are icebound and unable to reach the Labrador fishing grounds.

The annual crop of mushrooms in France is valued at $2,000,000, and it is said that there are sixty wholesale firms in Paris dealing exclusively in them. In the Department of the Seine it appears there are some 3,000 caves in which mushrooms are grown, and about 300 persons are employed in their culture, and rarely leave these caves.

A despatch from Montreal of the 17th says: The annual influx of United States pilgrims to the miracle working shrine, Ste. Anne de Beaupre, has commenced. Yesterday, during the day, the railroads passed 3500 through Montreal on their way to Quebec, and last night another 1500 arrived and changed trains here. More are going through to-day.

About 30,000,000 persons left Europe during the century just closing to seek to better their fortunes in other lands.

A reciprocity treaty with Italy has been signed at Washington. The arrangement, like that with France and Germany, is made under Section 3, of the Dingley Tariff act. This treaty secures to the manufacturing industries indicated a widely extended market hitherto almost unknown to Americans.

The Governor of Bombay has telegraphed that there were 9928 cases of cholera in the famine districts during the week ending Seventh Month 7th, of which 6474 were fatal, and that in the native States there were 9526 cases, of which 5892 were fatal.

The Citizens' Permanent Relief Committee, which is raising funds for relief of famine sufferers in India, has issued a statement, in which it says, that from two to three cents a day will save a life. "Some rain has fallen," it is stated, "and more is hoped for, yet the stricken farmers, without cattle to cultivate the ground, or seed with which to sow it, will not be able, without assistance, to rise above the present deplorable state. The Government of India is providing for 6,000,000 daily; yet so great is the territory affected, and so high the death rate in the hundreds of native States, where Government has little control, that the call for help grows louder every hour.

A dispatch from Vera Cruz of the 22nd says: The first patient treated with the yellow fever serum by the young Brazilian experimenter, Dr. Bellinzaghi, is fully convalescent. Other patients treated are progressing favorably. There is intense interest in the experiments. Patients very low with black vomit have been treated, and the effect of the serum is marvelous.

RECEIPTS.

Unless otherwise specified, two dollars have been received from each person, paying for vol. 74.

Joseph C. Exton for Amy S. L. Exton, N. J.; Davi H. Forsythe for Lewis Forsythe, Pa.; Phillips Chambers, Pa.; Benjamin H. Lightfoot, Pa.; Stephen W. Post and for Henry R. Post, N. Y.; Joseph B. Bettles and for Susanna G. Bettles, Ill.; Howard A. Mickl N. J.; John E. Carter, G't'n, $8 for himself, Rebecca S. Conard, Shelter for Colored Orphans, and L. M. Thornton; Joseph Passmore, Pa.; Elizabeth Wrigth N. J.; Susanna Kite, Phila.; Ruth S. Abbott, Phila. J. Benjamin Glavin, Phila.; Clarkson M. Gifford, Mass. Pardon Tucker, R. I.; Elizabeth W. Warner for Matilda W. Warner, Pa.; Joseph T. Whitson, Pa.; Lev Bowles, agent Kans. $1 for J. A. Carter; Barclay Perrose, N. Y.; Thomas S. Downing, Pa., Jane P. Cors Phila.; Wilson Hutchens, Mo.; Mary Ann Wiggin, Pa., and for Mary J. White, N. C.; Isaac W. Stoke N. J., $8 for Phebe P. Stokes, Anna H. Stokes, and M. S. and E. P. Allen, $4 (two vols.); William Scattergood, Pa.; Charles C. Scattergood, Pa.; William Evans, N. J.; Mary E. Cadwalader, Phila.; Emelin P. Newbold, Pa.; Anna M. Warrington and for Francis Warrington, Pa.; Henry Hall, F'k'd; Addison Hutton, G't'n; William Kite, Jr., G't'n; Elizabeth P. Smith, G't'n; Rebecca J. Allen, Pa.; Jesse Negu agent Ia., $10 for William D. Branson, Joseph Havelly, Rezin Thompson, M. M. Edmonson, and Joel Bear Calif.; Ellwood Cooper, Phila.; Deborah B. Parry, I. J.; Joshua Jefferis, Pa.; Leah J. Paxson, Ia.; Suss J. Paxson, Pa.; Eliza J. Barton, N. J.; George Haine N. J. $6 for himself, Lemuel P. Tomlinson, and Dr. H. Haines, Pa.; Emily Pusey, Pa.; Hannah Mickl N. J.; Lydia Ann Hendrickson, N. J.; Joseph M. Truman, Jr., Phila., $6 for George School, Librai Association of Friends, and Ellen A. Pine; Mary Beardsley, N. Y.; John W. Tatum, Pa.; James V. Edgerton, O.; Levi R. Cowperthwaite, N. J.; Joseph J. Hopkins, Pa.

Remittances received after Third-day noon will appear in the Receipts until the following week.

NOTICES.

A YOUNG woman Friend wishes to engage for the position of housekeeper. Add. "H," Office of THE FRIEND.

WANTED.—A young man to assist in a grocery store one who has had some experience preferred. Address "K," Office of THE FRIEND.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—A stated meeting of the Committee on Admissions will be held at Fourth & Arch Streets, on Seventh-day, the 28th instant at 10 A. JOHN W. BIDDLE, Clerk.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. 16th St., Phila.—During 1 Seventh and Eighth Months the Library will be open Second and Fifth-day afternoons from 3 P. M. to 6 P. M.

DIED, Sixth Month 17th, 1900, at her residence in this city, REBECCA W. KITE, widow of Joseph Kite, in 191st year; a member of the Monthly Meeting Friends of Philadelphia for the Northern District. Through early submission to the operations of Divine Grace, she was enabled to walk in the fear of the Lord, and was thus prepared for usefulness in the church. She was much attached to the doctrines and testimonies of the religious Society of Friends, endeavoring to maintain them in daily life and conversation. Her character was marked by firmness, and a conscientious discharge of what she felt to be her duty. Her lengthened years seemed a fulfillment of the Scripture promise, "Thou shalt come to a grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in season."

WILLIAM H. PILE'S SONS, PRINTERS, No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, EIGHTH MONTH 4, 1900.

No. 3.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,

(South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth,) PHILADELPHIA.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

Peace, as in the Churches.

The condition of church-peace is that in all things the church members abide under the vine authority. "God is the author of peace, in all the churches of the saints." To be a saint, or sanctified, is to be surrendered and conformed to the Divine will. A congregation of such is a church of saints, whose peace consists in his government. Without government peace is impossible. There is none to be had of the wicked, for lack of self-government in obedience to the Highest. Anarchy in the secret of the heart, anarchy in the functions of the body, anarchy in human society, is a confusion of which God is not the author. But when the government is on Christ's shoulder, as he leads over all things to his people, "of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end."

Of church-peace there is no effectual rule but its Ruler. He is our Peace. Rules of discipline may be a method of peace, but are as dead letter without its Prince. They excuse a man from continual resort to the fresh fountain of Peace and of all sufficiency as revealed in his own heart,—the ever unfolding law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus. Joined to his living Word, which may speak harmonious variations but never variance, members are joined to each other in the unity of the Spirit and the bond of Peace. If there be variance, it is cause for a retiring again, on the part of the differing minds, to a heart-searching inquiry, whether they are feeding on the same Word. What denial of self this is! "For the divisions of Reuben there are great searchings of heart." How honest is this, when we search not to confirm our own will, but to conform to the Divine. How few are so far out of error as to be willing to see to say, "I am in error!"

Rest to the churches from enemies round out may be turned into one of two conditions: Either a relapsing into sluggishness, or a filling up of the opportunity to walk in the fear of the Lord and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, so that they are edified and multiplied. (Acts ix: 31.) The peace which is occupied for mere rest, means decadence; the peace which comes of conformity to the Divine will, is kept alive by such conformity as in the churches of the saints, who walking, waiting, watching, praying and moving in the fear of the Lord and in the comfort of the Holy Spirit, are servants in churches that are multiplied. We are responsible for our peace, whether we rest in it for repose, or occupy it unto sanctification.

Exactly as in all churches of true saints, would the God of peace be its author everywhere. It is by practically rendering "glory to God in the highest," that there comes "peace on earth to men of good will," and "good will to men." As through conformity to his manifested will in churches, so by the same conformity is he the author of peace for all human governments. The simple rule of the world's peace is that the law-makers should wait on the voice of his Word, that the presidents and rulers should do the same, that individuals everywhere should mind the witness of his Spirit in preference to the maxims of this world. Thus only can his kingdom, which is his government, come. The voice of our brothers' blood over the earth is crying from large areas of ground, for the submission of our individual spirits to the one Lord, in order that the increase of his government and peace may come on, of which there shall be no end.

This is no Christless peace that we have mentioned, though the Saviour's name may not have been written. The peace of God being peace with men, peace on earth can be known only as men are reconciled to Him. "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself." The unreconciled reject his peace, until his Spirit convicts them of their alienation, and they crave for his mercy. The wages of sin stare them in the face until, if not past sensibility, they are shown the redeeming love of Him who tasted death, the wages of sin, for every man.

Happy for these, then, if they yield themselves to be reconciled to God by the death of his Son. So the way of peace is known, and the love of Christ constraineth us into his kingdom and government. He, our Mediator, is our peace, "who died for us, the Just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God." His gospel work is the one foundation, as of a man's, so of a nation's peace. Other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, even Jesus Christ. The word which God sent and sends, if men will hear it, preaches peace by Jesus Christ, as in all the churches of the saints, so in the councils of nations.

EXCELLENT PLATFORM POWERS. — Did the great apostle, of whom auditors could say, "his bodily presence is weak and his speech contemptible," gather or plant as a public speaker so many churches by "excellent platform powers," or "in demonstration of the Spirit and of power?" Or was it requisite that his speech or preaching should be in enticing words of man's wisdom?

Sometimes foolish things of this world are divinely chosen to confound the wise, and weak things to confound the mighty, and the silence of all flesh to confound the noise-lovers, that no flesh should glory in his presence. The intoxication of platform powers and of the wine of such exhilaration is often mistaken for inspiration of the Spirit, by those whose outward ear supersedes the inward.

Excellent platform powers may be a talent for ministry, just as they are for a political convention, the stage, or a lecture hall. But they are not the gift of the ministry any more than a beautiful voice is the gift of praise. Remarkable natural talents may be aids in delivering the gift when bestowed, but unless voicing the immediate message of the Spirit, they are "as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal."

A gift in the ministry is a spiritual impartation of Divine messages or openings of Truth for the good of others, with immediate authority to deliver them. The talents, natural or acquired, through which the Divine word is delivered are no part of the special gift or commission. Authority to minister does not consist in those talents, or in any imposition or call of the church, or in anything short of a living sense of the immediate Divine requiring. A stammering tongue, if the Lord choose to use it, is no bar to his baptism of power. An eloquent tongue, while the Lord is using it not, "feedeth on wind and followeth after the east wind."

Yet those excellent platform powers when bestowed on a man are given for a purpose—for some purpose of the glory of the Giver and of blessing to fellow-beings. Let him not despise nor neglect them, but hold them in readiness for his Master's call into their designed service. That service if obeyed, whether political, educational or religious, will always be Christian. And if a minister is endowed with special natural advantages for the discharge of his gospel service, he is not to suppress or stultify them because he is a minister—thus frustrating the purpose for which they were bestowed—but in humility of heart to suffer his best endowments “to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things.”

A HUNDRED YEARS' PILGRIMAGE.—“With long life wilt thou satisfy him,” may truly be said of one of our members who first saw the light in the year 1800, and who now, in the year 1900, is waiting for the sunset as the dawn.

The year 1800 has seemed to us prolific of men of character, and among such in our membership hereaway, many will remember Morris Cope, John Carter, Thomas Hutchinson, Charles Ellis, Charles Yarnall, John M. Whittall.

In carrying out our rule not to admit to our columns enconiums on our living members, we may perhaps be excused in drawing the line at the century mark. This trespass cannot often happen, nor would it now in a case likely to heed it as harm.

In the passing of his hundredth anniversary, a salutation of the love of many goes out to our beloved Friend John Bennington, concerning whom a brief account appeared in last number.

OVERRULING EVIL FOR GOOD.—Two communications of similar tenor have reached us about the same time. The first is an extract from the Presbyterian, which says:

It is a time for the exercise of faith. In these providential movements, so far beyond our control, let us hear the voice of Him who says: “What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter.”

In the face of present conditions, which terrify and bewilder, the whole Church of Christ needs the faith of the sea captain's child. She was asleep in the cabin when a storm burst upon the vessel, and she was awakened by the commotion and cried out in her fright. When told of the storm and the danger, she asked, “Is my father on deck?” They told her he was and was in command. “Then it will be all right,” she said, and lying down, sweetly fell to sleep again. If such sublime faith in the skill of an earthly father can triumph over danger, what should our confidence be in our all-wise and loving Saviour of his people who can cause the wrath of man to praise Him and the remainder thereof He can restrain! This work of saving men is his and we are only helpers. It is his work, to be carried on to the day of final triumph. Let the faith of every one rally under the voice of Him who said: “Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world.”

The other is a letter from a Friend who advises us to “get strong for a long Chinese war and other desolations. Keep optimistic under a feeling that these things—famine and all—in Omnipotent hands will do what our impotent quails at.”

For Using His Brains.

A young brakeman on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, who lives near Cumberland, Md., recently received from the railroad company a check for fifty dollars. It was a gift, and accompanying it was this memorandum: “For using his brains.”

The story which explains this gift is a very simple one, and yet it is well worth telling. It illustrates a fact which business men and employers are well aware of, that the man of brains is ready to act in an emergency on his own initiative, while the less intelligent person waits to be instructed, and loses the one opportunity for successful action.

This young man was a brakeman on a long freight train which one day was coming down the grade between Cranberry Summit and Fowlesburg, W. Va. He was on the front of the train, a long distance from the conductor—in the caboose in the rear—from whom he received his orders.

The train stopped with great suddenness. The brakeman did not know why it had stopped; he only knew that the cars were bumping together with noise and violence, and that something was wrong.

He also knew that the west-bound Chicago Express passed at about that time. He had not stopped to think this out; he was simply instantly aware of it, and was also aware that if he went back for orders, which would have been the natural, and, possibly, in a technical way, the proper thing for him to do, it might be too late to stop the express. Therefore, he rushed forward without orders and flagged the express, which, sure enough, was booming along upon them.

He arrived in the nick of time. A few seconds later would have been too late. As a matter of fact, four or five cars on the freight train were derailed, and they would have thrown the express into the river.

The acknowledgment from the railroad company of good judgment not only took the form of a check for fifty dollars, but the announcement of it was posted on a bulletin in the stations and shops.—Selected.

PAUPERING STUDENTS.—Free tuition, free room rent, free text books, and some spending money are among the inducements regularly and unblushingly held out to young men whose ultimate business in life will be to lead the religious thought and work of the community. To call such misplaced charity “pauperization,” as has been done, is to use a term none too strong.

It would not be difficult to show that such wholesale distribution of money, or money's worth, has had a positively debilitating effect upon the ministry, and has robbed the profession of much of the independence and manly vigor which it ought by all means to exhibit. In his now famous indictment of theological education—an indictment which, we are convinced, will ultimately be seen to have been one of the most notable of recent educational steps—President Hyde of Bowdoin College laid his finger upon this as one of the most unsound spots in the whole structure, and a condition in the continuance of which makes impossible a theological education adapted to the needs of the modern world.—New York Evening Post.

FOR “THE FRIEND.”

Sound Words.

(Continued from page 12).

To come down then, to the root of the matter, since “no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost” (1 Cor. xii: 3), it necessarily follows that all such sayings without a sense of this spirit of grace are not the witness God asks for, and therefore are not true. “I receive not testimony from man” (John v: 34) i. e., from the natural knowledge and wisdom of man, which is only fitted to understand natural created things, but the spirit of God, the Creator must first be received, as God is only known in and through his own spirit, in order that man may know whom he addresses and worships, else he worships he “knows not what.”

Legion is the name of the multitude of words and terms, invented by an apostate church, apostatized from the power and guidance of God's spirit, to distinguish its notions and imaginations of God and his work towards men; all which words are intended to define those things, which to man, unaided of God, are incomprehensible. The terms used become cloaks to cover up a suppositious knowledge, the almamater of priestcraft in every age of the world.

What need we say to such words as the following as applied to mortal man? I quote from their own authors, and can substantiate what I say, as regards the Pope, “that being canonically elected he is God upon earth,” that he “holds on earth not only the rank of a sinless man, but of a true God;” “to whose trust the dispensation of Divine mysteries has been committed.” We are then to hear him what soever he shall say, who is to us as a God, in those things that concern God (as powerful as God himself;” “all the acts of the Pope must be considered as the acts of God;” his followers are taught to call him “the Vicegerent of God,” “Representative of Christ,” “the Great Infallible Head of the Church,” “Prince of the Apostles,” “His Holiness.” Besides these, what of the terms “mass,” “purgatory,” “auricular confession,” “indulgences,” and a host of other excrescences borrowed from paganism and grafted on to Christianity, but so clumsily done that no life of the vine could possibly flow into such things. Faint is the glimmer of the gospel ray that finds its way to the hearts of those shrouded in these things.

And though the church was largely purged of many of these hindering things by the Reformation, as brought about by such instrument as Jerome of Prague, John Huss, Wycliffe, Martin Luther, Melancthon, Zwingli, Calvin, Knox, and a galaxy of lesser lights, yet it was not that a pure language was again bestowed on the church of Christ till there arose men who came direct to the fountain of all heavenly wisdom, the guidance of the Spirit of Christ, and refused to be led by the love of those who retained among themselves lingering rootlets of such noxious weeds, again under favoring conditions to spring up and flourish.

These men as little children, sitting at the feet of Jesus, whom now they knew had come to teach his people himself in fulfilment of his promise, were taught by this grace of God and led in a path diverse from others. Obeying their Divine guide, a quick discernment was given to them to avoid every stumbling stone in this path of the cross, and they clearly saw danger which others heedless fell into.

This people were peculiar in their ways and words, patient in suffering, full of forgiveness and mercy, and active in works of philanthropy. They were learned in Holy Scripture, and able to give to every man a reason of the hope within them, and the why and the wherefore of their seeming peculiarities. Nor should we retain these without at the same time by cogent reasons being able to convince the gainsayers of their rectitude, if we do not succeed in persuading them to do likewise. Error there had been, and error there still was, and if through the clear light, beaming from the faithful early Friends, the world now sees more clearly, we must ever remember they were favored to see the incipient causes that led to these decadences, and seeing, to avoid them. Would we then as successors to these standard-bearers of the Truth, still have its light to shine in us, our safeguard lies in our doing as they did, keep the lamp's wick clean. Led by the same spirit, we shall be led into the same path of Truth: "Speak ye the truth every man to his neighbor;" "Set a watch, O Lord, over my lips, that I sin not against thee." Our words, like theirs were, should be sweet, savoury and wholesome, words of truth and righteousness, the outcome of love to man and obedience to God.

Let us then now come home to our own household of faith and examine some words as used by some of our members, and measure them by the line of Truth.

(To be continued.)

THE NEED OF QUIETNESS.—We read that "Isaac went out to meditate in the field at eventide." Where and when do the business men of our day meditate. They have no time for it. The precept, Commune with your own heart and in your own chamber, and be still, is never obeyed by them, and as a consequence their inner spiritual life is starved and they have little or no influence for good upon others. Let us try to resist this habit of being always in the din, always in a turmoil, and, however busy, take time to consider our ways, that we may be, if not wise, at least less foolish. The busiest workers have generally an hour in the middle of the day in which to eat and rest, a part of which they might spend in communion with a better world. And, when talking to his work through the most crowded streets, a man may acquire the habit of being as much alone with his thoughts as he would be in the Sahara desert.

Calm soul of all things! make it mine
To feel amid the city's jar,
That there abides a peace of thine
Man did not make and cannot mar.

—Great Thoughts.

If you wish your children to be respectful to you, then you should make a point of being respectful to them. The boys and girls who are always spoken to in a harsh, rough tone of voice naturally fall into the habit of responding in the same way. Parental dignity and authority may be asserted with the utmost firmness and yet without coarseness or arrogance. In fact, it cannot well be asserted in any other way. A rude father or mother is likely to have rude sons and daughters. —Nashville Advocate.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Silent Worship.

The poem entitled "Thoughts in a Religious Meeting" is perhaps familiar to some of the older readers of THE FRIEND, but may not be so to some of the present day. A part of the sentiments which follow may have been published at different times, but being truthful, and embraced under the one head of "Silent Worship," may be confirming and comforting to some of this generation. W. P. T.

Though few in number, Father, Lord!
Still in thy name we come,
To wait for thy inteaching Word,
Though human lips be dumb;
Though neither sad, nor joyful tone
Be lent to mortal ear,
Thou, Thou, who knowest the heart alone,
Wilt kindly listen here.

The while a cold and formal throng
We seem to mortal eyes,
Thou knowest full many a grateful song,
And many a burdened sigh,
And heartfelt prayers for strength and grace,
To walk from error free,
Rise from this silent gathering place
In sounds of power to Thee.

The few that here are wholly thine,
Who tread the narrow way,
Told not by outward seal or sign
Of their baptismal day.
Thou only, knowest the way and time,
Their covenant began,
Thou, only when they seek sublime
Communion with thy Son.

Join me to these, as deep to deep,
Their way be still my choice.
My soul e'en as an infant keep,
That knows its parent's voice.
While others labor in thy cause,
With words of power and skill
Be it but mine to know thy laws,
To love Thee, and be still.

Money in Butterflies.

A bright English girl, living in California, has made a small fortune from the study of these insects. Success has dropped her blossoms into the lap of Mary Yeomans, so that everyone calls her a clever woman. When she first began to catch butterflies, her neighbors, who chanced to know of it, called her a "bug catcher," and many a tale they told at her expense to shorten the long trails over the mountain. But when they found there was money to be had for the butterflies and saw her increasing her stock and buying more land, the farmer folk wished they knew which of the butterflies were the rare ones.

Mary Yeomans knew, and because she knew, she owns a ranch worth to-day $40,000. An English girl, she had collected butterflies for pleasure at home and knew how rare and how valuable some of the species were.

She knew that in Europe rich men and women collected butterflies and would journey half around the world to find a missing species. She knew, too, that they were glad to pay well for what they wanted. Besides the private people, are museums, the academies of science and colleges, all wanting collections.

She had visited great establishments in London and Paris, where the sole stock in trade was thousands and thousands of butterflies and beetles and insects.

With her three brothers she came to live in the wilds of Northern California twenty years ago, three gentle people who must for the first time take thought of what they should eat and wherewithal they should be clothed.

Like most English colonists they came out to farm, and how well they have succeeded their well-fenced miles of sheep-lands show. They took up a great tract of land, and when they went out to open up woods and build fences over it, Mary was afraid to stay at home alone, and went with her brothers, camping for some times for days.

In her new home she had forgotten butterflies till, one hot afternoon, as she lay on the mountain side under a great mossy tanbark oak listening to the distant strokes of an ax, a flock of great yellow, pansy-like wings hovered a moment over her and then flew up the mountainside to a patch of yellow honeysuckle.

All alert in a moment, she followed the butterflies up the steep mountain-side. She thought she recognized them as a species known only in the higher Alps, and very rare and valuable.

"When at last I did get one in my hands I was sure it was the very kind. I was too excited to wait till morning, which is the best time to catch butterflies, because they are sluggish then in the cold, damp foliage. I caught six before night, and the rest of the flock in the morning. I pinned one out carefully and sketched it in water color. I had to be saving in my postage, so I sent the sketch instead of a box of butterflies home to England.

"Such a long wait it was, and fancy my delight when I had word at last to send all the butterflies to London. You would never guess what they offered me for them, $25 each; and as there were twenty-three of them, I had the tidy little sum of $575, all my own, and the first money I ever owned in my life. That was my beginning, and I was always on the lookout for butterflies. With my money I bought ten fancy sheep." Mary Yeoman's cellar is not for eatables, but is her nursery for beetles.

What appears to be unsplit stove wood lies in rows on the floor. Each piece has been split, but tied together again, and in each piece are different species of beetles. They eat the wood, making their way out, and lay their eggs in the wood.

"I keep watch, and when a beetle gets to the surface I put it back. The most valuable one? It all depends upon the demand. A beetle is worth just what I can get for it. Dr. Le Fontain, who came out from France to study the insects of California, came to our house by chance. He did not tell us who he was, merely that he was a stranger passing through the country, but when I chanced to see him before dawn creeping out with a candle in his hand under the pine trees, I knew he must be after insects. He was in raptures over the beauty he had found, and when I told him about my butterflies and showed him what I had, he forgot all his English and rhapsodized in French.

"He taught me a great deal about beetles, and told me of a certain one he was most eager to find in California. He believed it was here, though he could not find it. It had been found only in Italy, and had almost disappeared. Ah? you had better not look at it; you will be disappointed." She poked about in a box of twigs and laid in my hand what was to me a most ordinary little black bug with long, slender legs, and then she placed beside it a little round red one, no larger than the head of a pin.

"The tiny one is the one which Dr. Le Fontain traveled miles and miles to find and could not—I found it. The other is the 'beauty' he caught under the pine trees.

"You understand, a collection of beetles is not complete without all the different species. Some are very common, but others are most difficult to find. Dr. Le Fontain made a sketch of the beetle he was looking for, and then we went out to find a mate for the 'beauty' he had caught in the morning, for where one is, more are sure to be. We found four, and they were the ancestors of the ones I have here. He showed me how to make what we call a 'series.' That is, a butterfly or a beetle in all its stages from the egg to the perfect creature—each stage shown by a specimen and tacked in order on a card. I always made notes as to time each stage requires and food and where the life was lived. He was so kind and interested I was delighted when at last I found what he wanted. It was three summers ago, and I made a long journey for it.

"I had wanted for so long to go back to the redwoods we passed coming up. You stopped in the woods, and know that the silence of the great trees haunts one who has once known it. Brother Tom and I made the journey on horseback, and camped a week right in the heart of the belt. It was there I found my beetle. I carried a great white sheet along and spread it on the ground. Taking up an armful of dried pine needles, I shook it over the sheet. If any of the fallen particles scuttled off I knew it was an insect, and one of the scuttling insects was my long-wished for much desired beetle.

The Indians know about butterflies, and know where to find them, and they are the only ones who have helped me to any extent, except a Chinaman. I have a great respect for Chinamen and Indians; they see things which few of our own white civilized men can comprehend, even though it means dollars."

We went back to Mary Yeoman's sitting-room—a room speaking of more culture, more real living, than almost any room I ever entered; maybe, because, only stronger personalities lived there, and their strength had not been diluted by complex living. On the floor were skins—bear, panther, coyote, and many I did not know. There were beautiful Indian baskets with bird plumages, and many books and engravings and water color sketches. At one end the room, the only one not having great windows looking into the oak grove or the mountains, was covered with mounted butterflies, blue and brown and red and pink, yellow, white, and colors for which I have no name. Each had its story, and a tale of mates which had journeyed across the sea to tell those who cared to know that the butterflies of California are the most gorgeous of all the world.—Philadelphia Press.

CHARACTER is a thing rather of growth than of building. A house is built, and every brick and board is just where it was put by some man's work; but a Christian character grows, and all its graces are the development of an inner life, and the result not merely of our work, but also of God's inbreathing.—The Treasury.

LINES.

Selected.

Since o'er thy footstool here below
Such radiant gems are strewn
Oh! what magnificence must glow,
My God, about thy throne!
So brilliant here these drops of light,
There the full ocean rolls, how bright!

If night's blue curtain of the sky
With thousand stars inwrought,
Hung like a royal canopy,
With glittering diamonds fraught,
Be, Lord, thy temple's outer veil,
What splendor at the shrine must dwell!

The dazzling sun at noon-tide hour,
Forth from his flaming vase
Flinging o'er earth the golden shower,
Till vale and mountain blaze,
But shows, O Lord, one beam of thine
What then the day where thou dost shine!

Ah, how shall these dim eyes endure
That noon of living rays;
Oh how my spirit so impure,
Upon thy glory gaze!
Anoint, O Lord, anoint my sight,
And robe me for that world of light.

Moral Weight of Small Parties.

To the editor of the Springfield Republican:—

Under the heading, "The Influence of the Quakers," the Literary Digest alludes to the Friends in connection with the recent wars, and quotes from the Springfield Republican and the New York Sun. The former paper, while regretting the diminution of their numbers, gives the Quakers credit for a high moral standard, and for a consistent and persistent opposition to all wars as anti-Christian, and also for a wholesome influence in that direction. The Sun doubts their ever having exerted much influence against war, giving as a reason for this the continuance of wars. Dr. David Gregg, in a sermon at Brooklyn on Forefathers' day, 1896, attributes to the influence of the Friends many of the great reforms which have taken place in the last two hundred and fifty years. He says:

"The Quakers, when seen at their best, stand in American history for ideal civilization; and this civilization is their contribution to the American republic. As historic characters, the Quakers are a marked and influential people in the midst of the most marked and influential types of mankind; they have put their stamp indelibly on national and international life. . . . They differed from all the sects around them in that they renounced the use of all force in the propagation of their principles. They inculcated and practised religious toleration. They have the honor of being one of the five divisions of Christendom against which charges of cruelty and selfishness and love of power cannot be brought. Their gun was a protest, their bullet a principle, and their powder the inner light. They served the church and State by what they were. Their method of pushing their faith was to be what they believed and then assert themselves. They exalted the passive virtues. This was the method of Jesus Christ. All which Jesus ever did in this world was to assert himself and suffer. When violence was used against them their principle of action was, never retaliate. Their method of growth was by patience and perseverance and quiet suffering, and their method was effective. For example, they carried their religion into the Massachusetts colony, and planted it right in the midst of the hard-headed Puritans. The Puritans persecuted them, whipped them, robbed them, hung them, but they kept right on asserting themselves and suffering until, by their patience, they wore out the cruelty of the Puritans and brought the Puritan scourge and scaffold into public disgrace. The public, won over to them by their beautiful spirit, rose and demanded the cessation of persecution. Thus they purchased and established for us by their sufferings the religious toleration which now exists in our republic."

The Sun assumes that because wars continue the Quakers' faith is naught, and that they have exerted no influence toward hastening the time when "people shall learn war no more." Let the editor of the Sun read Gregg's eloquent discourse in full.

We may not conclude that all efforts toward reform not fully successful are futile. This ground would condemn the prophets, Christ and his disciples, as well as many reformers in every age of the world. Quakerism will be unpopular as long as mankind esteem money office and power the only true success. Present defeat often portends the fullest ultimate success. In the popular current of war now sweeping like a mighty desolation over the world, few have the independence to stand firm for Christianity as taught and exemplified by Jesus!

Who can fathom the depth of iniquity into which the United States as a nation has sunk and the basic motive which caused the war in the Philippines? The Philadelphia Press, which says Amen to all Administration measures said, some months ago that it was necessary and quite time that our country had a new outlet for its products. When the city of Manila came under the control of our government, what were the first, or among the first, exportations to that place? Intoxicating liquors. Four hundred saloons were opened where scarcely any existed before. Did not the distillers and brewers, the exporters of those liquors, and the great, complicated money-making interests of the country play a large part in helping to cause the war? And the glory accorded to military heroes was another tremendous interest.

In the first place, war is always contrary to the teaching of our blessed Saviour. Shall we Christianize the heathen by killing and maiming thousands of them, and making them drunk with our poisonous liquors? No wonder that Jesus spoke so much against hypocrisy. Alas money and popularity are the great shrine before which we as a nation fall down and worship!

There is so much sophistry in the speaking and writing of the present day, that one's soul often rises up in indignation and rebellion against the attempt to put darkness for light and light for darkness.*

When Pharaoh, king of Egypt, ordered that the male children of the Hebrews to be destroyed, he thought to put an end to the Hebrew people. But God saved Moses alone to deliver his people out from under the hand of their cruel taskmaster. When Daniel th phet was cast into the den of lions, his enemies thought they should see him no more. When our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, was crucified, and all men forsook Him and fled, and it was such a disgrace to be his disciple that Peter denied Him—it seemed to the scribes and pharisees of that day that the persistent fellow and his disciples were all down and out of the way. Was it so? And, now, because temperance reform is unpopular, does it follow that this class of people are forever one with their labors? Or that the everlasting God, the Creator of the ends of the earth, weary? Or that his own children, who, in humility of heart, cry mightily unto Him—“Spare thy people and give not thine heritage to reproach,” will not be heard?

*An illustration, which might be construed as taken in the interest of one of the political parties, is properly omitted from THE FRIEND.

We hear quite too much boasting about our beloved country, when corruption is in high places, and the peaceable, prayerful “armies of the living God are defied.” “Who art thou that thou should be afraid of a man that shall die, and of the son of man which shall be made as grass; and forgettest the Lord, thy Maker, that hath stretched forth the heavens and laid the foundations of the earth and hast feared continually every day because of the fury of the oppressor, as if he were ready to destroy? and where is the fury of the oppressor?”

It may seem easy and pleasant to drift with the popular current—to walk in the broad way. Yet how much sweeter the peace, how incomparably greater the joy, of the few who travel the straight and narrow way that leadeth unto everlasting life! Christianity is not a myth, nor is it something to be taken up and laid down to accomplish the selfishness of the regenerate human heart. No people or nation who disregard eternal truths can always prosper. History furnishes abundant illustration of this. It is “righteousness that exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people.”

JOHN W. FOSTER.

WESTERLY, R. I., Fourth Month 4th, 1900.

STRENGTH OF A BEETLE.—The following anecdote of a three-horned beetle will give me an idea of its vast strength of body. A beetle was brought in, and, there being no box at hand in which to put it, it was clapped under a quart bottle of milk which happened to be on the table, the hollow at the bottom of the bottle allowing the insect to stand upright.

Presently the bottle began to move slowly and glide along the smooth table, propelled by the muscular power of the imprisoned beetle, and continued its travels for some time, to the astonishment of all who witnessed it. The weight of the bottle and its contents could not have been less than three and a half pounds, while that of the beetle was about half an ounce, so that it readily moved a weight 112 times greater than its own.

A better notion than figures can convey will be obtained of this feat by supposing a lad of fifteen to be imprisoned under a great bell weighing 12,000 pounds and to move it to and fro upon a smooth pavement by pushing it from behind.

“ARE not two sparrows sold for a farthing?” said again, “Are not five sparrows sold for two things?” Even the odd sparrow, thrown in to make up the bargain, is not forgotten, and never much we may be forgotten by man, and remembers the weakest and poorest of us.”

And the Lord said unto him, Arise and go into the street which is called Straight, and inquire in the house of Judas for one called Saul of Tarsus, for behold he prayeth.”

When Saul stopped short in the pathway of crime,
And humbled, his Master obeyeth,
The word of the Lord to Ananias came
Of “go unto Saul” for he prayeth.
In the bonds of affection, cemented by love
Let us humbly our Maker implore
That the spirit of prayer He will on us bestow
And teach us his Son to adore.
Then when we are called from the trilles of earth
We will gladly the messenger know
And with angels and saints, sing the songs of the Lamb
Where the waters of life ever flow.

THOMAS KITE.

A Declaration by Albert Barnes.

The last years of the late civil war a call was made by the Christian Commission for clerical volunteers to go to the front to perform various duties in behalf of soldiers in the field, minister to the sick in hospitals, and perform the last sad rites for such as had given their lives for their country's good. Though far removed from the seat of war, the writer responded to the call, his route on his mission leading him through Philadelphia. Being directed to Albert Barnes's church, thither he made his way with other strangers anxious to see and hear one of the great divines of the century. At that time Albert Barnes was in the height of his popularity, a man of strong physique, of great dignity of bearing, with a well-modulated voice and a masterly style of oratory, captivating and inspiring. Very brief notes of the morning sermon are here given from the writer's diary of that memorable Sabbath. The sermon was based on the ninth chapter of Daniel and the last part of the twenty-sixth verse: “The end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined.”

1. War is one of the fatal scourges of mankind. (1) Its desolations are seen in ravaged territory, ruined and despoiled cities, in the destruction of formidable navies, in paralyzed national resources, and in the creation of a national debt, often exceeding the ability of the people to pay. (2) The desolations of war are specially seen in the disintegration of society, taking vast numbers of citizens from the walks of business life, interfering with the financial affairs of a people, leaving many portions of the country without the men and agencies to insure a fair degree of financial prosperity. (3) The desolations of war have a marked injurious effect on the moral and religious condition of a nation. The demoralizing effects of war are seen in the destruction of churches located within the province of contending armies and in the breaking up of religious associations and congregations, for a time left like scattered sheep without a shepherd. A certain proportion of those engaged in war are members of respective churches and congregations; but camp life soon tests their loyalty to Christ, and if they are fortunate enough to survive the conflict, generally return to their homes shorn of a Christian profession, and in too many instances are henceforth classed with the skeptical and irreligious.

2. In the providence of God the scourge of war is often overruled in mysterious ways for the establishment and reorganization of new churches and the consolidation of religious interests, making the Church of God stronger and more successful after the trials and disasters resulting from the desolations of war. The results of the present war are seen in the opening of a vast territory for missionary labor and sacrifice; especially is this true with regard to the South, where millions of free blacks now await the coming of peace and the diffusion of religious education, for which they have sighed for two hundred years. A wide field is now open for the people's evangelization, and already the Macedonian cry reverberates over vale and mountain, “Come over and help us.” (God help us to respond to the Macedonian call!

[The overruling of evil for good was not presented as justifying evil.]—W. M. Osborne, in Christian Advocate.

FOR “THE FRIEND.”

Doukhorbor Notes.

The ride of thirty-five miles from Yorkton to the South Colony was accomplished as comfortably as could be expected by our friends, Jonathan E. Rhoads and Jos. S. Elkinton, on the Twenty-fifth of Sixth Month. The general appearance of the prairie was beautiful, and the sloughs were not so full of water as a year ago.

The first village (Terpenie) they came to had some twenty-five houses in two rows, with a wide avenue between them. Trees had been planted with vegetable and flower gardens near these homes. Within they were clean looking—reflecting much credit on the inmates—considering the many disadvantages under which they labor. The reception and hospitality given the visitors was most cordial—literally with “open arms.” The rooms are poorly ventilated, and the mosquitoes were quite attentive to their newly arrived guests.

Two sick women were visited early next morning. The services of a doctor is one of the most pressing needs of the colonists at the present time, as in every village some are found seriously ill. Meetings for worship were held in this and each village visited. The neatness of the women's dresses, and their animated countenances, made a very favorable impression on the visitors.

The gathering was out of doors and was very satisfactory. The Doukhobors prefer to go through their bowing, kissing and chanting exercises at first, after which they willingly grant the remaining time to those who will address them, giving close attention to the speaker and not infrequently expressing their appreciation with tears.

The village of Petrofka Orlofka lay next in their course of travel. Jno. Marchatoff lives there. He gave them a warm welcome and proposed to accompany Jonathan E. Rhoads and company through the South Colony, which he did acceptably, entering into the spirit of their exercises very helpfully. He sometimes supplemented the efforts of the interpreter by conveying the truth spoken, although not speaking English himself. For one of ninety years, his physical strength is remarkable. He had letters from their brethren in Siberian exile, which he read to the wives and mothers of the absent ones. His recital of the visit of Stephen Grellet (1819) to his native village in Russia, published in the columns of THE FRIEND last summer, was listened to by our friends with much interest. Ivan Verigin, who accompanied Joseph S.

Elkinton and William Bellows a year ago, is an elder in this community, and acted as spokesman for the Doukhobors. At first it was somewhat difficult for Jonathan E. Rhoads to become accustomed to the interruptions incident to the interpreting. William McDonald lives in this neighborhood, and gathered his family for a meeting one evening, which was very favored with true religious feeling—some twenty present. The thrifty condition of this farm shows what can be expected of the country under good management. The vegetable garden was in advance of anything in that line seen in Canada.

On the 27th the village of Nikolaefka was visited. They were rather short of provisions, and not much prospect of a staple crop, as the men are off at work on the railroad. It has been somewhat disappointing to find so little ground under cultivation in many of the villages—unavoidable as it may be under the circumstances. This will necessitate some help to get over the coming winter.

Joseph S. Elkinton wishes "Those who have contributed for the help of the Doukhobors might take satisfaction, not only in that their gifts have been accepted with gratitude, but also in the improved condition of the recipients." The colonists in this village were those who spent a few months in Cyprus, and their general appearance is decidedly better than it was a year ago. Our English Friends may feel it was a good investment to bring them across the Atlantic.

An open-air meeting was held, and Jonathan E. Rhoads expressed the pleasure it gave him to see how much care had been taken to impress the children with religious thoughts, while Jos. S. Elkinton encouraged the women to keep under the exercise of spirit they manifested for their husbands and sons while at work (in the distance)—hoping the time would come when they could very generally be employed on their own land and live with their families. The amount of work done in the absence of the men is highly creditable to the women. Some six thousand dollars worth of Senega root has been gathered by the women and children of the North and South Colonies, and sold at Yorkton. At Waskrasenofka they found a widow whose husband died in Cyprus, a son, father-in-law and mother-in-law in Russia. She had been out gathering this root, and, returning on a wagon, was thrown to the ground, breaking her ribs on the wheel. She was suffering much. In this and similar cases assistance was rendered.

The Assiniboine River had to be crossed that evening. The current had evidently carried away the rope and raft, and the stream seemed about as fearful as it did last winter, but into it they drove, with two strong Doukhobor men behind to keep the wagon from upsetting.

Three or four men, returning from their work on the railroad, were met near this crossing—they had walked one hundred miles, and felt heart- and foot-sore. One of them had been to California during the winter. In several villages half the houses were visited by twilight and the remainder in the morning. Sometimes Jonathan E. Rhoads did not feel equal to the morning visits. Their meetings, when held in the evenings, were generally at ten P. M., so it was often well on to midnight before there was opportunity to retire. The bed is a low form, extending along one side of the main room. Thus they slept feet to feet. This village was enclosed by a fence, say twenty-five acres, with two avenues at right angles, dividing it into four squares. One of these avenues was one hundred feet wide and the other sixty feet. There was a store-room and stable within the enclosure. The houses were set down in the ground four or five steps, as they were built of sod at first, the effect being rather chilling.

It was a pretty sight to see the women and girls seated on one side, with the men and boys opposite them, and John Marchatoff addressing the girls in his native language, after which the children sang "If I could know the end of my life." The mothers were encouraged to bear their trials.

When Jonathan E. Rhoads stood up to speak, all assembled arose, also. He spoke of the respect due to elders; that all had their own responsibilities which could be fulfilled by the help of the Holy Spirit; he expressed sympathy particularly for the mothers and dwelt upon the true source of wisdom and knowledge.

Joseph S. Elkinton referred to the sufferings of some before their day, who had gone to be with Jesus, and desired their descendants might keep up their faith and courage and receive strength, for their trials, which were heavy. The leading woman gave thanks for all, and asked that the women might sing a Psalm, after which supplication was made in behalf of those present, for preservation in that condition upon which the divine blessing would increasingly rest.

The history of the sick young woman, in the house where the meeting was held, is typical of others. She was stolen from her home in Russia by the Tartars, with another girl, and tied to fences at night with their hands fastened behind them. By some means they escaped to Tiflis, just as the Doukhobors were leaving for America. Her brother was much more decided in his testimony for the truth than his father, and was locked up in a cellar, evidently with the intention of starving him to death. His sisters, however, found a hole through which to slide bread and water, and finally got the lock off the door. This man had been offered twenty dollars a month and board for a year by a farmer in Canada, but as he had a family, he did not want to leave them.

The solemnity accompanying some of the meetings was very impressive, and Jonathan E. Rhoads' remarks here were particularly weighty. There is quite a difference in the amount of work done and the improvements made among the villagers. Where assistance was most needed, money was left to be used in such ways as would be most helpful. Their aged companion (John Marchatoff) was thrown rather severely against the dashboard while crossing "a very ugly gully with quite a bluff on the far side," but he recovered from the blow on his forehead by the time they reached the next village. Jonathan E. Rhoads and Joseph S. Elkinton had gotten out of the wagon before attempting to cross at this place.

On Seventh Month 1st they were in the village of Slawanka, where the houses were built against the bank, somewhat resembling huts in appearance. The principal man of the place (Vasily Kabatoff) and a princely looking one he was, had vacated his house for their use, where they enjoyed the luxury of hot and cold water and a good night's rest. Jos. S. Elkinton says "We walked out before breakfast to get a little fresh air, and I saw a sight that did me good—a regular barnyard scene—horses, oxen, cows and calves, the best show I had seen amongst them. We were shown a pan of egg last evening. A few of the Doukhobors were a little discouraged lest their crops should fail them, as there had been a little frost, but trust their courage will not fail.

"They are an interesting people and although we would in no wise wish to change residence with them, yet happiness is to be found in these humble houses, and there are persons residing in them of marked character, both as regard physical, intellectual and religious ability or experience. We had a good meeting and could tell them we were glad to be among them, in addition to what was communicated in a religious way."

On arrival at the next village they were met by some thirty-two girls and fifteen boys, who gave them an audience before dinner was served by the women—the latter are very helpful at all times; J. S. E. adds, "It is a great treat when we can have an egg apiece.

"There were several sick in this settlement (Blagodarnaija) with the greatest fatality (11) in any village yet visited. Typhoid fever may have done its work. It is solemn work moving among the sick and afflicted, but may result in an enlargement both of experience and understanding."

Jonathan E. Rhoads thought the meeting very profitable occasion, and he gave thanks for the favors experienced.

The Doukhobors in the different villages wished their many kind friends in the distance to know how much they appreciated the gifts received during the winter.

"Seventh Month 2nd.—Arrived at Pokroff before dinner and took a little rest. This is the first village we have entered to know that its property was held by individuals—and not in community; there was therefore quite a contrast in the properties. It did not seem as though they had been out of their dugout long; there are a few who still live in the caves, and I have only seen two places where the stables were under the same roof, or where the entrance had to be through the stable which is a different state of affairs from last winter.

"We saw in one house a man of ninety-nine years of age, still possessing powers of comprehension, and seemingly in a sweet spirit. In another place our sympathies were drawn out on behalf of a younger person who was in debt for a horse that died. It was very exciting for us, but we got through with a good feeling resting on the minds of the people, we might judge by their expressions, and we parted it was here, as in most if not in other occasions, with a message and thanks to their brothers and sisters in Philadelphia.

"Although the number of horses and cows would indicate a degree of thrift, on the whole the village was behind most places where there was a similar number on the community system, but eventually we would suppose that a division of property, or at least of persons pursuing business on their individual responsibility, would commend itself.

"Proceeded on to the village Spasofka. The quite a gathering in front of one of their uses, but we decided to do our visiting before supper and have our meeting afterwards, each course we pursued. We did not find many disabled, and we had an interesting one in our social converse through our interpreter (Simeon Roreaff) who is the leading man. He has a very nicely fitted-out cottage with regular bedsteads, etc.; one of his sons a carpenter and is out working for a farmer two dollars a day. We have seen several regularly fitted out blacksmith shops within the past few days.

"After supper we had our meeting, in which Nathan and I were deeply engaged; adjourned ten o'clock, feeling that we had done enough for one day."

(To be continued.)

Birds Killed by the Arc Lights.

In the City Hall, Philadelphia, an interesting record has been kept by W. L. Baily of observations on birds, which owe their destruction to electric arc lights, which are arranged in a circle around a statue of William Penn. The first victim to death by electricity seems to have been a "sora rail" picked up in Eighth month, 1897. Since that time records have been kept of all birds found, their species being noted and the conditions of the weather. During migratory periods every morning was apt to reveal several dead birds near the lights. One hundred and twenty-nine specimens have been secured. The Philadelphia Press thus summarizes W. Baily's account:

W. Baily states that he finds it a most convenient, as well as fairly accurate way of observing the fall migration of birds, the electrician of the tower merely pushing the button and the lights doing the rest. The weather, its severity, changes of temperature, moonlight, etc., being especially noted as affecting the flight and number of victims. Observations show that in the fall of 1897 only about thirty were led astray, and six the following spring; while during a short period in the month, 1898, thirty-two were added to the list. During the great parade and Industrial Exposition of last year, when especial illumination was made and four festoons of lamps hung from the rim of Penn's hat, the harvest of birds was greatly increased, no less than 452 birds being picked up in two months. The writer thinks that the reason so few old birds strike the light is that they are experienced travelers, while the young birds, like children, are fascinated by the light and are led to destruction. This is especially so on dark and stormy nights when the birds fly nearer the earth. On moonlight nights no birds strike, except toward morning after the moon has disappeared. Another fact is noted that birds not only migrate in the early evening, but all night until break of day.

THE THINGS WORTH DOING.—If life is spent in a mad scamper after things of no real value, even after valuable things we can grasp but superficially, it is as much wasted as if thought were dulled or opportunities neglected. The busy mind should not injure itself by gorging at it cannot digest. Wisdom lies in clearly discriminating the things worth doing, the objects worth pursuing, from those which, though perhaps good for others, may not be good for us.—Christian Register.

Notes from Others.

It is a moot-point, after centuries of experiment, whether civilization or Christianity can be successfully inoculated with the sword.—Boston Transcript.

It is the testimony of many that churches do not recover from the demoralizing influence of tourists and summer boarders, through all the remainder of the year. Young people learn from them to idle away holy time and never forget the lesson.

EVERY soul in its approach to God needs a Divine Mediator, not a human one. The priest stands in the way of a close and personal intercourse with God. Protestantism magnifies a Christly Mediatorship; Romanism exalts a churchly one. The conflict between them is on in Great Britain and in other lands, and the sole advocacy of Christ must be more and more emphasized.—Presbyterian.

THE OLDEST NEWSPAPER.—No list of newspaper curiosities would be complete that did not include the Kin-Pau of Peking. Like most things in the Celestial Kingdom, it is easily first in point of antiquity, for it has been published continuously for over one thousand years. It began as a monthly, became a weekly in 1361, and since the beginning of the century has been a daily. It is now quite up to date, publishing three editions a day, and, to safeguard the publisher from wiles that are not altogether unknown to the newsboys of London, each edition is printed on different colored paper, the first being yellow, the second white, and the last gray. Decidedly, the Kin-Pau can be described as "an old-established journal."—London Chronicle.

AN ANCIENT PRAYER.

"O Benefactor, who can escape Thy hail?
Thy will is the sublime sword with which Thou rulest heaven and earth.
I commanded the sea, and the sea became calm;
I commanded the flower, and the flower ripened to grain;
I commanded the circuit of the river, and by the will of the Benefactor I turned its course.
How sublime art Thou!
What transitory being equal to Thee!
O Benefactor amongst all the gods,
Thou art the rewarder!
O Lord of battles!
Merciful one among the gods!
Generator who bringest back the dead to life!
Beneficent King of heaven and earth
To Thee is the life of life,
To thee belong life and death!"

The above remarkable prayer, reprinted from the Literary Digest, is said to be as old as the time when Sargon reigned over the Akkadians, many centuries B. C. Clearly monotheistic, it might be used in the worship of some Christian churches today, where it is not uncommon to hear prayers made without any reference to the deity of our Lord Jesus Christ or his atoning work of redemption.—Episcopal Recorder.

CIRCULAR FROM THE JESUITS.

"MANILA, April 15th.—(Correspondence of the Associated Press.)—The most sensational of the events of the past week has been the general distribution by the Jesuits of a pamphlet in which is set forth the 'truths which Christians must observe.' Some of the things most strongly condemned by the Jesuits in this pamphlet are those which the American government has pledged itself to carry out; notably religious tolerance and the recognition of civil marriage. Consequently, this act of the Jesuits is considered by many to be an attack upon the American administration. The pamphlet in question says:

"1. The commands of the Church must be obeyed in the same manner as the law of God.

"2. You must subject your own judgment to that of the Church and think exactly as the Church thinks, for the Church cannot be overcome.

"3. You must reject and condemn the Masonic sect, so frequently rejected and condemned by the supreme pontiffs.

"4. You must also reject and condemn liberty of worship, liberty of the press, liberty of thought, and the other liberties of perdition.

"5. You must also reject and condemn liberalism, and also modern progress and civilization, as being false progress and false civilization.

"6. You must utterly abominate civil marriage and regard it as pure concubinage.

"7. You must also condemn and reject the interference of the civil authorities in any ecclesiastical affairs, so much in vogue now-a-days.

"8. Finally, you must hold the belief that the Church by its origin has a Divine and supernatural authority, and is, moreover, superior to the civil authorities. And reject and condemn the doctrine that the Church should submit to the State, or that the Church is independent or ought to separate itself from the State. Children must be brought up in the above views, condemning whatever the Church condemns. And children must be educated solely in Catholic schools by genuinely Catholic teachers, and not on any account in unsectarian or mixed schools, which are strictly forbidden by the Church."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—An application has been made by the Emperor of China to President McKinley to mediate with the European Powers. In his reply the President consents to do so, under certain conditions, prominent among which are the safety of the ministers at Peking, the protection of foreigners and the restoration of order.

The United States Government has absolutely refused the Chinese proposition to suspend military operations against Peking in return for the delivery at Tien Tsin of the foreign Ministers.

The Collector of Customs at Port Townsend, Washington, has received instructions to prevent the shipment of arms and ammunition to Asiatic Ports from Puget Sound, which may be used in China to harm Americans residing there.

The annual statement of the American Ship Building Company, better known as the Ship Yard Trust, on the Great Lakes, shows that twenty-nine vessels, with a carrying capacity of 179,000 net tons, were constructed during the year, and sixteen additional boats are being built.

From a report of the Pennsylvania Fish Commission it appears that during the year ending Sixth Month 1st 1900, there were over eighty millions of fish hatched or distributed; among these were white fish, pike, perch, blue pike, shad, brook trout, Atlantic salmon and lake trout.

A meeting of the U. S. League of Building and Loan Associations has been held in Indianapolis during the past week. It is stated that in the city of Philadelphia there are 258,685 homes, a large percentage of which have been acquired through these associations. "In every city and hamlet, in every industrial centre, are visible proofs of association effort, not only in homes secured, but in the practical lessons of thrift taught to members." There are now 5,485 local associations in the United States, with $582,000,000 of assets, owned by 1,503,625 members.

A despatch from Nome Harbor, Alaska, of Sixth Month 29th, says, that within two or three weeks the population has increased from 2,700 to 20,000, with tents and buildings irregularly located along the beach. The sanitary conditions were very crude in the first place, and, with the influx of the new population, have become much worse. Enteric fever, small-pox and measles have appeared.

The Scandinavian element in this country numbers nearly a million souls. They are located principally in four States—Iowa, Illinois, Wisconsin and Minnesota.

At a session of the National Negro Race Conference held in Montgomery, Ala., last week, the scheme of Bishop Halsey, of Georgia, to ask for a separate State for negroes was sharply criticised by an educated negro of Mobile, Ala., who characterized it as "opposed to the Constitution and opposed to common sense."

In consequence of rioting in New Orleans between whites and negroes the militia have been called out to preserve order in that city.

A despatch from St. John's, N. F., of the 30th ult, says: "Owing to the continued prevalence of ice fields along the Labrador coast, which detain the mail boats considerably, the Peary relief steamer Windward is expected to make but slow progress to the north. Navigators experienced in northern voyaging think the present season most unfavorable for reaching high latitudes."

The first railway mail service has been established in Hawaii. The line runs around the island of Oahu, carrying the mails between Honolulu and Kahuku.

There were 514 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 50 less than the previous week and 33 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 276 were males and 238 females; 42 died of consumption; 29 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 18 of cancer; 13 of apoplexy, and 8 of diphtheria.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, new, 104½ to 105½; 3's, 110½ to 111; 4's, reg., 115½ to 116; new 4's, 132½ to 133; 5's, 114½ to 115.

COTTON closed on a basis of 10¢.c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.40 to $2.60; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.50 to $3.75; Western winter, straight, $3.50 to $3.75; spring, straight, $3.75 to $4.00; city mills, straight, $3.50 to $3.85. RYE FLOUR—$3.10 to $3.20 per barrel, as to quality.

GRAIN—No. 2 red wheat, 73½ to 73¢.

No. 2 mixed corn, 44 to 44½¢.

No. 2 white oats, clipped, 30½¢.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5½ to 5½¢.; good, 5½ to 5½¢.; medium, 5½ to 5½¢.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4½ to 5c.; good, 4½ to 4½¢.; common, 1½ to 2½¢.; spring lambs, 4 to 6½¢.

HOGS.—7½ to 7½¢. for best Western; others, 7¼ to 7½¢.

FOREIGN—Negotiations between the Powers have brought out mutual assurances that the military expeditions to China are for the sole purpose of relieving the Legations, and that there is no intention to partition China. Hence, should China agree to deliver the Ministers alive, no Power will have a reason for continuing aggressive military operations except Germany, whose Minister is undoubtedly dead, and even Germany, to quote a British official, "will have to forego the Emperor's assertion that he would not stop till the German flag floated over Peking." As for the other Powers, it is emphatically stated that they have unanimously agreed that with the safe delivery of the Ministers the aggressive campaign will end. All rumors of an international agreement regarding the future of China subsequent to the return of the Ministers are false. The agreement is purely negative, and based upon the lines stated by Secretary Hay, of which the independence and integrity of the Chinese Empire are essential features.

A despatch from Shanghai says that the native city of Tien-Tsin was given up to pillage after its capture. The slaughter was frightful and the scene indescribable. The carnage was most hideous in the quarters assailed by the Russians, who refused to grant quarter.

The London Daily Express has the following from St. Petersburg: "Admiral Skrydeloff, commanding the Russian squadron in Chinese waters, has received precise instructions to bombard the Chinese coast towns immediately on receipt of confirmation of the report of the massacre at Peking."

Admiral Kempff, in a dispatch of the 28th ult. from Taku, China, says that the Chinese Government is now paralyzed, and the secret edicts show that it is in sympathy with the "Boxers."

The British Admiralty has made public a despatch from Rear Admiral Bruce, at Tien-Tsin, conveying a despatch from the British Minister, Claude MacDonal, in Peking, which says: "British Legation, Peking, June 20 to July 16 repeatedly attacked by Chinese troops on all sides. Both rifle and artillery fire. Since July 16 an armistice, but a cordon is strictly drawn on both sides of the position. Chinese harricades close to ours. All women and children in the British Legation. Casualties to date sixty-two killed."

It is reported in Berlin that Emperor William has written letters to Queen Victoria, Emperor Nicholas, Emperor Francis Joseph and King Humbert, making a strong appeal on behalf of the maintenance of harmony among the Powers against China.

Chinese advices received in London from Shanghai say that a general rising throughout the Empire is certain, and that missionaries have been ordered to take refuge at Shanghai or Hong Kong. It is also reported from the same source that the Imperial Government will give safe convoy to the envoys at Peking to Tien-Tsin, if the Powers will guarantee that no advance on the capital be made pending mediation of matters in dispute.

An American soldier having been killed at Aroquita, in Northern Mindanao, a company of infantry went to the place and killed eighty-nine natives. Subsequently a gunboat shelled Aroquita, burning the warehouses.

King Humbert, of Italy, was assassinated on the 29th ult. at Monza, in Lombardy, Italy. He was shot by a man named Angelo Bressi de Prato, and died in a few minutes.

The assassin was arrested, and gave as the motive for his crime his hatred of monarchical institutions.

In introducing the Indian budget in the House of Commons, the Secretary for India commended the patience, resignation, courage and abstinence from crime with which 52,000,000 people in the stricken area have faced famine. The Government proposed to apply unexpended balance of £3,000,000 towards relief. This would, he hoped, meet all demands. If the resources of India did not suffice to save the lives of the famine stricken, then an appeal would be made to the imperial exchequer. In the last two years, he said, £13,000,000 had been expended in famine relief.

The Mexican census recently taken, shows a population of 12,491,573, over two-thirds of whom cannot read or write. Over eighty per cent. of the population is of mixed and Indian races. Sixty-three languages are spoken among the people.

A desperate battle between insurgents and troops of the Government of Columbia took place at Panama on the 26th ult., in which hundreds were killed; the losses of the insurgents having been very heavy. On the same day after the battle, a treaty of peace was signed, in which the insurgents surrendered.

A despatch from Jamaica announces a remarkably rich find of diamonds at Mazaruni, British Guiana, where 400 stones of exceptional brilliancy were collected in eighteen days.

A telegram from Cape Town, S. Africa, of the 30th ult., says: "General Prinsloo, with 5,000 men, has surrendered unconditionally to the British."

Ireland's vital statistics for the quarter ending Third Month 31st, shows a decline in the population of 10,135 souls, of which the excess of deaths over births is responsible for nearly one-half.

The new trans-Siberian railway, when complete, is intended to be the safest, cheapest and most comfortable in the world. The safety of the Manchurian line will be due to the flatness of the regions traversed, not a single tunnel being necessary between the Ural and the Amour—that is to say, from one end of Siberia to the other.

Advices from Vera Cruz show that Dr. Bellinzaghi's experiments with yellow fever patients continue to show remarkable results. All the new patients treated with the serum are said to be improving, and the black vomit has been stopped.

The artificial food industry has developed widely in Germany, chiefly in the large works which supply dyestuffs, for which albumen is an important material. The artificial foods are mostly mixtures of more or less secret composition.

Negotiations are in progress for the purchase by the United States from Spain of the islands of Sibutu and Cagayan, in the Philippines, near the Borneo coast. The two islands are insignificant in area and thinly populated, probably containing from 6,000 to 8,000 people in all. One consideration which has influenced the United States Government in these negotiations is to exclude any European Power from the possession of the islands for use as a naval station.

RECEIPTS.

Unless otherwise specified, two dollars have been received from each person, paying for vol. 74.

Lydia C. Cadbury, Pa.; Jesse W. Taylor, Phila.; Truman C. Moore, Pa., $4, (2 vols.); a Friend for Charles E. Gibbons, Pa.; Walter P. Stokes, N. J.; Thomas Woolman, Phila.; Hannah B. Horne, Ind.; Caleb S. Cope, Fla.; Richard Mott, agent, Ia., $16, for James McGirr, J. W. Mott, Wm. P. Young, James Mott, Daniel Mott, Morris C. Smith, Joseph Dewees and C. T. Engle; Mary D. Taber, N. Y.; Thos. Dunn, Ia.; Wm. Evans, N. J.; Thomas J. Beans, N. J.; Christian F. Glick, Va.; Sarah C. Glover and for Lydia Embree, Pa.; Priscilla Lippincott, N. J.; D. D. Maris, Del.; Marietta Wilkins, N. J.; Rebecca Chambers, Pa.; George Foster, R. L., $22, for himself, S. F. Perry, Mary A. Gardner, Arthur Perry, Geo. C. Foster, J. Barclay Foster, John W. Foster, Edwin B. Foster, Lydia F. Nichols, Mary F. Collins and Eliza F. Browning; Joseph L. Bailey, Pa., $10, for himself, Sarah Bailey, Joseph Bailey, Franklin G. Swavely and Susan W. Warrington, N. J.; Hannah Whinery, O.; Ann Trimble, Pa., $8, for herself; Ann Ashton, Townsend T. Sharpless, and Joseph Trimble; Abram Stratton, Phila.; D. J. Scott and for Mary Scott Kay, Pa.; Wm. Berry, G'n; Phebe H. Burgess, Pa.; C. H. Jones, Pa.; Lydia S. Thomas, Phila., and for Sarah V. Willits, Ia.; Sarah A. Gilbert, Pa., $10, for herself, Eliza G. Cope, Dillon Gibbons, Ann Case and Gilbert Cope; George Abbott, N. J., $6, for himself, George Abbott, Jr., and Henry A. Lippincott, Phila.; Joseph Elkinton, Pa.; Henry B. Leeds, agent, N. J., $10, for Elizabeth T. Engle, Edward S. Harmer, Elizabeth H. Bromley, Henry R. Woodward and Samuel L. Allen; Samuel

Haines, N. J.; Alfred C. Haines, N. J.; Sarah P. Darnell, N. J.; Julianna N. Powell, N. J.; Dr. Samuel S. Haines, N. J.; Wm. W. Hazard, agent, N. Y., $12, for himself, Samuel G. Cook, Elisha Cook, Persis E. Hollock, Isaac P. Hazard and Hazard Library; Asa Ellis, agent, Ind., $8, for Abel H. Blackburn, Ezra Barker, Ann Haworth and David Stalker; Samuel S. Cowgill, and for Lydia Ann Cowgill, Calif; R. B. P. H., Phila.; for Matilda Yerkes, Phila.; Matilda M. John, Ia.; Mary W. Stokes, N. J.; Wm. B. Moore, Pa.; John Woolman, Pa.; Howard Y. Pennell, M. D., Pa., to No. 14, vol. 75; Mary B. Clement, N. J.; E. A. Lippincott for Hilles Lippincott, N. J.; Aaron P. Dewees, F'kd'd; Chas M. Cooper, N. J.; Sarah L. Price, Phila.; Sallie A. Armor, Del.; Geo. J. Foster, Ill.; J. I. Southwick, Neb.; Joshua S. Wills, N. J.; B. V. Stanley, agent, Ia., $50, for himself, Stephen Jackson, John E. Hodgins, Zaccheus Test, Abigail B. Mott, Delitha Emmons, E. Dean Emmons, Joseph Patter-on, T. E. Stanley, Morris Stanley, Lewis B. Stanley, Thomas H. Binns, Hannah W. Williams, Samuel Bedell, Pearson Hall, Emma L. Heald, Thomas D. Yocum, Geo. E. Young, Joseph L. Hoyle, Wm. E. Bundy, Jos. S. Heald, Branson D. Sidwell, Samuel Eubree, Thomas Thomasson and Thomas E. Mott; Jesse Dewees, agent, O., $9, for Jason Penrose, David Masters, Patience Fawcett, Jos. Vaughan, and $1 for Thomas Dewees, Sr., Kan.; Josiah W. Cloud, N. J.; Hannah P. Rudolph, N. J.; Warner W. Cooper, N. J.; George S. Hutton, Phila., $6, for himself, Phebe Hutton and George Pandrich, Pa.; Jos. Evans, N. J.; R. P. Gibbons, Del.; Elizabeth D. Meredith, Pa.; Wm. Smallwood, Pa.; Fannie Cason, Pa.; Martha Collins, N. J.; Daniel Rich, Kans.; Herbert Everett, Australia, 17 s. 6 d.; James Lee, Jr., Pa.; J. R. Haines, G'n; Peter Thomson, G'n; E. K. Alsop, N. Y.; R. E. Haines, Pa., for Sarah E. Haines and Susan L. Haines; Edmund Wood and Geo. Wood N. J.; Mary N. Glover, N. J., $6, for herself, Eliza C. N. Browning and Virginia Nicholson; Geo. Blackburn agent, O., $17, for herself, Priscilla Hunt, $3, Finley Hutton, Clarkson S. French, Ardella French, Any J. Morlan, Catharine M. Thomas and Edward Stratton, Mary Paxson, Pa.; Anne Roberts, Phila.; Elizabeth Allen, Phila.; Edward Richie, Phila., and for Hannal D. White, O.; Joseph W. Lippincott, Phila., and for Richard H. Keefe, N. J.; John Benington, Pa., $6, for 3 copies; Beulah Palmer, Pa., $6, for herself, T. Chalk ley Palmer and Susan H. Sharpless; Sarah A. Long streth, Fox Chase.

Remittances received after Third-day noon will not appear in the Receipts until the following week.

NOTICES.

A YOUNG woman Friend wishes a position as companion or to assist in the home. No objection to children.

Address "O," Office of THE FRIEND.

THOMAS H. WHITSON, West Chester, Pa., has consented to receive and forward subscriptions and payments for THE FRIEND.

DIED, at her home in Woodland, Northampton Co., N. C. on the seventh of Fifth Month, 1900, ANN E. GRIFFIN wife of Exum O. Griffin, in the sixty-sixth year of her age; a member and elder of Rich Square Monthly and Cedar Grove Particular Meetings. This dear Friend possessed a quiet and gentle spirit, was a devoted wife and mother, and was constantly concerned for the good of others. "To know her was to love her." After an illness of three weeks, she quietly passed away. We have the assurance she is now enjoying the realms of eternal glory.

—, also, on the first of Seventh Month, 1900, at St Vincent Hospital, Norfolk, Va., ELLEN M. GRIFFIN, daughter of the above, and member of said meeting, at the age of thirty-four years and six months. During the illness of her mother she was constantly by her side and survived her only eight weeks. She had a strong desire to go to the hospital, with the belief that she would recover which desire was granted shortly before her death. She remarked after she was pronounced better that she thought she would get well, but if she did not she could be with mother. Although she lingered about seven weeks, not a murmur was heard to escape her lips, an expression of thankfulness was made for every favor granted by attentive nurses. A devoted father and two brothers are left to follow in their steps.

—, suddenly, on the nineteenth of Fourth Month, 1900, near his home, Kissimmee, Florida, ALBERT J. PENNELL, son of John S. and Mary L. Pennell, in the twenty-first year of his age; a member of the Monthly Meeting Friends of Philadelphia for the Northern District. We believe that through the mercy of our blessed Redeemer, he was prepared for the change, and that his end was peace.

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, EIGHTH MONTH 11, 1900.

No. 4.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,

(South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth,) PHILADELPHIA.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

Voices From Smaller Yearly Meetings.

In the printed "Minutes of New England Yearly Meeting of Friends, held at Westerly, 900," which have now come to hand, appear counsels from and epistles addressed to that body, which seem deserving of a wider hearing. We present extracts as follows:

When once the mind is made up to attend these meetings, a way is found beyond one's expectation; and the outpouring of Divine love felt in this silent waiting is often helpful in our spiritual aspirations between one meeting and another. We thus manifest our allegiance to Almighty God by leaving our daily vocations for a little time, to worship Him in spirit and truth. Love and unity, one with another, can only be fully experienced when the love of God prevails in each individual heart.

Friends were cautioned against spending too large a proportion of their time in reading newspapers and periodicals, to the neglect of the history of our Society and the biography of its faithful members. We were also cautioned against being too much influenced by the extravagant tendencies of the age in our manner of living.—New England.

We have been reminded that things seen and temporal are almost a perennial temptation. And even with some consciousness that the Kingdom consists not in meat and drink, and however free from their use as forms and assumed aid in fulfillment of spiritual requirements, engrossment in outward things is ever bait and a snare. How suitable is the inspired counsel, "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him."—Iowa.

Not as a prospective experience only, but in the economy of grace [residence in the paradise of God is] to be known in the surroundings of mortality. Elevating the commonest use of temporal things into veritable work in the vineyard of the great husbandman, being "diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord." The cup of cold water given in the virtue of true discipleship obtains recognition and reward from the Master as if done to himself.

"In as much as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."—Iowa.

A responsive chord has been touched with renewed desires that this annual greeting may not be a lifeless form, but that each message may bear the impress of true gospel life, which is the light of men, and is the bond that will bind us together as true and living members of one household of faith.—Ohio.

Our Saviour said, "ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you." We believe that the day loudly calls for a closer walk with our dear Saviour, that we may be qualified to go forth at his call into fields which are already white unto harvest. We do not believe that the mission of our Society is fulfilled, as some would have us think. For are not the principles which Friends have held for over two hundred years still in advance of some of the religious views of other denominations?

Let us not then turn back in the day of battle, but be strong; remembering that greater is He that is in you, than he that is in the world. Let us strive to dwell in the quiet habitation, that we may know the will of the Lord concerning us, and not resist the strivings of his spirit until it shall cease to strive with us.—Western.

And, dear young sisters, our hearts salute you in true Christian love, and we would say unto you, be in earnest. Be not satisfied with a lukewarm condition, but strive with your whole mind, might, and strength to serve the living God.—Western (Women's Meeting).

Although we are all weakness, He is all-powerful, and if we are willing to be emptied of self and depend entirely on God, not in idleness and slothfulness, but being ready and willing to go at his command, He will enable us to overcome all, and having overcome, to stand, putting on the "whole armor of God."—Kansas.

The wonderful privilege of access to God, accorded by Divine mercy to every individual under the priesthood of Christ, has been upheld as the crowning doctrine of our distinctive faith. The vastness of the need of this forgotten doctrine in the professing Christian world is so great that earnest has been the pleading for faithfulness, that all the gifts bestowed by Christ Jesus, our Lord, on the membership may be so occupied under the Divine Power that these great and precious doctrines may be proclaimed in faithfulness to a lost and sinful world.—Kansas (Women's Meeting).

There is blessing promised by Him who never fails to those "who do his commandments that they may have a right to the tree of life and may enter in through the gates into the city." There God's power keeps its inmates from all the evils those are exposed to who are outside. Each inhabitant of this city, "New Jerusalem," realizes that the "Tabernacle of God is with men," and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall lead them. The eye of faith, opened by the power of God alone, can see this city, and there is "no need of the sun, neither the moon to shine in it, for the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof."

The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all, Amen.

JOHN CARTER.

Wilmington, Ohio.

The increase of Christ's kingdom in the hearts of the children of men is God's work of grace, which comes through Jesus Christ, but unless we yield to his work in our hearts, and become a willing people in the day of our visitation, and the putting forth of His power, we shall become as the heath in the wilderness in place of a pleasant watered garden in whose walks the Lord would take delight.

Every age has its peculiar temptations, but Christ's cross ever calls the disciple to a close consistent walk with him. Christ Jesus, as our light, makes plain everything that tends to lead away from the path well pleasing to him; his power and love draw us therefrom into the denial of these things, persuading us to do the will of our Heavenly Father with an eye single to Him, to his glory and our good. The love of pleasures and riches prove more seductive to the church than the fires of persecution, and are more fatal to our eternal interests. In view of these things, the warning which the Lord Jesus Christ gave to his apostles in the Garden of Gethsemane has been sounded in our ears: "Watch and pray lest ye enter into temptation; the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak." With this came the promise of "a happier time to come, if we as a people, though but a remnant, remain faithful to our God, for the night is far spent, the dawn is at hand," words of comfort and of cheer, sealed by the Spirit to our understanding, and to you our companions in tribulation and faithful brethren in Christ.

We believe that God's sovereign mercy and truth are over all, and though clouds obscure our view of the Sun of righteousness, yet he ever shines unchangeable and unchanged, ready at all times to make himself strong in behalf of those who truly love, trust, and obey Him. And though grievous wars and commotions cause a tumult in the earth like to the sea and the waves roaring, let our ears ever be intent to hear the gentle yet almighty voice of the Prince of Peace, who stilled the waves on Galilee's shore, saying, "Peace, be still!" He is the same to-day who now commands "Be ye not troubled." He speaks peace to his people, He gives to them of his peace, and may that peace of God ever rule in our hearts. If Christ's love towards us and all men dwells in our hearts, we cannot take up carnal weapons to oppress or to lord it over our fellowmen. Said the Lord Jesus, "If my kingdom were of this world then would my servants fight." Not being of this world, our weapons must be spiritual ones, wielded in the Lord's power, to slay in ourselves those lusts from whence all wars among men arise.—Canada.

Military Skill in Ants.

From a military standpoint, the methods employed by ants to provide food for an ant colony are almost perfect. Their foraging parties are faultless, both in planning and execution, and are almost uniformly successful. An American who is at present in business in South Africa has sent home a description of a foray of an army of ants.

The army, which he estimates to have numbered about fifteen thousand ants started from their home in the mud walls of a hut and marched in the direction of a small mound of fresh earth but a few yards distant. The head of the column halted on reaching the foot of the mound, and waited for the rest of the force to arrive at the place of operations, which evidently was to be the mound of fresh earth. When the remainder had arrived and halted so that the entire army was assembled, a number of ants detached themselves from the main body and began to ascend to the top of the mound, while the others began moving so as to encircle the base of the mound.

Very soon a number from the detachment which had ascended the mound, evidently the attacking party, entered the loose earth and speedily returned, each bearing a cricket or a young grasshopper, dead, which he deposited upon the ground and then returned for a fresh load. Those who had remained on the outside of the mound took up the crickets and grasshoppers as they were brought out and bore them down to the base of the hill, returning for a fresh load. Soon the contents of the mound seemed to be exhausted, and then the whole force returned home, each carrying his burden of food for the community.

Here, then, was a regular foray, planned and executed with military precision, the country surveyed, the depot of provisions known accurately before the march was made, and at the mound prudential division of labor and care taken that none of the victims should escape.

STEPPING STONES.—Strive vigorously to form the habit of using everything that comes to you, whether pleasant or unpleasant, fortunate or unfortunate, to your advantage. Do not allow an unpleasant letter, a disagreeable criticism, an uncharitable remark, or other trial of any kind to darken your whole day and cast a shadow over your life.

Make up your mind resolutely that nothing shall stand in the way of your genuine success. You cannot allow your life to be darkened by the clouds cast over your pathway by those who wish to injure you. Misfortunes and difficulties make strong those who have the courage to surmount them and use them as stepping-stones instead of stumbling-blocks.

"WHEN you can put out fire with fire, or dry wet clothes with water, you may hope to lessen evil by doing wrong yourself."

Doukhobor Notes.

EXTRACTED FROM RECENT LETTERS WRITTEN BY JOSEPH S. ELKINTON.

(Continued from page 23.)

"The finest grain fields seen among the colonists were in view near the village of Terpenie, where the sick were assisted. The last house we came to, and where we were to dine, was the residence of the dear grandmother of the Doukhobors, Anastasja Virigin. She has six sons in exile in Siberia, and one other son died on the way there. She also has a grandson among the exiles.

"Her son Peter was about the most noted of these. She is eighty-four years of age, clear and bright in her intellect. She has a daughter living with her, the table was bountifully furnished, and she said she enjoyed having us to dinner, and we told her it was a privilege to be there.

"There are seven women in this village whose husbands are in exile, and when we were assembled together in a meeting capacity, we had a letter read from Ivan Kinkin, the translation of which was in effect, 'Is it true that the Quakers are striving to get our release from here? May the Lord direct their steps that we may get to you, and worship our Heavenly Father with you, and so we wish the Lord to help, that we may be with our mother and see you all. We send our best messages to our friends the Quakers, for their Christianity and love in their hearts, and remain your loving brother, father and son-in-law, Ivan Kinkin.'

"The reading of this letter was a good beginning for our meeting, which proved, before it closed, (in my view), the crowning meeting thus far in this visit. We entered into feeling with them, and they were addressed in the ability afforded, the opportunity closing with a remarkable prayer by J. E. R."

Seventh Month 4th.—Our friends drove from the South to the North Colony, and on their way lost the trail for a time, which J. S. E. says "might be called a terrible ride," and adds, "we had to make the roads, and I do not know who among our women Friends would have enjoyed the bouncing, to say nothing about crossing the rivers. Twenty-five or thirty miles' riding, however, gave us some exercise of a kind that was calculated as an antidote for dyspepsia.

"We feel it requires a goodly measure of wisdom to act discreetly in the purchase of stock in the several villages where they are most in need of such assistance."

They met a Doukhobor (Gregory Slemankoff), who had lately arrived from Siberia, where he had been exiled three years, and prior to that was one year and two months in prison in Tiflis.

"He is a man of about seventy-two years of age, of good powers of mind and in fair condition physically, and he told us that when in Siberia some priests of the Greek church, asked the Governor of the police if they might visit the Doukhobors, to which the answer was given, 'If the exiles were willing to receive such visits they might.' The Doukhobors replied they were willing to receive them if the priests would come peaceably and not get angry in case the truth was told them. On this the priests had their first and second visit, but on the third they lost their temper at what the Doukhobors said in answer to their questions, and the priests were about to do violence, but the governor of the police sent them away as they got angry, and they could not go back again.

"Two others that were in exile in Siberia have made their way to Canada."

"The presence of Gregory Slemankoff had its influence on the meeting in causing a solemn feeling to overspread it, and his return to his family was referred to in what was expressed, for if he caused such real joy among them, will not there be joy indeed among the inhabitants of the Celestial City when the spirits of the redeemed enter that blessed abode!

"Lodged at G. S.'s and started next morning (Seventh Month 5th), for the village of Oswobozenie, consisting of twenty-five houses in one of which we found a man who had been sick for seven months. His health broke down while working on the railroad.

"Our sympathy and pecuniary assistance was given to his wife and three children. We also saw an aged man who was crippled by the Turks or Tartars in 1855, his wife being injured at the same time.

"Our meeting here was the largest I think we have had. J. E. R. enlarged upon the spiritual character of true worship, recalling the discourse between the Saviour and the woman of Samaria, at Jacob's well. He also said a many of them could not read Scripture history, Scripture doctrine might be taught in their hearing with great propriety. He afterward gave thanks for the ability so mercifully afforded to the messengers, and petitioned for a blessing upon the inhabitants of this village that they might be enabled to maintain their faithfulness, as he most truly believed they were spiritually minded ones among them."

J. S. E. spoke about the importance of using the gifts entrusted to us by the Father of the spirits of all flesh; that neglect in exercising these left people in darkness, with less power to discern and discriminate spiritually, and finally their strength to do that which they felt to be their duty, was gone. The beaming countenances and marks of true character evident among these dear people in the absence of so much that we count necessary to comfort or even existence, were truly instructive.

Passing on to another village (Ticherakoff) a meeting was held, during which the hope was expressed that the colonists would remain steadfast in the simplicity of their own faith and rather deepened in what they already knew than abandon their convictions through the persuasion of any who might come among them.

The Swan River was crossed on a bridge built by the Doukhobors, and it was said that other bridges had been put across this stream by them during the past year.

Considerable fishing is now done in the river, and the travellers had fresh fish to eat. There also appeared to be one hundred to a sixty acres of grain in promising condition near this village.

On the sixth of Seventh Month the driver missed the trail and gave our friends an exceedingly rough ride of five or six miles breaking a track through bushes and mosquitoes, and finally brought them to a river which they had to cross by their own exertions on a small raft, because the driver did not want to drive through the stream at that place.

The village of Lucomerofka was on the cposite bank. J. S. E. says, "Jonathan and I managed to get over, but as we had neither gum boots, rope nor extra team, they having gone on before, we were comparatively helpless. We plodded up the hill to the village, which was located in the roughest place that I have seen. The people seemed very grateful for the visit, as I judge the visits they get are very few."

In the afternoon they had a meeting with the villagers, and a most impressive scene and opportunity it proved to be.

J. E. R. told them he did not address them as those who needed to be turned from darkness to Light, for they had the Light and were walking in it, and had testified to it through much suffering. It was rather a desire to strengthen them in their faith (our most holy faith), and to encourage them to persevere, so that through watchfulness and prayer they might experience a deepening and growth in understanding and obedience.

The people followed J. E. R. and J. S. E. for some distance toward their next stopping-place—the feeling thus manifested with such genuine appreciation, and the oft-times picturesque appearance of such groups makes a very impressive feature in these visitations.

They arrived at Pokrofska about 6.30 P. M. J. S. E. writes: "The houses in this village present a very neat appearance. Several women were milking near a smudge fire, and three pairs of oxen lying contentedly near another for protection from the mosquitoes. If the owners were only out of debt, what a fine thing it would be! Still I believe these people will prosper. We spoke with a woman who had three sick women in her wagon. The water in the river had been too high for the horses, and they gave out. The woman was however, within calling distance of the village, and she got out and unharnessed the horses, and with rope, thrown to her by the men from the shore, made it fast so they could pull the wagon, with the sick in it, through the river. These poor women were probably en route for Yorkton, fifty miles distant, as many go here to get medical attention.

"Wrapping my head up pretty well with a handkerchief, sprinkled with a preparation the mosquitoes did not like, I had a fair night's sleep."

"Seventh Month 7th.—The temperature this morning is very pleasant. I cannot doubt our meeting was all the better for being held in the morning, for J. E. R. certainly handled with ability some deep subjects, and the people were attentive throughout.

"We passed on through the village of Vozsienie to the river bank opposite the village of Pokrofska, where we found some old buildings, one of which the horses were put and left, while we took passage on a raft of nine logs, fastened together by a cross log in front, and another across the centre, on which I sat. Five of us seemed to be a pretty good load, and before we got fairly started we stranded on a rock, but by good management got off; the current was pretty strong, but we had a safe passage and made our way up the hill to a very neat little village, the first that I have seen with pitched board roofs, and such a high pitch as to have quite a store room overhead, with windows in the gable, and in one instance dormer window. One of these cottages is occupied by a carver, who had articles that I would suppose would be quite saleable. His wife was in a pretty helpless condition, and I would suppose her recovery doubtful. Although the company in this village is comparatively small we had a good solid meeting with them, and parted in a tender manner.

"In crossing the river we were delighted by the sight of fields of barley and grain that had been sown."

(To be continued.)

Princess Louit-Seu and the Worms.

"Once upon a time"—and in this story that means about 4550 years ago—there lived a little princess in China by the name of Louit-Seu. She lived with her father and mother in a wonderful palace set in a shady, flowery park. Her father, who was Emperor of China, was called Hoang-Ti.

One morning in spring, it is said, the Emperor started out for a little walk with his daughter. They were accompanied by many mandarins and officers of the royal household.

They made a little procession when they had left the garden and entered a long avenue of mulberry trees, but they were all obliged to come to a standstill when little Louit-Seu paused before a small shrub that grew near the path.

What she saw was hundreds of black worms, busily eating the green leaves, and crawling up and down the twigs. She was so interested in the sight that the Emperor ordered the branch transplanted into a huge pot in his daughter's room, that she might watch them at her leisure.

Little Princess Louit-Seu had not many playmates, and few games, and so she was delighted with her new pastime of watching the worms feed, and of providing them with plenty of fresh mulberry leaves. The color of the worms gradually changed from black to milk white.

One day she discovered that the caterpillars had grown stout and thick, and were sitting on the twigs apparently wrapped in a fabric of shining, yellowish threads. They were moving their heads to and fro, and a fine thread seemed to be coming from their mouths. This thread they kept on winding rapidly about themselves.

Little Louit-Seu was so surprised and excited that she did something which was forbidden—she ran into her father's privy-council chamber, and, interrupting him in his talk, begged him to come and see what the wonderful caterpillars were doing.

Now, as it happened, the subject that the Emperor was discussing was the extermination of the mulberry trees, and the officers were urging him to get rid of the loathsome caterpillars in this way. They were very indignant when he left the room to go with the little princess to watch these very worms.

Before very long these worms had so wound themselves in the silken threads that they were completely hidden from view. Then they could do nothing but wait, wondering what would happen next.

In a few weeks from the small end of the little silk-house there came, first, tiny white feet, then a little white creature slowly crept forth, and when it had opened its wings Louit-Seu saw that it was a dainty white butterfly.

The little butterflies hovered about, and laid their eggs upon the mulberry-trees, which in time hatched out the black worms again.

Now comes the strangest part of the story. The Emperor, Hoang-Ti, had been puzzling about the strange little worms, and one day he invented a little machine which made it possible to unwind the silk from the cocoons, or the "little silk-houses," as they called them. When this was done he took the fibre to the Empress, and she wove in her loom a beautiful piece of shining yellow silk. This was the beginning of silk-weaving in China, and, before Hoang-Ti and Louit-Seu died it became a great industry in the country.

The people were so grateful for the discovery that they wished to erect a monument to the Emperor, for, in that country, there were many monuments and temples; but one very wise philosopher said it would be impossible to build a monument which would not perish in time, and so he told the people to teach all the little children to look up at night and seek out the brightest stars in the heavens and name them for the Emperor.

And so when night falls the children run out of their houses and look about the sky until they find the four brightest stars in the constellation of Scorpion, and then they cry out, "Tsan-Fang—the little silk-house!" And then they remember the great Emperor, who learned to discern God's laws in the lowliest things, and to make that knowledge a benefit to his kingdom and people.—The Household.

KEEP still! When trouble is brewing, keep still; when slander is getting on its legs, keep still; when your feelings are hurt, keep still till you recover your composure at any rate. Things look different through an unagitated eye. In a commotion once I wrote a letter and sent it, and wished I had not. In my later years, I had another commotion and wrote a long letter; but life rubbed a little sense into me, and I kept that letter in my pocket against the day when I could look over it without agitation and without tears. I was glad I did. Less and less it seemed necessary to send it. I was not sure it would do any hurt, but in my doubtfulness I leaned to reticence and eventually it was destroyed. Time works wonders. Wait till you can speak calmly, then you will not need to speak, may be. Silence is the most massive thing conceivable sometimes. It is strength in very grandeur. It is like a regiment ordered to stand still in the mad fury of battle.—Burton.

A MAN once asked me, "Is not conscience a safer guide than the Holy Spirit?" I just took out my watch and said, "Is not my watch better than the sun?" Suppose that I said to you, "I will tell you the hour by my watch, and you must always take the time from me." That is conscience. It is the sun that is to rule the time. Conscience is fallen and corrupt. If we had an unfallen conscience, like holy Adam, it would be as if my watch were always to agree with the sun. But now it is a most unsafe guide. Sometimes we hear men say, "I don't see any harm in this practice; my conscience doesn't condemn it." It is not your conscience or your consciousness that is the rule of right and wrong; the law is the standard. By the law is the knowledge of sin; sin is the transgression of the law.—Andrew A. Bonar.

How a Chinese Christian Kept His Faith.

BY THEODORA MARSHALL INGLIS.

Old Wen Hua lives in the city of L——, not fifteen miles from Peking. He is the proprietor of that most lucrative business in China, a second-hand clothing shop. But it is not of his business or business ability that we think when old Wen Hua is brought to mind. It is the zeal with which he serves God in a heathen city of ten thousand inhabitants; for he is the only Christian in the place.

With the revulsion of feeling against Christianity, his relatives and townspeople renewed their objectionable treatment. But it only served as a dark background, against which his faith and good works shone more triumphantly. Contrary, even to the custom of many native Chinese Christians, Wen Hua closed his shop on the Sabbath, and spent the day after the manner of his Christian teachers. He told when the day came by means of a large Christian-Chinese calendar, which he pasted up just outside his shop door.

In [Twelfth Month] a body of troops marched toward the city, and camped on its outskirts. The following incident, illustrating Wen Hua's trust in God and courage to do right, is best told in his own simple words, as he related his experiences to a member of our Presbyterian mission in Peking.

"The soldiers were just outside the city. They hate all foreigners and foreign teaching, especially the 'Jesus doctrine.' On Saturday night an old friend of mine came to call upon me. He said: 'Take down your calendar. The soldiers will be in the city soon. They will tear you in pieces if they see that paper with foreign teaching on it. They will burn your shop down.'

"I answered: 'Do you think I will tear down the paper that tells me when worship day comes? Without it I cannot know the right day to give to the Lord.'

"Well, you had better tear it down,' he said, 'and open your shop to-morrow. If you don't they will force you to do it, and to sell them garments.'

"This provoked me, and I said, 'Do you think we Christians serve our God one day, and fear the soldiers the next?'

"Well, he went away dissatisfied with my speech. The next morning, however, he came running to my place, crying: 'Hurry, hurry! Tear that paper down! There are two soldiers coming to your shop!'

"I said, 'No, not if they kill me.'

Just then the soldiers reached us,—two great, fierce-looking men, with guns. I was in front of my shop. The taller one stopped when he saw the calendar.

"What is this?" he cried. Then he read a little, then he rushed up to me, and grunted in a terrible tone, while he shook his fist at me: 'So you follow the foreign devils,—do you?' You shut your shop because they tell you to. Well, now, open it. We want to buy garments."

"I answered: 'I cannot open my shop on the Lord's Day. It is against his command.'

"The Lord? And who is this Lord? Another foreign devil, I suppose!'

"No,' I answered; 'He is the God in heaven whom we Christians worship. And I will not sell you any goods to-day.'

"With that he looked at me curiously, and backed off toward the other man, who spoke to him, and soon they walked away.

"That afternoon they returned with another older man, who asked me, 'Does this paper tell you not to open your shop?'

"No,' I said; it only tells me the worship days. When they come, I close my shop.'

"Then no priest makes you do it?'

"No; only my conscience.'

"Hig! And who is the Lord you spoke of?'

"Then I told them some of the truth which they seemed curious to hear.

"After a while, the old man said: 'Well, this story may do for you. Shut your shop, if you want to. We will not touch your paper.'

"Now my friend was watching from the corner.

"When they walked away, he came to me in great astonishment.

"Didn't they harm you?' he cried; 'nor touch the paper?'

"You see me safe,' I answered.

"Well, they differ from most soldiers as fierce looking,' he said.

"You may think that,' I replied, 'but I know that the God whom I serve protects his children.'

Who shall say, with a few such men as old Wen Hua, that there is no hope of China's spiritual redemption?

PEKING, China.

Still are the ships that in haven ride
Waiting fair winds, or a turn of the tide;
Nothing they fret, though they do not get
Out on the ocean wide.

Oh, wild hearts that yearn to be free,
Look and learn from the ships of the sea!
Bravely the ships in the tempest tossed
Buffet the waves till the sea be crossed;
Not in despair of the haven fair:
Tho' winds blow backward and leagues be lost.
Oh, weary hearts that yearn for sleep,
Look and learn from the ships of the deep!

The Lesson of the Lights.

The United States Government publishes a book which many would consider very interesting reading, since it is almost wholly taken up with details as to the location, character and condition of the lighthouses along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. The reports of the Light-house Inspectors are prepared with great care and published regularly. The details with which these reports deal may seem dry, but they convey bits of information of great importance to the mariner.

Every night, at more or less frequent intervals, along the extended coasts of the United States, thousands of lights on mainland, isle or lightship blaze forth their welcome or their warning to the ocean voyager.

Some of the luminaries are powerful combinations of lenses, that throw their piercing rays many leagues at sea, while others are mere lanterns suspended in buoys that mark where harbor tide-ways run. These servitors of seamen may vary in importance of station and service, yet none are without a duty and a dignity. And these many lights all teach a lesson, not alone to sailor, but also to landsman.

The lesson is, in general, that life, as well as the ocean, must have its shore and signal lights. We cannot successfully navigate life all in the dark, since its seas are marked by too many shoal spots, and its surface is dotted with too many half-hid isles, to allow of reckless voyaging hither and thither. The voyager over life's sea must know where he is going, and steer by the lights along the shore. Some of these displays may be the siren signals surreptitiously set out, at the instance of Satan, by sordid wreckers to decoy souls to their ruin. Others, however, are beacons of blessing, symbols of safety and of hope, displayed by God himself to cheer his children as their brave barks' course over the sea, ever nearer and nearer to the heavenly haven. We must learn to distinguish between these false flares of folly and the true tokens of a godly guidance. This we can do by carefully familiarizing our minds with that Divine list and registry of the spiritual light-centres along the coasts of time, which is known as the Word of God, whose truth is the illuminator of all things. Every Christian is meant to be a centre of spiritual radiance, a kind of a living light. The Lord lights the believer's candle, and so he shines. Because Christ is the "Light of the World" is no reason why Christians should not feel a responsibility to be light-givers, too, in a lesser way. If a commercial company receives a contract for lighting a city it may, indeed, draw its current all from a single power-house, but it will also take pains to establish thousands of globes everywhere and there about the streets, through which the electric force can display itself. So the current of Divine grace must pass through the circuits of human character and come to glow in individual hearts and lives.

The sore need of the world is for more living lights of Christian character. The hydrographer of the British navy has just reported that the extension of light-houses throughout the world is not keeping pace with the advance of sea surveying and oceanic navigation. During the last year over two hundred new rocks were discovered, some of them by the same method of ships striking on them and being lost, and nearly all of these rocks are yet unmarked by beacons. So there are as yet many uncharted seas, many unmarked reefs, in social and business life which are proving just as many sources of danger to young and old. More Christian luminaries, brighter beacons of character, are needed to warn off these treacherous shoals and to invite ships passing in the night to the happy havens of a heavenly felicity.

Every Christian can, in a lesser way, be the light of his own little world. George Fox said that a godly Quaker ought to light up the country for ten miles around. There is no position so humble that a holy character faithfully occupying it may not shed abroad upon all around it a blessed and cheering radiance. The light-ships may teach us a lesson in this respect. Anchored far at sea, often in very obscure positions, few notice or think of the shapeless ships. But so long as they keep the lanterns lit and remain anchored securely in one spot they render admirable service to the storm-tossed mariner. So when the Christian remains steadfastly at the post of duty, instead of roaming aimlessly about on selfish errands, and keeps his spiritual light in brightest condition, he serves his God and generation well.

The lights teach many lessons, if we will but regard them. What God asks of each one is to be like the zealous Baptist, a "burning and a shining light."—Charles A. S. Dwight.

How to Avoid Insanity.

The following hints on the safeguarding of one's sanity are given in the Century by James Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, and author of "Christian Science, and Other Perceptions."

Anxiety should be systematically antagonized by philosophy, religion or change of subjects of thought. The effect of worry and suspense driving men wild is constantly seen in the business world, directly and by contrast, for bankruptcy is often followed by comparative mental repose. Hence authorities affirm that certainty and anxiety are far more liable to lead to mental derangement than the assurance of disaster.

As anxiety is a foe to clear thinking, it is better for one approaching a crisis to resort to indirect methods of dissipating it, such as conversation, the reading of an absorbing book, violent physical exercise, or the use of tools requiring his entire attention to their use. Similar means also contribute to sound sleep. Subjects of thought should be frequently changed. Neither fanaticism nor insanity from mental causes will be liable to develop when the mind is not constantly held upon one problem, possibility or perplexity.

Surroundings lose their power to withdraw the mind from care and fear, so from time to time the scene should be changed. Those who postpone travel for several years often find that they have lost the capacity of enjoyment; there is their courier, and they return unrefreshed. A frequent vacation of two or three days in a month would in many cases be more beneficial than thirty-six days of leisure or a year consecutively each year.

The observance of one day in seven by a complete change in subjects of thought, and a suspension of modes of activity required for six days, would be philosophical, even though it had no basis in religion. In the last French Revolution, the attempt was made to have a holiday once in five days and again once in ten. The intervals were too frequent under the first plan, and did not recur often enough under the second. Hence those who thought the system which enforced the [Seventy-year period] were fain to return to it.

The superintendent of one of the largest hospitals for the insane, declares that nineteen out of twenty of the business and professional men who come under his care have been in the habit of carrying business on their minds for seven days in each and every week.

Exaggerated sensitiveness is a foe to happiness, and the direct source of melancholy. In the earliest stages it is amenable to self-treatment. Many a restoration to happiness has been effected by the revelation to one's self that undue sensitiveness he has been making life intolerable to himself and to his friends.

Never, except in an emergency, should anyone stake all he has upon one thing. "Cæsar t nihil" is usually nihil, and if Cæsar, it is then only another form of nihil. In great emergencies, men are often not content to wait. Because they know not what to do, they do what they know not what.

Many become insane for want of occupation; they inherit wealth, and with it a straight-jacket of conventionalities in which they are compelled to spend their lives. This is especially the case with women, who generally, unlike men similarly situated, cannot travel by sea or land, or employ their energies in hunting, fishing or athletics. Men who retire from business voluntarily or because of advancing years, without modes of mental occupation, are prone to melancholy. Some fear poverty while in the midst of riches; others are out of joint with the times; others develop strange eccentricities, illustrating the proverb, "Give an old mill nothing else to grind and it will grind flint." A habit of reading, an interest in science, active connection with some systematized philanthropy, a profound and practical sympathy with some "religious cult," will postpone date of the advent of senility.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Sound Words.

(Continued from page 19.)

Why do we not call our places of worship a church as others do?

The Jews had their temple, made by hands, as ordained under their law, wherein to worship God. The Christians were taught that they as a sanctified people were the temple of God's spirit, wherein He dwelt and was to be worshipped in spirit and in truth. The temple was called in Greek kuriakon, the Christian assembly or congregation of the Great Shepherd, Ekkleria. We, knowing God dwelleth not in temples made by hands, but in and among his people, confine the word church to its use as given in Holy Writ, where it is called "Christ's body the fulness of Him who filleth all in all," and whether, as the "few gathered in an upper chamber," or as the many standing on the day of Pentecost on the open street with the vault of heaven for a canopy, there, in the presence of God by his spirit, was his church. So the idolatrous Saxon called his idol temple cire, or Scottish kirk, and calling the abode of an idol god by the same name as when changed to a Christian place of worship, tended to produce a worship similar to that of the Samaritans, who feared God, yet worshipped their own idols.

Why do we not call the months by the names usually applied? Because pagan Rome named them after their idol gods, whose names God's people, under the law, were commanded not to take into their mouths. And David declares "my mouth shall not transgress." How much more incumbent it is on Christians not to perpetuate by a daily use the memory of heathen abominations. The like objection is valid against the usual names of the days of the week.

You have no clergy and laity, have you then no ministers?

Why? yes! No meeting of true Friends can possibly be, without ministers being present, for Christ brings it down to the two who are gathered in his name, when He, the Minister of ministers, has promised to form a quorum, always sufficing to perform Divine worship, acceptable to God through Christ Jesus the one Mediator. And as He ministers to them, so do they one to another, according to the ability that the Head of the Church gives so to do. Neither is his ministry to them, nor theirs to each other necessarily in words, for Jesus ministered to the disciples both when He broke the bread in their midst and when He washed their feet, and He left commandment that as He had done to them so should they do to each other. But when priestcraft stepped in, and robbed Christians of his privilege as if they themselves were the only sect authorized by Him to do this, then they resuscitated a Jewish ordinance, one which the apostle speaks of as a carnal commandment, which Christ nailed to the cross, having as "our Passover" died for us, and so, fulfilling the law, annulled the rite, and of which the Apostle Paul, the teacher of the Gentiles, tells them and us we are neither to touch, nor to taste nor to handle, for, like all meats it perishes with the using, and ministers not to the nourishment of the soul. We call no man the pastor, the minister or the priest of any one of our churches, for one only is that to us, Christ Jesus himself, the Shepherd and bishop of our souls. His ministration is spiritual, not according to an outward law in temples made with hands, but He ministers of his spirit whether directly or mediately through others, to those who being born of his spirit, enjoy and act in the life and grow up into the same. If any man ministers of this word of life, it must needs be of that which Christ Jesus first breaks and gives to him to hand forth; for "Without me ye can do nothing," was a lesson even apostles had to learn, and proved to be so. Whoever then assumes to himself such a title, robs the people of the birthright heritage of every child of God born into his kingdom, who by Christ are all made kings and priests unto God and to himself, to offer up such holy spiritual sacrifices as He himself prepares and offers on the altar of hearts cleansed through faith in Him.

Christ gives to each one his particular ministry or ministries; some are called to be apostles, prophets, teachers, helps, governments and the like. All are compared to joints in the body, each ministering to the comfort of all the others. What a stiff body that must be, where there is but one joint; on one side stands the pastor or minister of the clergy, on the other the people. What becomes of Joel's prophecy? the pouring out of God's spirit, sons and daughters, prophesying?

What becomes of the apostles rule of order, "Let the prophets speak two or three . . . for ye may all prophecy one by one?" . . . What becomes of another rule relating to anything revealed to one that sitteth by? All sacrificed on the altar of expediency to accommodate a church weak in the faith, thinking her Lord forgets to fulfil his promise, and like Jeroboam building altars of their own device, lest the people should go up into the mountain of the Lord's house, which is set above all hills, there to be taught by Him.

Why do you not call the Scriptures the Word of God? Why should we? When the Scriptures never apply that name to themselves as a book, but give it to Him of whom they testify, as the foundation of the saints' faith in all ages, even long before the Scriptures were written. The Word of God is a name applied to deity itself, for "that word was God." And since neither Christ (nor yet his apostles) ever found it necessary to apply his own name to the writings of inspiration given forth by his Spirit, what occasion have we so to do? None whatever. It confuses the mind, dims the vision.

Christ Jesus is the Word of God, and the Scriptures contain both his words by the prophets, by himself and by the apostles to his church and others. "The word of God came to this or that prophet, saying. . . " The Jews who condemned Jesus as a malefactor had the Scriptures, and yet He told them, "My word is not in you." Had it been they would have believed in Him as the Son and the word of God. And who would say that when Satan used the words of Scripture to tempt Jesus, that because they were such, they were the word of God? For God's word always bespeaks God's will, and the words of Holy Scripture only become his word to a soul, when gathered and given forth by a motion of God's spirit, nor is this spirit in due season wanting to the humble and contrite in spirit, the meek and the lowly, whom God by his Spirit guides in judgment, and to whom He teaches his will and way, and so they find acceptance with God.

(To be continued.)

"Go On."

Arago, the great French astronomer, tells us that he became so discouraged in the study of mathematics that he almost resolved to abandon his effort. He was just about ready to give up when he happened to notice something printed or written under the paper binding of his book. He unfolded the leaf and found it was from D'Alembert. The letter said: "Go on, sir, go on! The difficulties you meet will resolve themselves as you advance. Persevere, and the light will dawn and shine with increasing clearness upon your path." This striking passage made an impression upon the young mathematician's mind which he never forgot. It was a perpetual spur to his ambition, and came to him just in the nick of time. He resolved then and there that he would surmount every difficulty; then he would become a great mathematician himself. He tightened his grip and urged himself on until fame took him up and told the world the story of one of the greatest astronomers of his time. . . . I have in mind several very brilliant graduates of last year and years before, who promised a great deal and of whom friends predicted great things, but somehow they have disappointed all expectations, simply because they lack sticking qualities. They are good scholars, and they imagined because they ranked high in college that they would rank high in life without great effort.

But they lack the hanging-on quality. They do not realize that, in practical life, the race is to the plodder, and not necessarily to the swift. This is why so many brilliant class leaders have become disappointments to their friends. The chain is no stronger than its weakest link, and lack of perseverance is a fatal deficiency which nothing else will supply.

Perhaps the greatest secret of success in life is due to those sticking qualities. Grip conquers the world—the faculty of sticking and hanging on when everybody else lets go. It is the five minutes more which wins the battle—the dogged perseverance, the determination of never giving up until death or victory comes.—Siftings.

TRUTH BETTER THAN AN OATH.—A little boy was brought into court recently as a witness. He did not know what an oath was. The judge requested him to tell the truth. The boy promised and kept his promise. Why cannot grown-up Christian people tell the truth without having recourse to an oath?

A Transferred Prize.

It was the one great day in college. Commencement had drawn citizens from all the county and from other counties to witness the success of the graduates. It was in the hilly region of the South, settled by the Scotch-Irish, whose descendants maintained the old estimate, both of religion and education. Before the hour of meeting, students from time to time appeared on the platform to see the crowd pouring in. Among the elegant youth, who represented the chief families, was a manly looking boy, clothed in homespun, who seemed quite busy. Robert Duncan was the only child of a farmer, who gained a scanty living out of a stony soil on the hillside. By heredity, as well as by training, Robert loved his books. From "Saint's Rest" to Robinson Crusoe and the Bible, every volume in the cottage—small and great, had been eagerly conned. When sent to the village Academy he did not mind the three-mile walk twice a day, and by his diligence stood first in all the classes. His lessons were studied at night by the blaze of light-wood or pine-knot. But his happy days were closing with the close of the term, and the prospect of giving up study did not seem bright or hopeful.

One night, when Robert had gone to bed in the attic, the mother said, "My heart is sore for Robbie. He is all fitted for college and so longs for an education—such a good boy, too, I long to send him."

"The same has been on my mind, too," said the husband. "I want it for him as much as he wants it."

After a pause, she replied:

"I could do without many a thing at table—sugar and the like are not necessary. We could sell more butter, eggs and nice things from the farm. Then our little savings put by for sickness and old age, I could spare them for sending Robbie to college."

"The best boy in the country, around," cried the father. "He'll manage to work and help himself. He is quick at everything."

At first, Robert was almost dazed with the idea of going to college. The parents' sacrifice seemed too great; but then he felt a happy assurance that he could return the money later. He did not find college life all luxury. Besides taking a high rank in his classes he spent some time daily in taking care of the college buildings, or as the saying was, he became "professor of dust and ashes." In vacation he helped on the farm, and was again the life of the house. Reports from college were most cheering—as to conduct and scholarship, but he took the old interest in his home-life and his parents' comfort.

After a few years he graduated. He had told the delighted parents of the fine appointment assigned to him, graduation day, and urged them to come and be present, without fail—the occasion was to be splendid. What a longing they had to hear their Robert speak in public. But it could not be. Their clothes were too worn and shabby. "No, it won't do," said the father, shaking his head. "Our appearance in the old clothes would put the boy to shame." "You are right," said the wife. "Robbie might, perhaps, be jeered at." So they sent him a letter of warm congratulation and sympathy, cheerfully adding that they could not be present, because of their very plain, old clothing. They could not appear public.

The answer came on wings:

"My dear parents, come on! As for the clothes, I will take care about that. You must see your son graduate. Come on!"

This was too much to withstand. The mother cleaned and repaired the old clothes, and they set out on the appointed day with some misgivings. The college was not far away, and the journey was short.

As they entered the large auditorium they chose for themselves a retired corner, where they would be unnoticed, a back seat against the wall, and watched the stream of people in holiday suits, who represented the wealth of the State. At the extreme end of the building, on a platform, they saw Robert, who seemed bent on making arrangements, and their hearts bounded with joy at his merry smile as he greeted friends.

As the exercises began, the band played, the young orators began to speak, flowers were showered and general gayety prevailed.

It was announced that a prize was to be given by the President to that member of the Senior class, who in the judgment of the faculty, excelled in three important respects—ability, character and attainment.

At a signal from the chief, Robert Duncan came forth to receive the highest honor of the class, and a silver medal was seen flashing the sunlight. It was presented with a brilliant Latin speech from the President. The interest of the whole audience had been manifest, but now became intense. The next thing that occurred took every one by surprise. After the modest, dignified reception of the medal, Robert descended the steps of the platform in front and then the central aisle far down to a back seat against the wall, where sat an elderly farmer and his wife clad in homespun. He threw his arms around them both and unfastening the silver medal he pinned it—kissing their cheeks—on the breast of his mother.—Sar Gould, in the Presbyterian.

[The same or a similar incident is related in one of the magazines for Seventh Month.]

Facts as to Winks.

No satisfactory determination has been made of the reason we wink. Some suppose that the descent and return of the lid over the eye serves to sweep or wash it off; others that covering of the eye gives it a rest from the labor of vision, if only for an inappreciable instant. The view borrows some force from the fact that the record of winking is considerably used by experimental physiologists to help measure the fatigue which the eye suffers.

In another line of investigation, Herr S. Gatten has attempted to measure the length of time occupied by the different phases of a wink. He used a specially arranged photographic apparatus, and affixed a piece of white paper to the edge of the eyelid for a mark. He found that the lid descends quickly, and rests a little at the bottom of its movement, after which it rises, but more slowly than it fell. The mean duration of the downward movement was from seventy-five to ninety-one thousandths of a second; the rest with the eye shut lasted various lengths of time, the shortest durations being fifteen hundredths of a second with one subject, and seventeen hundredths with another; and the third phase the wink, the rising of the lid, took seven hundredths of a second more, making the time duration of the wink about forty hundredths, or four-tenths of a second. The interruption is not long enough to interfere with distinct vision.

M. V. Henri says, in L'Année Psychologique, at different persons wink differently—some ten, others rarely; some in groups of ten or at a time, when they rest a while; and others regularly, once only at a time. The movement modified by the degree of attention. Periods close interest, when we wink hardly at all, may be followed by a speedy making up for lost time by rapid winking when the tension is relieved.—Popular Science Monthly.

Squaring Profession and Practice.

No doubt the thing that tells most heavily against people who assume to occupy advanced moral ground, where they invite others to join them, is the fact that practice with them so often fails to tally with the profession. The story is told of Dr. Johnson, that, one day, while dining with a prominent and wealthy man, whose hobby was "popular equality," he completely took the wind out of her sails by replying to one of her complacent generalizations: "Madam, I am now become a convert to your way of thinking. I am convinced that all mankind are upon an equal footing, and to give you an unquestionable proof, madam, that I am in earnest, here is a very sensible, civil, well-behaved fellow-citizen—your footman. I desire that he may be allowed to sit down and dine with us."

The writer knew an excellent northern man, who was noted for his championship of the negro's cause, declaring that the negro was in every important respect the white man's equal, yet he would not allow his daughter to form a friendship with her classmate, the daughter of the colored barber in town; and protested indignantly when the usher once seated a colored man in his pew before the family had arrived at church.

Inconsistency is a most damaging and disreputable charge, if it can be proved against one who professes superior virtue or righteousness. It is the charge which the world most often attempts to bring against the Christian, because it knows that nothing will so discredit a man as demonstrated failure to live up to its own standards. Fortunately, it is very seldom that the real and sincere Christian is convicted of inconsistency. It is generally the false or hypocritical Christian—one who for policy's sake assumes to be a Christian—who is shown to be untrue to God and to his fellow-man in respect to the correspondence of profession and practice.

Nevertheless, it behooves each of us to watch sharply our own conduct, lest in some inadvertent, or perhaps unsuspected way, it could belie the professions which we make in the sight of God and man. Inconsistency is one of the first symptoms of backsliding; and if we find ourselves repeatedly falling to it, we may well believe that the time has come to humble ourselves in the sight of God and prayerfully renew our vows of consecration.—Arthur Burnaby.

THE trimming of the vain world would clothe the naked world.—William Penn.

DISCOVERIES IN EGYPT.—Strange relics from the ancient Egyptian tombs are being exhibited at University College, showing the results of last year's excavating under the guidance of Prof. Flinders Petrie. His recent discoveries are far more valuable from the historical point of view than any previous ones. They bring up an enormously remote antiquity. The most astonishing feature about these discoveries is that they entirely upset all the notions about Greek art which have hitherto prevailed. Instead of the Egyptian art we have known being but the beginnings, that art is now clearly shown to be debased and degenerated from an infinitely superior form many scores of generations earlier! These explorations have been carried on in the old cemetery at Abydos, a short distance to the southwest of the Temple of Osiris, on a spit projecting from the Libyan range above the level of high Nile, which has preserved the tombs. Prof. Petrie opened all the tombs here, and succeeded in identifying the resting-places of seven kings of the First Egyptian Dynasty and two kings who reigned prior to Menes. Amongst the objects shown are portions of a small crystal vase, inscribed with the name of Menes, the date of which, according to Prof. Petrie, is 4700 B. C. The beautiful drinking bowls, made of marble, granite, quartz, alabaster and slate, show that at that remote period the Egyptians had mastered the art of working the hardest material. Ivory must have been very plentiful at that time. Amongst the objects are some beautifully carved ivory feet of bulls. The whole exhibition is simply marvellous.

"SOCIETY can be saved only by what saves the soul."

Notes from Others.

The Russian Church has a rule against the publication of the Old Testament without the Apocrypha.

The American Bible Society has been advertising the Bible in the leading Japanese newspapers. More than five hundred letters of inquiry have been received, and many orders.

Someone has seen a forecast of the automobile in these words of the prophet Nahum: "The chariots shall rage in the streets; they shall jostle one another, in the broadways, they shall seem like torches; they shall run like the lightnings."

The Universalist Leader says: "The only possible religion for the future, is the Christian religion, and the only possible civilization of the future is that which is the outgrowth of, and is based upon, the religion of Jesus Christ."

"If Christian Science is error and its adherents are following a delusion, they can be easily beaten in a fair race, and it will not be necessary that their words and works shall be misrepresented in order that they may be defeated."—Quoted by C. S. Sentinel.

The Observer says: "The next great emancipation must liberate humanity from the tyranny of organized and unconsecrated wealth. God grant that it may come through the redeeming power of Christ's truth, and not through the terrific passion of some civil or social revolution."

John Clifford says in the Watchman: "Hell has been exchanged for hades, and damnation for condemnation, and that uttered very softly; but the change in language and tone has not altered the permanent fact of penalty for wrong doing."

The New York Observer says: "When wealth and culture and power give themselves, as Christ did, to the saving of the world, the hunger and rags and sorrows and sins of every starving and disheartened Lazarus will come to an end."

The Watchman says: "The power that leads men to faith in Christ is not the keenness of human logic or the perfection of an intellectual process, it is the presentation of the moral idea, the answer of the gospel to needs and aspirations that exist, however we explain them."

The Sunday School Times says: "Altruism means other-ism. Altruism announces itself to-day as though it were an independent system, a new discovery. It is but the cutting from the Christian plant. Altruism without Christ is a Christian afterglow, a spent Christian bullet."

The Pacific has the following: "English preaching is powerful; American preaching is brilliant. The men who occupy the pulpits of the great churches of the English-speaking world are up-to-date, progressive and full of noble courage. It is just as important to have such men in the churches as it is to have them in the army."

TWO NOTABLE FAMINE GIFTS.

73 Bible House, New York, July 26th, 1900.

To the Editor:

SIR:—Among the contributions received by the treasury of the New York Committee of One Hundred on India Famine Relief, are two which deserve special mention. In the early part of the present month, the Chinese in attendance at the Reformed Presbyterian Mission, Oakland, California, undertook to earn money for the sufferers in India. They were, for the most part, the better class of house servants, temporarily out of employment, to whom even small sums were of considerable consequence. One of them was skilled in the repairing of cane-seated chairs. Accordingly, they asked their mission teacher for a letter of commendation, and went courageously through the streets of Oakland soliciting work. The result was a remittance of ten dollars and a half for the famine sufferers.

Somewhat later in the month inmates of the Ohio Penitentiary at Columbus, united in a purely free-will offering for famine-stricken India. Out of pittance usually hoarded for personal indulgence, they contributed twenty-eight dollars, forwarding the same to the Committee of One Hundred.

That, in the former case, the despised, isolated stranger in a strange land should show such profound and practical sympathy with far-off India's distress; and that, in the latter case, those whose wrong-doing had fixed such an awful barrier between them and the outside world, should self-denyingly unite for the rescue of the starving in distant India; is glorious proof of "a common humanity." It signifies that the capability of generous sentiment is always in all hearts, and that ennobling good-will can survive all adverse influence.

In each instance, along with the thanks of the committee, was returned the assurance that the gifts would be cabled to India, without expense to the fund; that each dollar would give a day's food to from thirty to fifty hungry persons, or buy three native blankets for the almost naked, or, with from one to two dollars more, aid an impoverished peasant farmer in re-seeding his fields.

Since no essential amelioration of the famine situation can possibly come until the harvests of next October and November are gathered, it were well that the cases which I have cited should inspire all of us to continued and generous gifts.

L. T. CHAMBERLAIN,

Executive Chairman of Committee of One Hundred.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—Secretary of State Hay has made public a letter forwarded to Li Hung Chang, in which the United States refuses to enter into any arrangements regarding disposition of treatment of the Legations in Peking without first having free communication with Minister Conger.

The State Department received a cablegram from Consul Fowler at Che-Foo, which said that he has obtained the copy of the cipher despatch from Minister Conger which was sent through Minister Wu. It is dated Seventh Month 17th, and signed by Conger. Consul Fowler has no doubt as to its genuineness.

The population of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, according to the count just completed at the Census Office, is 285,315, an increase of 39.54 per cent. since 1890.

The Union Pacific Railroad Company is about to begin the construction of a new line between Evanston, Wyoming, and Salt Lake City, eliminating the steep grades of Echo Canon. The new road will not touch Ogden, which will be on a branch line.

Damage to the extent of $1,000,000 is said to have been done to the Illinois broom crop by a recent storm.

During the three days the National Apple Shippers' Association was in session letters and telegrams were received from every fruit growing section of the country, and from these it is estimated that the apple crop this year will be the largest in the history of the United States, exceeding that of 1896, when 60,000,000 barrels were gathered.

The count of the population of Buffalo, New York, just completed at the Census Office, is 352,219. The population in 1890 was 255,664. The increase is 37.77 per cent.

The Census Office announced the population of Louisville, Kentucky, as 204,731, an increase of 43,602, or 27.06 per cent. over the census of 1890.

The amount of gross gold in the United States Treasury on the 2nd reached $631,170,764, which is the highest amount in the Treasury in the history of the Government.

The United States Treasury receipts during Seventh Month were $49,955,160, and the expenditures, $52,979,653, a deficit of $4,024,493. A year ago the deficit was $8,506,832.

Skagway papers have a tabulated account of the shipments of gold up the Yukon via Skagway since Seventh Month 14th. The total is close to $8,000,000.

The monthly statement of the public debt shows that at the close of business on Seventh Month 31st, the debt less cash in the Treasury, amounted to $1,109,346,710, an increase for the month of $1,635,452. This increase is accounted for by the increased disbursements incident to the beginning of the new fiscal year.

An earthquake shook the Tintic mining district in Utah on Fourth-day. The shaft of the Mammoth Mine was so thrown out of shape that it was impossible to get the cage below the 1600 foot level.

A temperature of 111 was recorded at Pierre, South Dakota, on the 1st instant.

The proof appears to be conclusive that the assassin of King Humbert was an Italian immigrant to the United States, and that he returned to Italy with the purpose to kill the king. He lived for some time in Paterson, N. J., and it appears he was a member of an organization which proposed to assassinate other crowned heads in Europe.

A recent election in North Carolina was carried by the Democrats by a large majority. A constitutional amendment was adopted which practically excludes all colored men who are unable to read and write. White men who are similarly circumstanced are allowed to vote.

Captain Frederick Jerome, a sailor, who had the credit of saving over 1,000 lives, during his career, lately died in San Francisco. His efforts in saving the passengers and crews of different vessels was officially recognized both in this country and in England.

There were 439 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 75 less than the previous week and 11 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 235 were males and 204 females; 37 died of consumption; 23 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 13 of cancer; 9 of apoplexy, and 10 of diphtheria.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, new, 103 1/2; 3's, 109 1/2; 109 1/2; 4's, reg., 132 1/2 to 133; new 4's, 132 1/2 to 133; 5's, 113 to 113 1/2.

COTTON closed on a basis of 9 1/2c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.40 to $2.60; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.45 to $3.65; Western winter, straight, $3.45 to $3.65; spring, straight, $3.75 to $4.00; city mills, straight, $3.50 to $3.75. RYE FLOUR—$3.10 to $3.20 per barrel, as to quality.

GRAIN—No. 2 red wheat, 73 1/2 to 74c. No. 2 mixed corn, 11 1/2 to 12c. No. 2 white oats, clipped, 24c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5 1/2 to 6c.; good, 5 1/2 to 5 3/4c.; medium, 5 1/2 to 5 3/4c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4 1/2 to 5c.; good, 4 1/2 to 4 3/4c.; common, 2 to 3c.; spring lambs, 4 to 6 1/2c.

HOGS.—7 1/2 to 8c. for best Western.

FOREIGN.—A battle is reported to have taken place between the allied forces and the Chinese in the neighborhood of Tien-Tsin. The casualties of the allied forces in killed or wounded are set down at 1,200, while the Chinese losses are supposed to have been very heavy.

British Admiral Seymour has held a conference with the Viceroy at Nankin, who asserted that the troubles were wholly due to the Boxers, and had caused the greatest regrets to the Chinese Government.

Japanese newspapers denounce the vindictive purposes of the speech of Kaiser William calling upon his troops to revenge Baron von Ketteler. The Main Hi asks: "Should the cry of vengeance be raised against China because her rebellious subjects perpetrate crimes?"

The question of whether the Chinese Government has secretly encouraged the Boxers in their attacks upon foreigners is still a matter of conjecture.

Yokohama advices say that General Terauchi has reported to the Japanese Government that it is not advisable to send more troops to China, declaring that the United force is now ample to relieve the foreigners in Peking.

It is reported from Shanghai that fifty missionaries have been murdered in the Shan Hi Province.

Prince Alfred Ernest Albert, Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, second son of Queen Victoria, died on the 30th ult. at Rosenau Castle.

The Boer Commandant, General Botha, is reported to be making overtures for surrender.

Paris has a population of 3,000,000 persons and only 40,000 are Protestants.

An unsuccessful attempt was made in Paris by a French anarchist to assassinate the Shah of Persia.

Four cases of plague and two deaths have occurred in London.

The London Times praises Canada's decision not to receive any more destitute immigrants, and, in view of the spread of anarchy, it recommends a similar course of action to European States.

The Spanish Premier, Senor Silvela, intends to take the initiative looking towards an international conference for the suppression of Anarchists, and the Spanish Government has decided to apply rigorously the laws against anarchy.

Telephonic communication between German and French cities has been opened.

The son of King Humbert, of Italy, has been crowned King under the title of Victor Emmanuel III.

The Nicaraguan Government has seized the property of the Maritime Canal Company, at Greytown, on the ground that concession has expired. A concession for building the canal has since been awarded to the Eyre-Cragin syndicate by the Nicaraguan Government. The route has not been selected, and the company has liberty to choose any within the domain of Nicaragua.

A new submarine cable has been laid which connects the island of Fayal with the European and Azores Company's line, from the Azores to Portugal, and is the first to connect the Azores with the United States. It also opens direct communication for the first time between this country and Portugal.

Hayti has adopted the United States gold dollar as a unit of value.

The Japanese Foreign Office announces that the Government of Japan has prohibited all emigration of Japanese laborers to the United States and Canada.

The recent law prohibiting ecclesiastical marriages in Cuba, and recognizing only those accomplished by the civil ceremony, has been modified so that parties intending to marry may go through the ecclesiastical or civil ceremony, or both, at their option. This decision restores to the Roman Catholic Church the privileges it enjoyed prior to the American occupation.

RECEIPTS.

Unless otherwise specified, two dollars have been received from each person, paying for vol. 74.

John Carey, agent, O., $10, for Catharine Ann Stanton, Isaiah M. Hlaworth, Wm. Hlaworth, Ruth B. Mather and Jacob Barrett. Sarah Huestis, agent, O., $18, for Elizabeth Bowman. Lydia Jane Bye, Edna P. Dean, Jason Fawcett, Belinda H. Schofield, David Smith, Eliza Smith, Hannah Ann Vanlaw and Susan Worstell; Margaret J. Jones, Canada; Asa Ellis, agent, Ind., for Charles Jones; Ann E. Wendell, Pa.; Irena P. Draper, la., $1; Mary B. Reeve, Phila.; J. H. Dewees, Pa.; Jos. P. Lupton, Ga.; Wm. Balderston, Pa.; Emilie P. Metzler, Phila.; James C. Chappell, N. C.; Margaret Kite, O.; David Edgerton, O.; Martha White, N. Y.; Edward Comfort, G'tn, and for Edith C. Tatnall, Pa.;

Thomas A. Crawford, agent, O., $14, for Robt. Ellyson David Ellyson, Edwin Fogg, Eliza Ann Fogg, Abne Wo lman, Lydia Warrington and Edgar Warrington Samuel T. Haight, agent, Canada, $20, for Anna H Moore, Henry S. Moore, George Pollard, Joseph G Pollard, John Pollard, Joseph H. Clayton, Catharin Hall, Catharine Casler, Mary Ann Treffry and Joshu Waring; K. L. Roberts, N. J.; Isaac Heacock, Pa. A. J. Jones, Del.; Ellen Bromley, Phila.; Laura A Osborn, Conn.; Frank W. Wood, Ill., $1.55; Joseph ine F. Smedley, Pa.; Mary Lownes Levis, Pa.; George P. Stokes for Meribah W. Thorp, N. J.; M. Eleanor Magill, Phila.; Martha B. Sheffield, R. I.; Robert E Russell for Anna P. S. Russell, Calif.; Thomas E more, Ind., $3; Wm. C. Warren, G'tn, and for S. Elb Warren, N. J.; Henry B. Leeds, agent, N. J., for Wa ter E. Vail; Caspar W. Thompson, N. J.; Hamilt Haines, Phila.; James E. Meloney, Phila.; John t Brown, Pa., $6 for himself, George Schill and Ab McCarthy; Rachel F. Parker, Pa.; Elizabeth L Thomas, Pa.; Charles Lee, Pa.; Susan Pearson, Pa S. S. Parvin, Pa.; Wm. Mickle, Pa.; Lydia T. Kir and for Thomas Evans, Pa.; Thomas H. Whitson, P $28 for Charles S. Carter, Benjamin Hayes, Gilbe Cope, Nathan Cope $4 (2 vol.), Edward H. Hall, Rut anna Hoopes, E. Malin Hoopes, Thomas C. Hogn Mary Ann C. Scattergood, Mercy A. Roberts, Elizabe L. Roberts, William P. Townsend and for Thom Thorp, Del.; Elisha Roberts, N. J., $8 for himse David Roberts, Joseph H. Roberts and William t Roberts; Isaac W. Stokes, N. J., $8 for M. Emma A len, Joseph H. Haines, Benjamin J. Wilkins and G Lippincott, vol. 75; Maria S. Reeve, N. J. and for S. Reeve, Phila.; Jane E. Mason, G'tn and for Jon Edge, Kans.; Frances E. Jones for Margaret H. Jon Oak Lane; Ann Trimble for Mary W. Sharpless, P George L. Smedley, Phila.; Benjamin Heritage, N. William Clarkson Moffitt, la.; Mary E. T. Lord, Phil Joseph K. Evens, N. J.; John H. Ballinger, N. J., for himself, Edward H. Jones and Charles D Balling Stacey C. Stiles, N. J.; John Tatum, Phila.; Willi H. Moon, Pa.; Stephen W. Savery, Pa.; Clarke Moore, agent Pa., $28 for himself, Jael C. Chambe Elizabeth C. Cooper, Pennoek Co per, Thomp Frame, Elizabeth W. Moore, William B. Harv Priscilla H. Hughes, S. M. Jones, Sarah L. P more, Thomas L. Passmore, Hannah Jane Reid, Sa M. Walter and William Wickersham; Jacob R. freth, Pa.; Sidney Garrigues, Pa.; Nathaniel B. Jo N. J.; Price Z. Suplee, Pa. $1, to No. 30, vol. 74.

Remittances received after Third-day noon will appear in the Receipts until the following week.

NOTICES.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. 16th St., Phila.—During Seventh and Eighth Months the Library will be open Second and Fifth-day afternoons from 3 P. M. to 6 P. M.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—The school year of on Third-day, Ninth Month 4th, 1900. For the admis of pupils early application should be made to

WM. F. WICKERSHAM, Principal, Westtown, Pa.

DIED, at the home of his parents, Sixth Month 1 1900, WILMER J. CLAYTON, aged four years and months eldest son of Joseph H. and Caroline W. Clay a member of Norwich Monthly Meeting of Friends, tario, Canada. "But Jesus said, Suffer little child and forbid them not to come unto me, for of such is kingdom of heaven."

—, at her residence, 2113 N. Seventh Street, P delphia, on the Twenty-fifth of Sixth Month, 1900, SA J. BEDELL, wife of Lindley H. Bedell, in the fifty-se year of her age; a member of the Monthly Meetin of Friends of Philadelphia. Her self-sacrificing na thoughtful consideration of others, and her many ac kindness to those whose afflictions or needs appeal her sympathy, were among the many traits of her h tiful character. A loving wife, a devoted mother, a true friend, has passed away. In the midst of a busy useful life, marked by many mercies and favors, she taken with a disease, causing much extreme suffer which she bore with true Christian fortitude and pati When it became apparent the progress of disease al not be stayed, she received the information with calm and composure of spirit, giving evidence that the il pensable preparation for the solemn change which ha hastening had not been neglected. Realizing hersel be poor in spirit, yet trusting in, and clinging to the mercy of God in her dear Redeemer, we reverently the solemn summons found her with lamp trimmed light burning prepared for the joyful invitation, "t thou into the joy of thy Lord."

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, EIGHTH MONTH 18, 1900.

No. 5.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,

(South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth,) PHILADELPHIA.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

Who Made Thee to Differ From Another?

As a peculiar people we do not differ from other Christian associations for the sake of differing. Nor would we plume ourselves on the wideness of our differing as the measure of our soundness in the faith. For it is possible to differ from others through mere pride of difference, or to shun the cross by adopting some of its outward effects as a substitute for the cross. But our apparent differing comes of our concern not to differ from the Truth. If, in keeping our eye single to the light of Truth, we sometime find ourselves left by others, who are the differers and who are the peculiars? Is it better and nobler is it to be a peculiar to the current of human society than to be a peculiar to the Truth,—better a peculiar of the Truth than a peculiar to it. But the true peculiarity keeps its eye single to the Truth; then its whole body is full of light. As soon as it diverts its gaze off from the Truth to its own peculiarity, doubleness and darkness begin to creep in. We cherish, then, our conscientious differences, not because they are differences from others, but because Truth has necessitated them. So far as this separates us from the nodes of others, we endure the loss of fellowship; not as coveting the separation, but as loving to choose between the pure and radical truth manifest to us, and the current which adapts itself to the spirit of the world. "If we were of the world," says the Truth, "the world would love his own. But, because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you."

We steer for the pole-star best not by spying the courses of other ships, to diverge most widely from them, but by going as our true compass-needle points; sometimes it may be off from them; at other points it may be side by side.

We still believe, according to the signs of the times, that the Truth would keep any purely Christian church conspicuously distinct from the churches of the day, in enough of doctrine and of practice to make that church or society seem unique; or, rather, that these have made themselves conspicuously distinct from pure and primitive Christianity. So that all the divergence, all the queerness, all the variation or peculiarity is chargeable, not to any such as keep the eye single to the one mark of spiritual progress, but to those who have varied their course with the times. It is the adapters and not the steadfast, who by conforming themselves to the notions of the day and compromising principle with the times make peculiarity their profession.

Our business as a religious society is neither oddness nor imitation. It is to know nothing among others but Christ Jesus and Him crucified, and to bear witness for the Truth, letting others do as they may. If steadfastness makes us apparently peculiar, we accept such marks of our apostleship as the truth leaves with us. Only God forbid that we should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we are "crucified unto the world and the world unto us."

Those differences between our religious profession and the more popular churches,—differences both formerly and now essential to the truth of our profession,—have become so studiously abolished in many parts, as to indicate the wisdom and the truthfulness of merging of some meetings into the other churches. Better, however, were they recovered to stand steadfast in the principles for which we are still needed on earth.

Glorifying Success.

"No doubt the possession of a strong will and a purpose to endure any toil necessary to achievement are important elements of character. Nothing can be attained without them. It is told of Lincoln that when a boy he could not afford to buy paper for his own compositions. He therefore covered the wooden shovel with essays and arithmetical exercises, which he would shave off and begin again. But the fact remains that possession of these elements of character does nothing to insure their direction toward worthy ends. Indeed, it may be said that their development in the degree inculcated in commencement addresses would tend to diminish, rather than to increase the happiness of mankind. Suppose all men were animated by the ambition of the few who win what is called success, what an increase of toil the ensuing competition would bring to the striving sons of Adam. The strain would be unbearable, in the lack of possible opportunity for more than a few to attain the prizes for which they strove. As it is, it cannot be said that the men who have achieved success, in the popular meaning of the word, furnish the best models for the young, the conditions under which it is attained generally failing to develop their best qualities.

"Moreover, with all the emphasis laid upon the desirability of success, no hard and fast rules have ever been formulated for winning it. No absolute standard is set up, the nearest approach to it being that a man must surpass his fellows in the attainment of objects, the apparent value or importance of which may be readily recognized by mankind. Many a man dies without such recognition after a life of persistent industry. Others who have gained all knowledge, or who have given their lives to the development of a single branch of science, disappear equally unknown, while the charlatan climbs up to success. Attainments, character and worth do not insure success, in fact, have, in many of the men whom the world accounts most successful, been conspicuous by their absence. Indeed, it seems not infrequently that the best assurance of success lies in the possession of a surplus of brute energy, and its direction toward the attainment of material objects, which, as those of general desire, can best be appreciated by the mass of men. And the question is whether it is wise to stimulate ambition for this kind of success."—N. Y. Observer.

It is lovely to see in all those with whom we mingle and have daily intercourse a patient, quiet disposition, not ruffled with all the little annoyances occurring in everyday life, but ever striving to conquer them by pure thoughts and kind words. Often when these angry feelings are aroused within us, if we would only check them at once, how soon would smiles brighten our faces, and not only bring joy to our own souls, but cast a ray of sunshine on those around us. Let us cultivate gentleness. Kindness can be practised by every one, under all circumstances, as it costs nothing.—Ex.

It is a sore reflection on religion if one who is not a Christian seems to show a more attractive and becoming spirit than one who is. The Christian life should always appear under the most pleasing form and to the best advantage, and should include as many natural virtues as possible. One of these is a kind, civil behaviour of one toward another. It is this the Apostle Peter refers to when he says, "Be courteous." If it is one of the lesser virtues, it is not on this account to be disregarded. Indeed its exercise may be remembered when a hundred other things about a person may be forgotten.—Presbyterian.

Doukhobor Notes.

(Continued from page 27.)

Seventh Month 7th.—In the village Voznesienie they have a store, belonging to the community of thirteen villages of the North Colony, in the building lately occupied by Herbert Archer. I am quite in unity with the enterprise, if it is a co-operative store; it did not appear to be very well stocked as yet; but we trust it may develop and prove a good business for the Doukhobors. We had a religious meeting, as the practice has been, before leaving the village, and by the expressions of the people we judge a good feeling was left on the minds of the visited; they, as in nearly every other place, gave full expression of thanks for gifts received, and wished their regard and best wishes to be sent to our Friends at home.

We started out about 4.30 p. m., with the view of crossing Thunder Hill, to a village thereaway, about eight miles distant from the place of starting; after proceeding four or five miles, our trail disappeared, and it seemed as if we were on the wrong course. F. L. (the interpreter), had never been that way before; he usually went another trail, which was supposed to be twenty miles. Frederick had asked at the last village for some one to drive the wagon who knew the short road over the hill, or mountain as it looks in the distance; we were however brought to a halt, and both drivers with two others who were in company, spent considerable time prospecting. Frederick got a long way from the wagon, but came back, saying our load was too heavy to venture breaking our way, it was too dangerous, it would be enough for a pair of horses to take one man through: so we had our choice to pitch tent or return to the nearest village, and we brought up at the village on the top of the hill, under which the North Colony camp stood a year ago.

We found the women grouped together as if they thought the week had pretty nearly come to an end, and they would enjoy the evening in social converse. As it was light, Jonathan and I took a look into their houses, and I took a walk up to the graveyard, where there are twelve graves surrounded by a fence, but I hope they will make a better one. After supper, which was pretty late, I took a walk to where the Government buildings had stood; nine out of thirty-five are still left, although in a dilapidated condition.

Ivan Ivan's wife went with me, calling in the houses, and we found one or two cases of sickness. The milking was done this evening between nine and ten o'clock, with a sinudge fire near.

8th.—A quiet First-day morning and a pleasant temperature. We did not go out to the early religious service that these people have on First-day mornings, thinking it best to rest awhile. Ivan Marchatoff was in bed yesterday afternoon, until we started away; that was the only opportunity he missed.

11.15 A. M.—We have had a satisfactory meeting. Jonathan engaged in testimony and intercession, in a very tender manner. I revived some of the scenes and seasons that had been witnessed among this people, and particularly in this neighborhood.

Left Michailofka, taking with us a Doukhobor boy who knew the road, leaving the baggage, except our valises, at Michailofka, also telling I. M. as we were not taking the baggage wagon he might rest until we came back. We proceeded on the track we were on yesterday, and came to where there was a trail which struck off to the right from the one we were on. We crossed Thunder Hill by the roughest road that Jonathan said he had ever travelled on, and I don't suppose I ever did, for such a length of road. It was well we did not attempt to have the baggage wagon with us, for it was only fit for horseback riding and a sure footed horse at that, not to get tangled. F. L. did not fancy camping last evening, for he spoke as if the wolves might have eaten us and the horses too, but if we had been on the right track it would have been dismal to have been caught for the night, wolves or no wolves. We wanted daylight, and even with daylight we would strike stumps before we could see them, and one front wheel would bounce clear off them, and the other would do likewise; the road was very sideling, and in one place there was a ridge that we tried to keep under the centre of the wagon; on either side the ground was so slanting that Jonathan thought there was not a foot to spare. Now and then we brought up suddenly by the front axle striking a stump.

Jonathan and I preferred walking down the mountain to riding, as also in crossing some of the gullies; on the whole we got enough of it, and chose to take a twenty mile drive round the head of the mountain, instead of re-crossing it. I do not know what we would have done with I. M. if we had had him along, but we got through in safety, and may mark it a providence that we did.

Arrived at the village Uspanija and got our dinner, after which we took a little rest, then visited the homes of the people. In one of the houses we met with Gregory Bokaway, who we were told was ninety years of age, and the infirmities of age are surely upon him. He was in prison three years and sentenced to be shot; this was remanded, but afterwards he was sentenced to be hung; this was commuted to twenty year's exile in Siberia. Strong efforts were made to oblige him to take arms, and he was taken into the church building belonging to the Greeks to be baptized, but from all accounts he held to his principles. He seems to have gangrene in his toes, and I would suppose his course would not be continued much longer on this earth, but there would be a record on high for such as he.

In the meeting, deep subjects were treated upon by Jonathan, bringing to view what our Saviour said of eating his flesh and drinking his blood; and in the response given by the spokesman of the village, it seemed as though it was understood.

My mind was much impressed with what had really been accomplished by the constancy and physical exertion of these people we have been visiting, and I felt it was in place to tell them we felt them worthy of our sympathy, and whilst we wanted the aged ones who were past their time in active service comforted, and those who went out to labor in the field, or wherever their work was, strengthened for the work of the day, and that the children should be properly trained, yet my sympathy was particularly towards those whose husbands were in exile, numbers of whom I observed were youngish women; and I would have them remember that what they had to feel, and what their husbands had to feel, was for a worthy cause.

In passing from that village we saw where there had been some dug outs, in two cases of which the roofs had been broken down; in one case there was a woman inside at the time, but the falling timbers had rested in such a way that she was dug out alive; in the other case a child five years of age was left to watch an infant in the cradle, but by the ends of some timber falling on a box the girl and infant were both rescued alive. Surely the tender mercies of the Lord were over his works in those as in many other occasions.

Arrived at village Troitzkaja about 7.30 p. m., and did something at visiting. The transition from the dugouts and caves seemed to have been quite recent. The houses were in an unfinished condition, but had some improved ideas in the planning, and they had regular bedsteads, with other articles of furniture.

9th.—After breakfast visited the houses left over from last evening, and held a meeting which closed about ten o'clock, after which we made our way back around the end of the mountain, and whilst the surveyor told us we would have "an elegant ride," and the most of it was a decided improvement over that of yesterday, yet there was a portion of it that was deep enough, and hard enough on the horses. In one place the hind wheels sunk down so that the wagon tail was very near the ground we all got off but Frederick, and made a lif on the rear end of the wagon, and with a little more hauling and pulling the horses got the wagon up, and some of us had a novel walk up the hill over the brush; but on the whole we made good time, and I had my doubts about the drive being twenty miles, for we got back in less than four hours.

Dined at Michailofka, and after a little rest visited a house where there was affliction, after which we got Ivan Marchatoff with us, and started for village Nowa Troitzkaja. The word Nowa meaning new. As we approached the village we were espied in the distance, and company came out to meet us singing a hymn and I think they were sincere and hearty in their welcome. We went into all the houses which were inhabited, found one woman very sick, and several with sore eyes; the dear people have not had nutriment enough to keep off the scurvy, although I think it is much less than prevailed a year ago. The village has improved in its buildings since last year, but the people have been so long in the dugouts that it has told on them. I trust they are eating fish, for there was a nice plate of them put on our table for supper, which we enjoyed.

The village is in a beautiful situation, having a commanding view of the surrounding country.

I think our meeting was held to good purpose, and closed in time for us to have supper about the usual hour (nine o'clock), and when that is over I feel that we may credit ourselves with a pretty full day's work. If nothing unforeseen overtakes us we will be ready after breakfast to-morrow to start for Fort Pell where we hope for some further account from home. Our calculation is to make the village Terpenie to lodge to-morrow night, but we are poorly off with no oats for our horses to-night and to-morrow. I will note that the villages were very desirous of showing the appreciation of what Friends had done for them, and were very generous in what they have given us of the work of their hands.

10th.—Left the village of Nowa Troitzkaja about eight o'clock, a group of the villagers waiting our start to give us a send off, according to their custom of parting with their friends.

The road to Fort Pelly, estimated at twenty-five miles from that point, was not as muddy as last year, and consequently the sloughs not so hard to pull through. Arrived about one o'clock, and got dinner at a boarding house, which we could not recommend as first-class. Had some conversation with B. McKenzie, who told us that there would probably be a collection of five hundred Indians about ten miles from here, to-morrow, to receive their annuities. Travelled on to the village Terpenie, and visited the houses, in which we found some very old people and some invalids. The village in the whole seemed to be a thrifty one, the fields of grain on either side of it looked promising, barley particularly so, and the potatoes seemed to have escaped the frost. The houses were planned with judgment, and some of the best carpenter work on them that we have seen so far. We are lodged in a room especially appropriated for meeting purposes, with arrangements for seating, but so contrived that they can easily make a lodging room of it; a family resides in the back part, which is rather an advantage, as they can prepare meals for visitors. The windows in the meeting house are larger than in the dwellings, and altogether is a creditable arrangement.

11th.—There was an early gathering of the people this morning, it being a holiday. Jonathan and I were a little slower than the villagers, who were gathering about four o'clock. We were invited to come outside; two chairs were placed for us, and a third one brought by Ivan Marchatoff. Jonathan and I had our overcoats on, as it was quite cool. Each of the men spoke, and two of the boys recited a psalm, or a religious exhortation, after which they went through the ceremony of kissing and bowing, but the whole service was conducted with great gravity, conveying the impression of sincerity in their marks of respect for each other; I trust, however, the time will come when they will see that vocal expression is the part of every one, bowing and kissing in a general way, is not religion. These exercises occupied about two hours, the men standing all that time bareheaded. When through with their exercises we were asked the question why we were called Quakers, the answering of which Jonathan referred to me, which I undertook, and also used the opportunity to state some of the principles of truth as held by Friends. As we were called in to breakfast, Jonathan proposed to the company that we should come together again after breakfast, and our spring wagon was sent over to the next village to bring grandmother Anasthine Virgin, who returned with her daughter.

We had a remarkable meeting, and many tears were shed. Jonathan spoke of the doctrine preached by our Saviour, that a man must be born again, or he could not see the kingdom of God, and that if a man has not the spirit of Christ he is none of his. I took up the doctrine that if a man was in Christ he is a new creature. The fact that the thoughts of many were turned to those in exile [the letter having been read that was sent to grandmother Virgin] was alluded to, and hopes were felt that the prayers of the church might be availing; but we were not to lose sight of the ministry these exiles might have in Siberia, as also of their faithful friends in this land, and that through faithfulness the knowledge of the Lord and his power are likely to be spread.

The meeting was interesting, not only for what was communicated in the line of the ministry, but from the historical information given. The leader of the village is a talented man of about thirty-nine years of age, and it is worthy of note that his grandmother was present. His relation of the scenes he had witnessed was very thrilling, and with the experience he has had we may hope that the preserving and qualifying power will be vouchsafed, so as to make him a blessing to the people.

We were told of a letter from one who did not hold his ground, but went with the army. He wrote from the army condemning his weakness, or at least expressing his sorrow, and asking the pardon of the brethren.

The meeting being over, we started on our way for a village about ten miles off, but missed our way, and I think we had about a twenty mile ride instead of ten, and in the meantime one of the leaves of the springs snapped; two of us got off, and with some strong twine wrapped it until we got to the village, where we were favored to find a blacksmith that could take the spring to pieces and put in a new leaf.

We found on arrival the villagers pretty much gathered in front of one of the houses, and it was concluded to send word through the village for those who had not come, that we would hold our meeting before going through their houses. At the commencement of the meeting the question was again asked, "Why we were called Quakers?" I left it with Jonathan to endeavor to satisfy them; he took for his text, "Ye that fear the Lord, tremble at his word," and handled it in a masterly manner, and then went on to tell the people that what we hoped or were laboring for, was that their faith in the Lord might be strengthened.

Visiting the houses we found two cases of affliction, also some sore eyes—one of the symptoms of scurvy. The lack of the English language, and of a resident physician, are a part of their hardships. Where we had supper, a bright little woman, after doing all she could to feed us, and having made up four beds in the living room, wanted to know all about our way of living, whether we lived in villages, etc., all of which I tried to answer.

(To be continued.)

It requires great wisdom and industry to advance a considerable estate, much art and contrivance and pains to raise a great and regular building; but the greatest and noblest work in the world, and an effect of the greatest prudence and care, is to rear and build up a man, and to form and fashion him to piety and justice and temperance, and all kinds of honest and worthy actions.—Tillotson.

EACH infant robin, it is estimated, requires for its proper maintenance about fourteen inches of tender angle worm every day. As a robin family averages four, the mother is obliged to provide fifty-six inches of worm daily.

What is Anarchism?

The assassination of king Humbert has again drawn public attention to the propaganda of organized anarchism. The discussions of the aims and methods of the anarchists, to which this event has given rise, exhibit the usual tendency to confound anarchism with communism, socialism and other revolutionary theories. In fact, however, the anarchistic ideal is directly opposed to the communistic and the socialistic.

Anarchism demands the removal of all external restraints upon the individual. Communism and socialism are at the other extreme of rigid subjection of the individual to society. A recent writer, who has given a systematic exposition of the anarchistic theory, defines it as "the perfect, unfettered self-government of the individual, and consequently the absence of any kind of external government." The anarchist would extend the liberal doctrine of "laissez faire" to all human actions. He is an extreme individualist calling for unlimited freedom not only in economic dealings, but in all social relationships.

Pure individualism, while demanding the widest scope for personal freedom and private enterprise in the industrial sphere, holds nevertheless that certain positive laws are necessary in order to guarantee individual rights and to prevent one man from infringing upon the liberty of another. Pure anarchism goes further still, and demands the abolition of all laws and institutions that restrain individual action. Every man should be left free to follow his own inclinations, to live as he pleases without let or hindrance. The State, and with it all authority—political, industrial, military and religious—must be abolished. The individual is to be in the fullest sense "king and high priest unto himself." Thus anarchism means the negation of government.

This ideal is in diametrical contrast with that of socialism and of communism. Pure socialism involves simply the abolition of private ownership of the means of producing and distributing material wealth. Private competing capitals are to be transformed into a collective social capital. The processes of production are to be managed by elected officials, and the products are to be distributed according to some fixed standard of reward, not by way of free contract. Pure communism is an extreme form of socialism. It means common ownership not merely of the means of production and distribution, but of all forms of wealth. Everything is to be held in common. All property rights are to be abolished.

It appears, then, that anarchism and communism, although popularly supposed to amount practically to the same thing, are in theory sharply opposed to each other. The latter aims to subordinate the individual to the community; the former would subordinate the community to the individual.

The anarchist does not, like the communist, deny the right of the individual to possess property. He would have the right established, however, not by legal authority, but by free agreement. This fundamental difference regarding the principle of private possession separates pure anarchism from pure communism by a wide gulf. The communist would make the community the sole proprietor; the anarchist would have each individual a proprietor. The only bond of sympathy between these two classes of revolutionists is a certain similarity of purpose. Both aim at equalizing social conditions. The communist, however, aims to effect this by abolishing the property rights of the individual, the anarchist by sweeping away all external restraints upon the individual.

The anarchists' creed, it should be noted, has a positive as well as a negative side. The destructive part of their doctrines has been summed up in the proposition: "All things are at an end." The constructive portion is embodied in the two principles: "Do what you choose," and "Everything is everybody's." Out of the untrammelled play of individual inclinations the anarchist expects that a harmonious social order will be evolved. He cherishes the fatuous belief in the essential goodness of all human beings that is generally characteristic of utopian reformers.

Notwithstanding the spread of anarchistic propaganda during recent years, it is not likely that the movement will ever gain a wide following in this country. The anarchistic creed of license is foreign to the passion for law and order that dominates the Anglo-Saxon. Anarchism is popular only with the Slavic and Romance peoples of Europe. The theories of anarchism have been supplied chiefly by the French, the "propaganda of deeds" originally by the Russians. Nihilism is simply anarchism passed through the medium of Russian political influences. It is to be noticed, further, that the anarchistic doctrines have been taken up mainly by the workers in certain isolated and sedentary occupations, such as tailors, shoemakers and cabinet-makers. The factory workers have practically escaped this contagion. For these reasons it seems altogether improbable that anarchism will obtain any hold upon the great mass of the American laboring population.—Boston Transcript.

The Old Testament—What it Has Always Been.

The stories and the prayers, the psalms and the confessions, of the Old Testament speak more directly to our hearts, and, as experience has so often shown, start impulses of life and minister consolation which open for us a way of courage and of attainment that otherwise were closed. We have no occasion to apologize for the Old Testament. We leave the difficulties of its history and its composition to the studies of the scholars. We take it for what it has always been,—the story and the instrument of God's revelation of himself to a sinful and sorrowful world of men in the darkness of their transgression and the hopelessness of a life shut out from God by the consciousness of their own helplessness and guilt. To such it comes not only as a story of God striving to lift men to himself, with the possibility of occasional attainment on the part of some patriarch or saint, but also of God's gracious condescension to the multitude of men like ourselves, not willing that any should perish, and from the beginning seeking to save that which is lost. It was an old and far-away world, but one lying strangely near to our own in its needs, its sorrows, its temptations—one through which the living God, in finding a method of speech to it, has spoken of pardon and of life to the men of all time.—Henry A. Stimson, in The Biblical World.

THE HANDS DROP OFF: THE WORK GOES ON.

BY ANNE F. KENT BRADLEY.

Whether it be to rear in stone
Vast pyramids on Egypt's sands,
Or girdle with defensive zone
The boundaries of a mighty land;
In all the grandest works of time
That human power or thought hath won,
Recruits fill up the broken line,
The hands drop off—the work goes on.

Men's thoughts reach out beyond their age,
Like lanterns shining in the dark;
Transmitted through the bard and sage,
God guards with jealous care each spark.
What needs to live will live. The Truth
Waits centuries for a tongue of fire,
And in its own immortal youth,
Springs up from gibbet, stake, and pyre.

The laws the gentle Kepler read,
When not an eye but his could see,
Died not, thank God! when he was dead;
The mind of Newton was to be.
I write: for readers I can wait,
If need be, for a century.
Eternal Patience knows no late,
"Six thousand years," He said, "for me."

We stand sometimes in blank dismay
To see a great man die: "His place
What living man can fill!" we say
"His thoughts what lesser mind embrace?"
"Such loss!" we murmur in despair,
"So much devised, so little done."
A voice sounds through the windless air,
"The hands fall off—the work goes on."

Time proves it so—no wheels are stopped;
Progress and Science hold their own;
The mantle that our hero dropped
On other shoulders has been thrown;
Worn loosely for a time, perchance,
But as the sire, shall grow the son.
God leads himself the grand advance;
The hands drop off—the work goes on.

We lose the darling of our home,
Some pure, sweet child whose gracious smites
Brighten the darkest days that come,
And e'en life's drudgery beguiles.
He lifted us to higher planes.
This was his mission just begun;
Surprised we find his smite remains,
His influence lives, his work goes on.

Who rights the wrong, who breaks the chain
From limbs long fettered without cause;
Or from our statutes wipes the stain
Of evil and oppressive laws,
Must work, and trust to God and time;
Nor hope with mortal eyes to see
The dawning of the day sublime,
The harvest white of victory.

Sad leader of some hated cause,
Measuring thy work by life's few years,
Thou reckonest but by finite laws;
Give to the wind thy idle fears.
Though in the conflict face to face
Thou fallest ere the day be won,
Some heart inspired shall fill thy place
The ranks close up—the work goes on.

Grand hope! Sweet comfort! Rear thy plans,
And sow thy seed with careful thought;
In God' good time, if not in man's.
The miracle of growth is wrought.
Thine eyes may close before the day
That crowns the work so well begun;
"He sowed," the grateful gleaners say,
"That we may reap—his work goes on."

Gleanings from Epistles to Canada Yearly Meeting, held at Pickering, Ontario, 1900:

Let us remember that "all things work together for good to them that love God;" even our trials and various temptations, which at the moment seem grievous are means in our Heavenly Father's hand of advancing our spiritual life, for if there were no temptations there would be no battle, and without battle no victory is possible. The apostle James tells us "to count it all joy when we fall into divers temptations knowing that the trial of your faith worketh patience." But he also says "every man when he is tempted is drawn away of his own lust and enticed," which if yielded to, results in sin, and the paths of sin lead to death. Is not the expression "his own lust," but another form of the more familiar term selfishness? What wrong doing can we think of which is not gendered by self-exaltation, self-gratification? Oh! may it be ours and yours to seek to obtain the victory over self, that our hearts may be wholly cleansed from self and all that defiles, so we may become fit temples for the sanctifying presence of the spirit of our God. What a blessed condition to be in; what room is there, in such a condition, for impure thoughts and words?—Iowa.

"Through faith of which He himself is the author, we are drawn in God's love to receive Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom and righteousness, and sanctification and redemption."

Coming in the flesh, through his life, sufferings and death, he finished the work God his Father gave him to do, in opening up a way for sinners to come to God, whereby "God might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus." This same Jesus now comes in spirit to fulfil the purpose of his death "to redeem his people from all iniquity and purify unto Himself a peculiar people zealous of good works." It is then as through faith, hearing the call of God we obey his mandates, we are led into true repentance toward God, and yielding our heart to the word of faith with power, our hearts are cleanse from sin; and it is as "walking in the light" (which makes manifest to man both the sea and the fountain), "we have fellowship with God, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin."—Kansas.

We sympathize with you in your widely scattered meetings and membership, and we feel that when so far from Friends' meetings that you cannot attend, it is better to sit down with your families and wait upon the Lord in silence than to attend other places of worship. There are often cases in which such faithfulness is blessed. Our dear Friend Archibald Crosby related an instance of a Friend in England or Scotland, living in a city where he was the only Friend; feeling it required of him to sit alone in silence, and after a considerable time another person joined him, and still another until a good sized Friends' meeting was established. There is always encouragement, dear Friends, to be faithful in every duty.

We have received and read at this time Epistles from all the Yearly Meetings with which we correspond, confirming us in the belief that such correspondence is in accordance with the will of the great I Am, and that I deigns to bless these expressions of conce-

d fellowship for each other; and that as we seek for ability to write under the blessed influence and constraining love of the Gospel our Lord Jesus Christ, these letters will continue to bind us together in loving fellowship, and help us to declare the whole counsel of God.

The present disturbed and warlike attitude of the world makes it the more imperative for us, as a people, to keep very close to our good Guide, waiting for and obeying the clear manifestations of Truth in our hearts. The mission of the Society of Friends is not fulfilled so long as so much exists in the professed Christian church contrary to the pure and acceptable principles of the Gospel as taught and exemplified by the blessed Saviour.—New England.

Many fathers and mothers have of late been moved from works to rewards, yet in viewing the many solid, attentive young people who gathered here, we believe it is the design of the Most High, through the qualifying influence of his Holy Spirit, to raise up others of faithfulnes (as abode in) to take their places, which is encouraging to us.

May you, as well as we, be faithful to all our principles and testimonies, being good examples to the dear youth, thus evincing to them that there is indeed a reality in the religion we profess, it being none other than primitive Christianity revived. This changes the heart from a state of nature to a state of grace, and is that for which our early Friends suffered so much. To them, all of our testimonies were near and dear, they being an outgrowth of faithfulness to the manifestation of truth. Dear Friends, we do not wish to prolong this token to you, realizing that the letter itself killeth, and that it is the spirit that giveth life; but we do desire your preservation and establishment on the one sure foundation. Paul counted not himself to have apprehended, but he says, "forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth to those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." "Therefore, heretofore we have already attained, let us walk in the same rule, let us mind the same thing." "Let us may all be preserved "in the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace," that so laboring together we may be instrumental in advancing the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, whose fruit is "Peace on earth and goodwill to men."—Ohio.

EVERY one who lives wholly to please God has a right to claim his protection, his direction and his help, not every hour only, but every moment of his life. It is more than a mere sentiment to live. It is a serious reality, which the hand, the head and the heart are enlisted. The only way, therefore, for the Christian is to "commit" himself habitually, sincerely, unhesitatingly and with godly trust to the hands of Him who has warranted us in believing that all things have worked, do now work and will work, in the coming days, for our good.—The Christian.

If there is any person to whom you feel displeasure, that is the person of whom you ought never to speak.—Cecil.

Sound Words.

(Continued from page 30.)

Why do you object to the ministers being called reverend, and to wearing clothes to distinguish them from others?

Because these things were just the things the Pharisees loved, whom Jesus upbraided for so doing, and taught his disciples "that One only is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren." Again, "Be ye not of men called Rabbi"—a Babylonish term, Rab, as Rab-Shakeh (Isaiah xxxvi: 2), etc., signifying Lord or Master, and applied by the Jews as a title of honor to those skilled in the law, and the traditional lore of the Jews afterwards embodied in the Talmud. But "reverend" is a still higher term of flattery, being in the Holy Scriptures only once used, and that to God—"Holy and reverend is his name" (Ps. cxi: 9). Christ is the Head over all to his church, and his gifts to the members are all honorable, and these gifts are various, nor does a gift in the ministry of itself confer any sanctity beyond that bestowed on other members of the church, Christ's body. Above all others a minister needs have the gift of humility, which having, Elihu's language becomes him, "Let me not I pray you, accept any man's person, neither let me give flattering titles unto man. For I know not to give flattering titles; in so doing my Maker would soon take me away" (Job xxxii: 21, 22). Besides all this, we honor men accordingly as God honors them, as this He does to all the faithful, and we are also enjoined to "Honor all men," and nothing but unrighteousness should cause us to hold them in any degree of dishonor. So we can neither give nor take lip honor, too often bestowed on unworthy men by fawning flatterers.

As to wearing peculiar garments, the Pharisees did the like. Each grade amongst the hierarchical systems does the same now. None of the apostles ever gave instructions to that effect, and who is there can prove that they ever thus clothed themselves?

Finally, all true Christians are made kings and priests to God, not according to the commandments of men, but as Christ Jesus was called to be a High Priest to God in spiritual things, so, under and by Him are his people made priests to God, "after the power of an endless life;" and this power these earthen vessels hold at their Lord and Master's will, to be broken at will, until re-formed and fitted again to hold the offering prepared of Him.

But do not you Friends wear a peculiar garb? Not one enjoined by any so-called canon of the church, nor have we any distinctive dress amongst ourselves to distinguish what properly is neither ours, nor yet in our own power, but only held, like others, as faithful to duty. Garments stripped of superfluity, giving no place for pride or vanity to work, are in strict keeping with the commandments of the apostles Peter and Paul. Being made free men and women in Christ, we cannot become slaves and devotees of fashion. Garments, first made necessary to man, through sin, are now for use; and in them to display pride and vanity belies the profession of the Christian, and those shackles of his bondage to the world and its fashions are willingly discarded when the Truth makes him a free man, seeking not glory and honor of men, but of God only, who looks on the heart; and he who would approach the mercy seat of God should bow in humility, in meekness, and in quietude of spirit. He who is the author of this purifying faith, says, "How can ye believe, which receive honor one of another, and seek not the honor that cometh from God only?" (John v: 44). Do not earthly potentates giving audience, demand of those who would do them homage, that they be clothed in apparel to their liking? Let then the clothing of our hearts be such as is well pleasing to our Lord.

Why is it better not to use the term "anointed ones" as applicable to ministers of the gospel? Because it is a term used but once in Holy Scripture (Zech. iv: 14), and then in reference to the one true God, elsewhere spoken of as the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

Nor are Christ's ministers anywhere spoken of as being more than their brethren specially anointed like as priests, for that service. They are called, empowered and commissioned, as was the apostle Paul, and like all other members of the church, which is Christ's body, partake of his "anointing which they receive of God," and which abideth in all who retain a membership in that body. And it is to this anointing, that servants of Christ, as true witnesses to Him and his power seek to bring men, that they may hear and obey God's call and be anointed; for, by this are all taught of God.

Why is it best to refrain from using the term "dear God," or "dear Saviour"?

Because the word "dear" is not so used in Scripture. It is an expression used to equals, or by condescension to others. The Son with the Father is called "God's dear Son," and by adoption Christians are styled "dear children" (Eph. v: 1). But Jesus whilst on earth never used the term to his Father, nor though the apostles knew and loved the Lord Jesus as a man, yet they so revered him as God, that they never used the word. In like manner, though on several occasions Jesus condescended to call those who do the Father's will "brethren," the apostles never called him "brother" or "elder brother." It is true "He was made like unto his brethren," and with us "He that is joined to the Lord is one spirit" (1 Cor. vi: 17). Truly, all baptized by the one spirit into one body, are of the family and household of God, and as such are all brethren in Christ.

Yet for these and like things we would not esteem a brother any the less, nor make a man "an offender for a word," else would we be void of that charity which thinketh no evil. But seeing, let us walk according to the light bestowed, and walking let our light, in our daily conversation, gravity, fewness and sincerity of our words, brightly shine, and that others may come to a clearer discernment and a watchful frame of mind, remembering, "By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned" (Matt. xii: 37). Even a soldier in the field is better known by his language than by his uniform. We should know one another by tokens deeper than mere words, the language of the spirit, which is love. Yet the importance of carefully guarding a pure language is well exemplified by that sad episode in Jephthah's career, when forty and two thousand Ephraimites who had foolishly envied him on account of his victory and the consequent delivery of Israel, which yet he owed all to God and gave to Him the glory, these brethren in Israel were slain, detected by their Shibboleth, which in their mouths became Sibboleth. And as in them the heart first imbibed sinful feelings, ere words convicted them, so all apostasy is first from grace, God's power in man; then words and deeds follow, making still more manifest a fall from grace.

W. W. B.

Selected for "THE FRIEND."

SHOE STRINGS.

A little girl, long, long ago
Sat lacing up her shoe;
The holes then, had no nice brass rings
And if the tags were off the strings
'Twas hard to push them through.

She wet the strings and twisted them,
With earnest face awry,
And punched and poked with patient zeal,
'Till suddenly her hands grew still
And she began to cry.

"I've just had such a thought!" she sobbed:
"Until I'm old and gray
I just will have to keep ahead,
Mornings and mornings, 'till I'm dead,
Lacing my shoes each day!"

That little girl is grown up now,
And she has learned two things:
That half the burdens we foresee
Prove lighter than we thought they'd be.
And often, too, take wings.

And that while some task, new or old
Always attends our way
We'll seldom fail to get well through
With each, if we don't try to do
To-morrow's work to-day.

For "THE FRIEND."

An Explanation.

My article in the Springfield Republican, most of which appeared in THE FRIEND of Seventh Month 4th, had a few typographical errors. One in the quotation from David Gregg's remarks. Instead of reading, "They have the honor of being one of the five divisions of Christendom," etc., it should read first instead of five. And where it reads, God saved Moses alone, it should be alive, and the date should be Seventh instead of Fourth Month.

The heading was given by the Springfield Republican, not by myself. It is hardly appropriate. The article did allude to the ridicule given to the Prohibition party by others, but the main drift designed to show the want of a high standard of morality in the world, and that Friends had exerted an influence for good among peoples and nations.

JOHN W. FOSTER.

WESTERLY, R. I., Eighth Month 8th, 1900.

"HE that doeth righteousness is righteous. His being righteous makes him able and willing actually to do right. Not that his works justify him, but the justified man works. Not that the fruit makes the root and the tree good, but good fruit shows the root and the tree to be good."—Zion's Watchman.

GREEK, Latin, French, German, Natural and Physical Science, Metaphysics and Esthetics, are all profitable and delightful, both as training and as acquisitions, to him who studies them with intelligence and love, but not one of them has the least claim to be called an acquisition essential to a liberal education or an essential part of a sound training."—President Eliot, of Harvard College.

For "THE FRIEND."

Cornell in Summer.

Cornell University in common with Harvard, the University of Chicago and many other less important institutions, now holds a summer session. In ordinary parlance this session is spoken of as a Summer School, but, strictly speaking, it is a regular six weeks' term of the university, and the machinery of university life is in running order very much as in regular term time. The work counts, even for undergraduate students, and not a few of this class are able to shorten, or at least to lighten, the regular four years' course by taking some summer work. The professors, naturally enough, are not all giving courses during the summer time, but a majority of the most famous are at hand and give themselves to the work with a will.

Not the least interesting feature of the Summer School is the Nature Study work under the direction of the College of Agriculture. Readers of THE FRIEND may be surprised to know what a missionary spirit goes out from this great centre of learning to convince the citizens of New York State, and through them the larger circle of the whole country, that agriculture is at once one of the most worthy, attractive and steadily profitable callings open to the youth of our land. The method of the Nature work in the summer session is to give the two hundred teachers in that department (there are about four hundred and fifty registered summer students) some knowledge and enthusiasm along lines of Nature Study which they in turn can hand on to their children. Plant life and animal life are made to be open avenues of interest and education, and incidentally the resources and management of the Cornell farm are brought under observation. Prof. Roberts, the head of the Department of Agriculture, is also the university farmer, and under his direction the farm is made to yield an income to the Institution, as well as to furnish a laboratory for the courses in agriculture, horticulture and dairying. We have been greatly interested to learn how this model farming affects the adjacent neighborhood. Its experiments are all open secrets, and the professors conduct institutes in various centres and encourage farmers to bring their problems to the university for solution. As one looks out from the Cornell campus over the miles of smiling orchards and fields that encircle the lake there are many signs of prosperity, and conference with some of the farmers has confirmed us in the belief that farming from this vantage ground of trained intelligence means success.

At the George Junior Republic, nine miles to the eastward of Cornell, William George told us, somewhat proudly, that their farmer is a graduate of the two years' agricultural course at the university. He further explained that the Republic bought three worn-out farms (about two hundred acres in all) and that under the present farmer the soil had been much improved and that already a favorable balance of income had been secured. In addition to this the price of other farm lands in the vicinity has advanced. Who can estimate the boon to the country at large if the farmer boys of a rising generation are taught that no more enticing field for health, happiness and profit can be found than the farm itself? Isn't the time fully ripe for our own schools, that have farms, to lend a hand in this noble work?

Returning for a moment to the subject of Summer Schools, let me add a word in their defence from the teachers' standpoint. Many well concerned friends of our schools feel that the summer is a time for teachers to recuperate their exhausted powers. This undoubtedly is true, but where this recuperation can go hand in hand with a limited amount of professional and intellectual stimulation, so much the better. This, of course, premises good judgment on the part of the teachers in choosing a limited amount of work, and a situation for the school that lends itself readily to the exhilarating pleasures of out-of-door summer life. Cornell is fortunate in this latter particular, and we must trust our teachers for the former.

J. HENRY BARTLETT,

ITHACA, New York, Eighth Month 1st, 1900.

For "THE FRIEND."

Appreciation of the Arabic Version of Barclay

EXTRACT FROM A RECENT LETTER.

RASEL METN, Beyrout, Syria.

Sixth Month 3rd, 1900.

... I must tell you how deeply indebted we are to American Friends for the five hundred copies of Barclay's Apology, which they gave us four years ago. Barclay's Apology is one of the best books in the English language, and its arguments and defence of spiritual religion are most clear and convincing.

I owe much to Barclay, and it has been my desire to see it widely circulated. We have given the Arabic version to many, and now have the testimony of some who have read it. All speak of the benefit and light they have received. One young man of the American Presbyterian Mission asked me for a copy, having heard of the book from others. I gave him one. Some months later I met him again. He grasped my hand so warmly and thanked me for the book and said: "It is the best and most helpful religious book I have ever read apart from the Bible, and I have read many, have been wonderfully helped by it." The head teacher in a high school belonging to a Scotch mission sent me a special request for a copy as "he had heard from a relative of his who had read the book that it was so helpful."

I thought that the dear Friends who have so generously helped to pay for the production of Barclay into Arabic, would be pleased to know that God is blessing the book. . . .

Yours very sincerely,

DANIEL OLIVER.

MOTHS AND BUTTERFLIES DISTINGUISHED.—"A question which is frequently asked by those who are not familiar with the subject relates to the manner in which it is possible to distinguish between moths and butterflies. A partial answer can be made in the light of the habits of the two classes of lepidoptera. Butterflies are diurnal in their habits, flying between sunrise and dusk, and very rarely taking the wing at night. This habit is so universal that these insects are frequently called by entomologists 'the diurnal lepidoptera,' or as simply spoken of as 'diurnals.' It is, however, true that many species of moths are also diurnal in their habits, though the great majority of them are nocturnal, or crepuscular, that is, flying at the dusk of the evening, or in the twilight of the early morning. Upon the basis of mere habit, then, we are able only to obtain partial clue to the distinction between the two orders. A more definite distinction is based on structure, and specifically upon the structure of the antennæ. Butterflies have long thread-like antennæ, provided with a swelling at the extremity, giving them a somewhat club-shaped appearance. This form is very unusual among the moths, and only occurs in a few rare genera, found in tropical countries, which seem to represent connecting links between the butterflies and the moths. All the true moths which are found within the limits of the United States and Canada have antennæ which are club-shaped, but are of various other forms. Some moths have thread-like antennæ tapering to a fine point; others have feather-shaped antennæ; others still have antennæ which are club-shaped in form, and provided with a little hook or spur at the end; and there are many modifications and variations of these forms.

Besides the distinctions which exist in the matter of the form of the antennæ, there are distinctions in the veins of the wings, and in the matter of carrying them when at rest in flight, which are quite characteristic of the two groups; but all of these things the attentive student will quickly learn for himself by observation."—W. J. Holland's The Butterfly Book.

LITTLE Alice, not three years old, came running into the room where her mother was sewing, and, throwing her little head into her mother's lap, said: "Mamma, I don't want God everywhere." Her mother suspected that she had been in some mischief; so she went into another room and found the little girl had been doing wrong—had been disobedient.

"THE last thing a man wants to do is to confess his sins. He can confess other people's sins very easily."

Items Concerning the Society.

Some Friends are rather transgressing the bounds of the plain language, to pay compliments. William Everett.

Jonathan E. Rhoads arrived home from his late visit among the Doukhobors on the morning of the 17th instant, and Joseph S. Elkinton two days later, both in good health.

Eliza Varney and Jennie Baker have opened a school for Doukhobor children with over forty scholars in attendance at a village of the South prairie. The Government agent at Yorkton is interested in their work and was supplying them with a larger tent and school furniture. The children seem quite apt at learning.

BIBLIOGRAPHY OF FRIENDS.—We find in the British Friend the following addressed to English Friends, which seems equally to concern all under the name in Philadelphia and elsewhere:

"The Young Friends' Association of Philadelphia, through its standing Committee on Literature, has been engaged since 1896 in the preparation of a Bibliography of Friends' Publications from 1800 to 1900, which is intended to supplement and continue the well-known work of the late Joseph Sturge, of London.

It is proposed to include (1) all works issued since 1850, written or edited by members of all branches of the Society of Friends, and (2) all notable works by others relating to Friends. Already some eight hundred and fifty titles have been enumerated, and the work of compilation is under way.

"In order that this work may be made as complete and accurate as possible, it is desired to secure the co-operation and assistance of all who are interested in the subject.

"As much difficulty has been experienced in obtaining complete and accurate lists and details of foreign authors and publications, we would earnestly appeal to our English Friends to extend to us their interest and co-operation.

"Communications may be addressed to HOWARD M. JENKINS, Y. F. A. Buildings, 15th and Cherry Streets, Philadelphia."

Another cause which operates against the ministry is the idea, which is becoming general, that the ministry must preach scholarly discourses, and that for these it is necessary to devote much time to study; consequently the minister may not do as Paul did and make tents, or as one of our own ministers does, make brooms, but must devote his whole time to the ministry. This idea seems fraught with much evil to me. It at once divides the clergy and laity, with all the attendant ills. It encourages the belief that ministers must be learned and that erudition is what is needed in sermons. It narrows the experiences of the minister. It is certainly a great mistake to suppose that we get the Gospel unadulterated when we hear it from an ignorant person, and it is glorious for one to be able to take the things of God and illustrate and enforce them from all knowledge; but it will never do to confine preaching the Gospel to a set of men and women with nothing else to do.

It is not Greek or Latin or theology that will save the world, and it is not history and literature, or even science, which the world is hungry to hear, but the glad tidings which Jesus brought, and the simpler it is told the better. I have no doubt that within our own Yearly Meeting to-day there are many who are called to tell the glad tidings who are holding back, and will not use opportunities as they are given because they have little time for reading, and cannot preach sermons; and the oft-repeated assertion that to be a minister takes, or should take, all one's time, increases this number. If these could but lay aside their own notions as to what a minister should do and be, and simply do that which for the present they feel to be their duty, our meetings would not be without the ministry of the Gospel.

Again, "pastoral work requires so much time." The minister should not be expected to do pastoral work. This is the very end and aim of the elder-ship—when it is living, and not a mere form.—M. M. Hobbs.

Notes from Others.

A projectoscope, to throw whole texts from the Bible on the sky is the latest idea of a New York revivalist. There are texts enough in the sky already, if a man had but eyes to read them.

It is stated that Roman Catholic missions number about three million native Christians and three thousand missionaries; Protestant missions, about four million native Christians and six thousand missionaries.

"And they (the apostles), departed from the presence of the council, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name. And they ceased not to teach and preach Jesus Christ." It requires the greatest effort of imagination to trace any connection between the church of to-day, as we represent, and even as we know it, and the Church of heroic days. Take a cutting out of any modern church record and put it beside this cutting from one of the earliest church writers, then look on the two pictures and tell me how the latter can justify even a family connection with the former. Are we in the apostolic succession? Not so far! No man is in the apostolic succession who is not in the apostolic spirit, and the apostolic spirit was a spirit of self-denial, self-suppression, courageous faith, valiant, soldier-like determination, to speak the truth and to live it. We modify, we adapt, yes, that is what we are—not apostles, but adapters. I knew there was a word somewhere in the language that would express our present spirit and service. We adapt the gospel to the age. We preach to the times. We do not stand back in those eternal truths which belong to all ages, and whose musical thunder should bring into reconciliation every antagonism and discord. Yet we claim to be of the old-fashioned sort. The old-fashioned ministers bore scars for medals; they took honors in the school of suffering; they graduated in the dungeon and in the wilderness, and their breath was like the fresh air that blows around a mountain top. Would that the old heroic days would come back upon us all!—Joseph Parker of London.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Further communications between the eight ministers of different nations imprisoned in Peking with their respective governments have taken place, by which it appears that urgent efforts have been made by the Chinese government to induce them to leave Peking under an escort which it promised to provide. This the ministers have refused to do without instructions from their governments. To leave Peking, Minister Conger says, as the Chinese Government demands, would be certain death. All connected with the American Legation, he says, are well.

An Imperial edict, transmitted by the Privy Council at Peking says: "In the present conflict between China and foreigners there has been some misunderstanding on the part of the foreign nations and also a want of proper management on the part of some of the local authorities. A clash of arms is followed by calamitous results and has caused a rupture of friendly relations, which will ultimately do no good to the world. We hereby appoint Li Hung Chang as our Envoy Plenipotentiary, with instructions to propose at once by telegraph to the Governments of the several Powers concerned for the immediate cessation of hostile demonstrations, pending negotiations, which he is hereby authorized to conduct for our part, for the settlement of whatever questions may have to be dealt with." The United States Government has firmly declined to meet Li Hung Chang as Plenipotentiary until Minister Conger can communicate freely from a place of safety with his home Government. It is said that upon his report on the causes of the outbreak and the acts that characterized it, together with the evidence of the responsibility of the Imperial Government in connection with the Boxers, will depend what further course the United States will pursue.

The total appropriations made by Congress at its last session amounted to over $710,000,000. Of this sum about $180,000,000 were appropriated to the army and navy, $145,000,000 for pensions, and $7,000,000 for fortifications. It appears that the number of pensioners on roll Seventh Mo. 1st, 1900 was 993,529, an increase for the year of 2,010. During the first four years covered by President Grant's administration the aggregate amount disbursed for pensions was $116,136,275. During the second four years it aggregated $114,395,357. During the four years of President Hayes, beginning 1877, and ending 1881, the aggregate was $145,322,489. The total amount paid for pensions since 1866 reached the enormous sum of $2,528,373,147, which is within a comparatively small sum of the total amount paid for interest on the bonded debt during the period named.

The expenses of the U. S. Government on account of the war with Spain since Third Month 1st, 1898, have been $404,800,000. The cost of the war with the Philippines included in the above is set down at $186,678,000; 2,394 lives of American soldiers, it is stated, have thus far been lost in the Philippine war.

A Seattle, Washington, despatch says that while the steamer Robert Dollar was aground on the beach at St. Lawrence, on her last trip to Nome, her passengers discovered the skeleton of a mastodon eighty feet long.

More than half of a British loan of ten million pounds sterling has been placed in this country. The Pall Mall Gazette commenting upon this, says: "The loan shows that America will occupy a new role in the future—that of lender. Ere long American operators and investors will interest themselves in the international group and be a factor to be reckoned with."

Charles D. Lane, a well known miner who has returned from Cape Nome has reported that "from 5,000 to 10,000 people at Nome are facing absolute destitution, and the only possible relief is through the United States Government. Steamers now running to Nome could not possibly bring out the destitute gold hunters, even if the owners could be expected to give them free transportation."

A despatch from St. John's says that the fishery outlook is the most unfavorable known there in recent years. Owing to the ice blockade off the Labrador coast the catch of cod shows a decided decrease, which it will not be possible to offset during the remainder of the season.

Fifty-two cases of yellow fever are now under treatment in Havana. Of the victims, eighteen are Americans. Thus far the mortality rate has been about 25 per cent. of those attacked.

According to "school census figures," the population of Chicago is 2,007,695.

The entire number of pupils in all schools, public and private, last year in this country was 16,687,643, out of an estimated population of 72,737,100. There are 101,058 young men and women in the universities and colleges, 54,231 in schools of law, medicine and theology, 67,538 in normal schools, 70,950 in business schools, 23,501 in reform schools, 97,737 in kindergartens.

There were 452 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 13 more than the previous week and 7 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 248 were males and 204 females; 56 died of consumption; 16 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 20 of cancer; 11 of apoplexy, and 7 of diphtheria.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, new, 103 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 104 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; 3's, reg., 108 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 109 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; 4's, reg., 114 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 115 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; new 4's, 131 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 132 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; 5's, 112 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 113 $\frac{1}{2}$ .

COTTON closed on a basis of 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.40 to $2.60; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.45 to $3.65; Western winter, straight, $3.45 to $3.65; spring, straight, $3.75 to $4.00; city mills, straight, $3.50 to $3.75. RYE FLOUR—$3.10 to $3.20 per barrel, as to quality.

GRAIN—No. 2 red wheat, 74 to 74 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.

No. 2 mixed corn, 43 to 43 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.

No. 2 white oats, clipped, 30 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 6c.; good, 5 $\frac{1}{4}$  to 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.; medium, 5 $\frac{1}{8}$  to 5 $\frac{1}{4}$ c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 5c.; good, 4 $\frac{1}{4}$  to 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.; common, 2 to 3c.; spring lambs, 4 to 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.

HOGS.—7 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 8c. for best Western.

FOREIGN—Among the causes which have produced a strong antipathy to foreigners in China are the acquisitions of territory by Great Britain, Russia and Germany, and the open advocacy in European nations of the dismemberment of the Empire. Besides these which are of comparatively modern date, has been the introduction of opium by Great Britain. A high official in Soochow writes: "From ancient times to the present day there has never been such a stream of evil and misery as has come down upon China in her receiving the curse of opium. . . . From the time that opium was first introduced into China until now, a period of over a hundred years, the number of deaths directly caused by it must count up into the millions."

The advance of the allied forces from Tien-Tsin towards Peking continues. Several villages have been captured on the way. In a reply to the Chinese Government respecting its minister in Peking, the French Government is reported to have said: "No order to depart from Peking will be given to our Minister so long as the route is unsafe. If a casualty occurs the responsibility will be entirely with the Chinese Government. Its strict duty is to protect foreign Ministers even more than its own. If it be true that the Chinese Government has great difficulty in defending them and in defending itself against rebels, it should order its troops to stand aside before the allied forces. This would render free the road from Tien-Tsin to the capital, and would accomplish the work of protection which is encumbered."

The Government of Russia has given permission to its Minister to leave Peking for Tien-Tsin, on condition that the existing Government at Peking and the Emperor afford them the sure guarantee that the journey can be undertaken without danger. At the same time, he is instructed to call attention to the heavy responsibility the Chinese Government will incur should there be the slightest infraction of the inviolability of the persons accompanying him to Tien-Tsin."

A despatch from London of the 11th says: "The Russian Government's permission to M. de Giers and his staff to leave Peking under Chinese guarantees, while the United States and other Governments tell their Ministers to hold out till relieved, is the subject of much comment in London, where supposed Russian designs are closely scrutinized."

The Catholic paper, Germania, at Berlin, learns that ten out of fifty missionaries in the vicarato of Southwest

Pe-Chi-Li have been murdered, and that three thousand converts have suffered the same fate.

Although no plan has yet been adopted for international protection against Anarchists, the German Foreign Office is authority for the statement that it is likely a scheme will be devised, and that the preliminary steps have already been taken.

Lord Roberts telegraphs that after ten days' resistance the British garrison on the Elands River has evidently been captured.

The treaty between the Republics of Santo Domingo and Hayti having expired, Hayti now requires all Dominican products to pay on importation the duty imposed on articles from other countries.

One hundred Italian deputies, representing all parties, met and decided to establish charitable institutions for consumptives in all parts of Italy.

Lord Russell, Chief Justice of England, died 10th inst. in London.

The main provisions of the meat law recently enacted by the German Government, effecting among other things the absolute prohibition of American canned meats and sausages, will take effect Tenth Month 1st next.

According to the statistical year book of German cities, it appears that the consumption of horse meat is on the increase, and in Breslau, Chemnitz, Dresden, Leipzig, Zwickau and other places dogs are slaughtered for food.

The Dead Sea "is to have a line of motor boats in the future. Owing to the continued increase in traffic and the influx of tourists, a shorter route is to be found between Jerusalem and Kerak, the ancient capital of the Land of Moab. The first steamer, built at one of the Hamburg docks, is about one hundred feet long, and already it has begun the voyage to Palestine. An order has been given for the building of a second steamer. The management of the line is in German hands.

Mulhall, the statistician, says that during the year 1897 British shipping earned $279,000,000, over a half of the total earned by the world's shipping. Germany came next with $41,500,000; Norway, $25,000,000; France, $24,000,000; Canada, $17,000,000; the United States, $16,000,000. The total earnings of the world's shipping were $509,000,000, of which $467,000,000 is credited to European countries.

Ambassador Choate has been appointed arbitrator between the British and Chinese Governments in the case of the sinking of the British despatch boat Kow Shing during the Chino-Japanese war.

Russian War Office telegrams from Eastern Siberia show the Chinese have destroyed the railroad in several places, but repairs are proceeding. The Cossacks now guard two thousand versts on the frontier railroad.

In Norway, Sweden and Finland women are frequently employed as sailors, and do their work excellently, and in Denmark several women are employed afloat as State officials, generally in the pilot service.

Official advices to the Department of Agriculture repeat that the foot and mouth disease is very prevalent among live stock throughout almost all of Europe except Norway, Sweden and Holland, and importation of animals from European countries is being prohibited by this Government.

It has been computed that there are 100,000 railway locomotives in the world.

A despatch from Managua, Nicaragua, says: The Eyre-Cragin syndicate's canal concession has been forfeited because of the non-payment of money due. This leaves the Nicaraguan Government free to deal independently with the United States in canal matters.

The number of immigrants arriving in New York for the year ending Sixth Month 30th, 1900, was 341,711. The total immigration throughout the United States has probably been about half a million.

Official reports at St. Petersburg announce that the Siberian Railway is now open for traffic from Tcheliabinsk to Lake Baikal, a distance of 3047 versts, and also from Myssoyaya to Srytensk, a distance of 1034 versts.

RECEIPTS.

Unhappily otherwise specified, two dollars have been received from each person, paying for vol. 74.

Jonathan Dean, O.; W. C. Hall, O.; Hannah H. Ivins, Susan D. Ivins and Lewis Toft, N. J.; Wm. R. Bullock, M. D., Del.; James W. Oliver, Mass.; Wm. W. Hazard, agent, N. Y., for Jesse M. Otis; Edmund S. Smith, agent, O., $39, for Mary Lupton, $1, Joseph P. Binns, J. Hervey Binns, Jonathan Binns, Richard S. Ashton, Walter Edgerton, Wm. Atkinson, Tabitha D. Hall, Mary T. Hall, Deborah Hall, Lewis Hall, Jos. C. Hall, Nathan L. Hall, Gilbert McGrew, Hannah Mary Matson, John W. Smith, Robert Smith, Nathan R. Smith, Elwood D. Whinery and Louis Taber; C. Francis Saunders, Phila.; Eli Sharpless, N. J., to No.

27, vol. 74; Hannah S. DeCout, N. J., per J. Linter Engle; Edwin A. Hoopes, Pa.; J. S. Moore, Kans. Henry H. Ellyson, Ia.; Clarkson Moore, agent, Pa. Henry H. Ellyson, Ia.; Elizabeth K. Hutchinson, Phila. John Hutchinson, N. J., $4, (2 vols.); Geo. A. Keely Del.; Nathan Pearson, Ind.; Thos. C. Cope, O.; Robt P. Gifford for Eley M. Chace, R. I.; Samuel A. Wilts, N. J., and for Arthur H. Thomas, Pa.; Stephe G. Hollingsworth, Kans.; Samuel Bonstedt, Canada. R. J. Dutton, N. J., Jorgen Enge, Ia.; Richard Haine N. J.; Eli Hadley, Ind.; Hannah N. Harry, Pa., per Wm. F. Wickersham; Ellis Smedley, and for Mar S. Ward, Pa.; Mary W. Trimble, Pa.; David L. Cooper, N. J.; Mary J. Foster R. I.; Samuel W. Jones, Pa.; Thos. H. Whitson, Pa., $26, for George Forsyth Albert L. Entrikin, Rebecca G. Passmore, Martha Sa key, Susanna F. Sharpless, Thomas Sharpless, Wm. Sharpless, M. D., Isaac Sharpless, Sidney Tempel Phebe J. Walter, Hannah Webb, Mary E. Webb ar Phebe A. Bating; Jos. J. Cockock, agent, Ia., $4 for Joseph Armstrong, Lewis W. Iye, Peter N. Dyl Benjamin Ellyson, Zadok Ellyson, M. A. Fritchma Wilson C. Hirst, Wm. G. Hall, Edwin T. Heald, Nicolas Larson, Thomas Leech, Logan McGrew, John Michener, Elwood Spencer, Wilson T. Sidwell, W. Thomas, Pearson Thomas, Nathan Satterthwait ar Margaret C. Williams, $4, (2 vols.); Wm. Stantc agent, O., $22, for Asenath Bailey, Ann Eliza V Doudna, Wm. Pickett, Barclay Smith, Samuel Smith, Wm. Bundy, L. P. Bailey, Mary P. Dawson, Plummer, James Steer and D. B. Stanton, Ia.; Benjamin L. Bates, Ia., $5, for himself, Joseph Edgert and Phebe McBride, $1; Geo. B. Allen, Pa.; Edwa Bell, Ireland, 10s.; Reece L. Thomas, Pa.; R. Shoemaker, Pa., $8, for himself, Comly B. Shoemaker Jr., Elizabeth L. Iredell and Jonathan R. Luker Mark H. Buzby, N. J.; Henry B. Leeds, agent, N. $14, for Geo. B. Borton, Hannah R. Maule, Edward Maule, Anne W. Leeds, Amos Ahead, Margaretta Satterthwaite and Morris Linton; Lloyd Balderst and George Balderston, Md.; Comly B. Shoemal and Anna W. Bailey, Pa.; Mary Ann Sharpless r for Lewis P. Sharpless, Pa.; Ann Kirkbride, Phi per Wm. B. Kirkbride; Pluey Gregory, Cal.; H nah Hoyle, O.; Andrew Roberts, Ore.; Henry Satterthwaite, N. J.; A Friend, for J. C. Rogers, C $1 (one-half vol); Susanna T. Clement, N. J.; Ph E. Hall, Agent, O., $10 for Elisha Doudna, M. Hartley, Jesse D. Hall, Hannah A. Webster and Ly P. Webster; Joseph G. Evans, N. J.; Theo. C. He Pa.; George Russell, N. J.; S. Mason McCollin, D., Phila., and for Oliver P. Tatum, Pa.

 Remittances received after Third-day noon will appear in the Receipts until the following week.

NOTICES.

A YOUNG woman Friend wishes to engage for the position of housekeeper. Add. "H." Office of THE FRIEND.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. 16th St., Phila.—The Lib will be closed from Eighth Month 17th until Ninth M 1st, 1900.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—The school year of on Third-day, Ninth Month 4th, 1900. For the admis of pupils early application should be made to

WM. F. WICKERSHAM, Principal, Westtown, E

A CORRECTION.—The copy of "Minutes of New land Yearly Meeting held at Westery," from which made extracts on page 25 of our last number, app not to have been one of the corrected copies. The r of "John Carter," which was appended to an e should be changed to JOHN CAREY.

DIED, at her home, near Spencer's Station, Ohio, M HARTLEY, wife of Henry Hartley, on Third-day mor Third Month 27th, 1900, after an illness of four mo She was the eldest child of John and Deborah Wel and was born Eighth Month 16th, 1835. This dear F was a member of Richland Preparative Meeting, and earnestly devoted to the principles and practice Friends. She was ever cheerful, and, when health mitted, ready to help in sickness and to comfort the and sorrowing. She bore her great affliction with Christian fortitude and was ready when the summons ca depart and be at rest.

WILLIAM H. PILE'S SONS, PRINTERS
No. 422 Walnut Street

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, EIGHTH MONTH 25, 1900.

No. 6.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,

(South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth,) PHILADELPHIA.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

Empty Seats.

An answer which sometimes we used to hear, when one was asked what he found in a basket, bottle, or any place, was that it was "full emptiness." Does not this sometimes seem applicable to the matter of "preaching to a full house," so called?—when in reality, so far as worship is concerned, one "preaches to empty pews or benches,"—empty not of hearers, but of the spirit of worship.

A meeting-house, however, crowded with attendants, when they come together in the one interest of being entertained instead of a deepened intercourse with the Divine life; of hearing good points made about the signs of the times, instead of being edified in the most holy truth; of being emotionally affected with some absorbing tragedy of human wrongs or rights, instead of being convicted for sin or convinced of its remission; of being intellectually informed by brilliantly conceived features skilfully educated from Scripture, instead of being fed in the spirit of Life; of being instructed in truths instead of being baptized in the Truth;—in short, of being gratified with the occasion instead of being satisfied under the felt manifestation of God,—such a meeting-house, being vacant of worshippers, though full of seekers after "what next?" stands full of emptiness to the ministration of the Spirit. Heaping to themselves teachers because "having itching ears," they turn away their ear from the Truth, and we heed unto more or less religious diversions from the witness for Truth in their hearts.

To hear the comments of people who have just come "from church" and asked how they enjoyed the service," one would judge the general standard of worship to be about on the level we have indicated. And such, we are informed both in public and privately by a prominent officer of a Yearly Meeting of large extent, whose work carries him throughout its orders,—such is the increasing trend of the standard of public worship in meetings under the name of Friends. If it were only the worldlings that demand the outward hearing and the superficial engagements as worship, this were to be expected. But the discouraging feature is that the "converted members" are requiring religious entertainment and information in place of the solemn engagement of spiritual worship, and preaching is looked for,—not as a few years since, for evangelical doctrine to be its sufficiency,—but for the preacher's own powers and attractions of discourse;—those abilities which shall draw a congregation's attention to the performer and performance, rather than to living worship. "Don't send us this man, or that woman," say his applicants for a resident minister, "for they are not smart enough for us."

This growing disposition was acknowledged to be both an effect and a cause of employing stated performers of preaching and public exercises in meetings; so that the interest of employers and of constituents being lively that the contract shall be satisfied and the bill of expectation filled, their taste for acceptable public speaking and platform powers is made increasingly fastidious. This and other testimony was to the effect that the growing pastor-fad was making pastor-fed hearers, rather than spiritually nurtured worshippers.

Though the leader of the meetings, or pastor, may thus draw crowds by discourse as to a lecture, and by "song-service" as to a concert; yet if this be the plane of operation he preaches not only to empty seats, but from an empty pulpit,—empty to all intents and purposes of true worship and the true feeding. Thus are such as would wait upon the Lord driven from church to closet for their opportunity to worship;—as when we asked a young man who on a First-day morning was going to a peaceful scene of nature, "Art thou going to meeting to-day?" "No," said he, "I am going to worship!"

The one true object of attending a meeting for Divine worship is to realize a measure and manifestation of the Spirit of God. All ministry is a failure that does not conduce to this, and to this end it must be freshly for the occasion born of the Spirit. That which is born of the flesh, however exquisite the nerves that are charmed in lieu of inspiration, but feeds the flesh; and that which is born of intellect feeds the natural intelligence; but "that which is born of the Spirit is spirit," and feeds its own in human hearts that are open to its filling. Any one who is injecting a talk, or a song, or a reading into a meeting for worship, just because the people "need something to take up their minds" is flinging upon his audience an accusation of being non-worshippers.

While the silence of all flesh is the most favorable condition for the hearing of the Christ who is the speaker to our condition, and while in condescension to human infirmity he uses "the foolishness of preaching" as the less excellent means; yet in silent meetings for worship also it depends on the turning of our heart to the Lord or towards the world, whether He speak to occupied or to empty benches. Hungering and steadfastly seeking for "the bread which cometh down from heaven and giveth life to the world," a meeting will be filled and all needed ministry raised up. So such a meeting where the Spirit speaks through channels of his own direct filling to hearts full of openness though not of world-filled emptiness, becomes for those worshippers a communion-table of the Lord.

CO-OPERATIVE PHYSICIANS.—The eminent historian, William H. Prescott, being son of Chief Justice Prescott, of Massachusetts, enjoyed a family acquaintanceship with Chief Justice Story, of the U. S. Supreme Court. A physician relates to us that having been called into Wm. H. Prescott's house to prescribe for a sick child, on departing he met the historian on his premises, who asked to what extent the child was ailing. "Not seriously," said the doctor. "I think if she is kept quiet and under proper nutriment, she will be about in a few days." "I think you are right," said Prescott. "For Chief Justice Story used to tell us, that when any member of his family was taken sick, his rule was to call in a doctor at the very beginning. And then he did not feel safe in the case without bringing in another physician also, and he found their joint-service was invariably successful, as that of either singly might not be. And the two physicians that he called in, were always Doctor Diet and Doctor Quiet." The physician relating this thinks it was never in print.

CHRISTIANS should live in the world, but not be filled with it. A ship lives in the water; but if the water gets into the ship she goes to the bottom. So Christians may live in the world; but if the world gets into them they sink.—D. L. Moody.

Doukhor Notes.

(Continued from page 35).

Seventh Month 12th.—A very fine morning. We enjoyed our sleep from the time we took our beds, but the nights do not seem very long this time of the year with a full moon.

We left the team we had been using and harnessed a Doukhor team belonging to this village (Sosedefka), about 8 A. M., taking a Doukhor with us to see if we could find village Sovetofka, and we found it rather rough riding through the woods. A proposition was made to pass the village by, which was not approved, as it was passed by last winter when I was out with William B. Harvey, and the villagers said they had long looked for a visit. On arrival proceeded with looking into the houses, and found one boy who had been pretty sick for three weeks; two boys seemed to have lost each an eye, through scurvy. In one house was a woman who had been disabled for sixteen years. She seemed very pious and intelligent. Jonathan was much impressed with her case, and considered it a very instructive one.

I would judge as a whole the village was poorly off, although they had done considerable planting. By the time we had made our round, the people were collected, and it was a pleasing sight; it was a question about the house holding the people, and the children were left out, but I thought how I could have them stand up, in front of their fathers and mothers; so I went out and brought them in, at which the mothers seemed well pleased, and started them off in speaking their pieces, which, I was told, were Psalms. We listened to about twenty of them speaking, one by one, and it is astonishing what memories these little ones have, and their perceptive powers are remarkable. I do not know how many there were in that company who had been in prison for conscience' sake, but it seemed that ability was given to address different states, and intercession to plead for the supporting and preserving power of the Almighty.

The kind-hearted people would have us stay and partake of some Doukhor bread and butter, tea and boiled oats, and had some of their needlework to offer, after which they escorted us to the edge of the village. When we got back to where we lodged, the people would have us at the table again, and the hostess complained of me; so I told her I would write to my wife about it; a plate of Doukhor soup, with bread in it, a tart, and several pieces of pancake, with a very large California prune, ought to suffice, with what I had before that day, but she said a big man like me ought to do more.

As we rode along I saw that which pleased me, about one dozen men in a row cutting grass with scythes, and in the village, house-building was going on. There were some fine fields of grain, also potatoes and cabbage, that looked promising. After a nice parting we started for another village that was missed last winter, the thirty-ninth visited since leaving Yorkton.

Blagneshennie is the name of it. After arriving here we thought of taking a little quiet, before the meeting which was about to gather, but Frederick called us through the window to come and see, and as we went out we met a very interesting sight, twelve women coming in from their work in real oriental peasants' dress, with pretty hats and neat dresses (reminding one of the pictures we have seen of peasants coming in from the harvest), with long-handled rakes, poles and pitchforks, held upright, the women meantime singing.

It was decided to have the meeting after the incomers from the harvest field had had supper, as they were too tired then. A pretty large meeting convened about ten P. M., concluding about quarter past eleven. Some of them expressed themselves as though they were so pleased with our being with them that they would be willing to stay up all night, we however left them with I. M., who had some letters he wanted to read.

13th.—There was considerable lightning last evening after the harvesters came in, but no rain fell until the meeting convened; during its continuance there was not only rain but some hail.

Started about nine A. M., and travelled across an extended prairie, which Jonathan spoke of as being as choice grassland as any he had observed. On arrival at the village, Kirilofka, we took dinner and a little rest before visiting the homes. Most of the people were out at work, but we found one woman who had had part of her foot amputated, and her son had his right hand or arm badly disabled. He had been advised to have it amputated, but he was not prepared for this; we saw one deaf and dumb man and several children who seemed by no means clear of scurvy. The village as a whole did not appear in such a flourishing condition as some others. Our interpreter was very decided in his views that it was in consequence of their not being united in a community, which he thinks is not the right way; eventually I would suppose it would prove the right way, but it must be admitted that at the present time the community plan seems to be attended with more prosperity.

In a visit of a few hours it can hardly be expected that we can become familiar with all the circumstances that account for the difference in the promptness with which the change has been made from one class of dwellings to another. In one village we were told that the builders organized, so that one set did one part, and another set followed, resulting in the village being built up with great regularity.

In the meeting I thought Jonathan was skilful in dividing the word, in a way that could not be gainsaid and with appropriate clearness. Owing to the friction there seemed to be in the place, we had cause for thankfulness to get things settled as well as we did.

We travelled on to the village Moesifka a few miles distant, meeting with a hearty greeting. The man of the house in which we found quarters got in quite a number of the people before it commenced to rain, and we had a good time talking over the benefits of the community system. After the rain ceased we visited the houses, and found one mother with a very afflicted daughter. She has not heard from her husband for eight months; another widow has had an afflicted son for thirteen years. One of the houses was lately burnt down, destroying the personal effects of the household. There are some houses still unfinished, and some people are still living in their dugouts, but the general air is that of cheerfulness. Some of the fields near by bid fair to give them something to live on in the coming year. Our meeting convened about ten o'clock; there was a good representation, and Jonathan put forth Scripture truths to an unusual length.

14th.—The early morning threatened to stop us with rain, but we concluded to start; we did not get very much rain, but plenty of wind and some pelting, for there was too much wind to hold up an umbrella. The scenery of the prairie was very interesting—high grass waving with almost a wild look, and in some places it stood up as high as the body of our wagon, but where the ground was marshy it was not easy piloting for the horses. We passed through a herd of one hundred cattle, and some fine-looking horses with them; the herdsman was the only man we met with on our journey of eighteen miles, which I thought was a long eighteen, and we saw but two houses.

At the village Nova Gorielofka we did not find any disabled; two families that were considered very poor, were assisted. There was some building going on, but as yet the most of them are in the same houses they wintered in the property we are told is mostly held by individuals. The number of horses and cows is exceptionally large, but we heard not all paid for.

The meeting was a solid one, so that Jonathan felt justified in returning thanks for favors received.

We received a warm welcome at Robert Buchanan's, later in the day. His wife says she never was happier than when ministering to the wants of the Doukhobors last winter.

Soon after our arrival a company of fourteen young girls called with some wild strawberries, which they had been out gathering for nearly three days. They looked very tired, but they seemed very thankful and refreshed, after a purchase had been made. The digging of senega root is pretty arduous, either in the hot sun or in the midst of mosquitoes; and the tramping of men to Winnipeg to seek work, at the cost of much muscular strength. The company started out lately from one of the villages without a cent of money, their wives following them, showing their affection by carrying their bundles as far as the edge of the village, saying they would have a long way to carry them.

15th.—We had an unusual scene presented to us for a First-day morning. R. Buchanan's horses and cattle, with the exception of the stray ones, came up near the house; they were an imposing sight, and it seemed a revelation to Jonathan to see such a lot of fine stock showing what the country could produce, and to be told by Robert that he had taken one hundred and sixty-one pounds of wool from some of his sheep. One of the horses, weighing sixteen hundred and sixty pounds, took the premium at the agricultural show.

We went back to the village as appointed and found a large company gathered, and a pretty scene it was—men, women and children in their First-day dresses, the weather was that we could have the meeting out-of-door, and I believe we had nearly all the village present. When Jonathan and I had finished about all we had to communicate, several women stood in front, whose husbands were in exile and with tears in their eyes asked us what we could tell, more than they knew, as to what their Friends were doing to get their husbands released from exile. We would have been glad be able to have told them more, but there is much that they will have to endure, which we cannot as yet relieve. Finished visiting the houses, and having Elizabeth Buchanan with us, it was an advantage for her to see the sick whom we wanted relieved.

Before returning to Yorkton we visited Alfred Hutchinson. He and his wife are interested in the Doukhobors. Alfred was educated in the Ackworth School, and is connected with the Hutchinsons in England, and a nephew of the late Charles Hutchinson of Iowa. The ride along the lake was refreshing; the evening before, the mercury recorded thirty-seven.

A. Hutchinson said that one day this summer it was one hundred and six degrees Fahrenheit, which with one or two exceptions was the warmest he ever knew in Canada. A. H. seems to be a thrifty farmer, and has some fine cattle, with a magnificent garden. After supper the Scriptures were read, with dignity, and way was opened for some religious exercise on the part of the visitors.

Left A. Hutchinson's about quarter past eight, and reached Yorkton with about three hours' riding, and to be candid I felt quite disposed to nap on the way. Having had forty-even meetings, visited five or six hundred houses, and from three to four hundred miles' riding, in twenty-two days, might seem to account for a little reaction.

I have been to the office of agent James S. Brerar. He was not in, but one of his clerks handed me some letters, which brought word from home up to the 6th instant. Have also been in two of the leading stores in Yorkton. The merchants gave good accounts of the Doukhobors, in regard to their honesty and reliability—where goods have been bought on credit they have generally been paid for before we.

18th.—We are on the train leaving Yorkton, expecting to get off at Fox Warren (where subsequently two appointed meetings were held to good satisfaction).

21st.—Took breakfast with Eliza H. Varney and her cousin, Nellie Baker, at Winnipeg, went with them to the railroad station, and saw them start off towards Yorkton, with the intention of going to E. Buchanan's. Wm. F. McCreary has manifested a very kindly spirit towards her. He gave instructions for them to be provided with a large tent, that could be used for a school-room. They contemplated having a school started, either in the Good Spirit Lake district or at Terpenie, and go on teaching until they thought they had done their part, and then visit through the villages; and Eliza as she went along would see after the sick, etc. Wm. F. McCreary was at the Leland hotel after tea last evening, and I have had two interviews with him in his office to-day, to good satisfaction. Arrangements have been made for the purchase of chickens and sheep. In discussing the welfare of the Doukhobors, I look from what was said that the commissioner will not have them imposed on more than is unpreventable, and will not allow the lands granted to the villagers along Good Spirit Lake district to be taken from them, were having been some contention with the ranchers. Several, that have done violence to the Doukhobors, have been arrested and fined. I however took another plan of dealing with a man who did violence to some Galicians who complained to him; after hearing them out, he told them if that man came amongst them again to duck him in the river, with his head down, five times; this the Galicians carried out, and having the commissioner on their side, they have not been molested since. I suppose he knew what he was about, having been a lawyer and served as the mayor of Winnipeg.

Jonathan and I went to the hospital and saw several Doukhobors there. One man spoke to me in English, and told me I had been at his house. His case is rather hopeless. The man Simeon who was hurt on the railroad, and objected to having his leg amputated, has had his knee joint taken out, and the ends of the bones have actually knit together, and he moves about, with a stiff limb; his wife has been very faithful in doing what she could to earn money for the support of herself and children. We were shown pretty much over the main building, but did not take time to go into the annex.

Having heard R. Buchanan say that Doukhobor spinning would compete with any in the world, and as he had brought some to the exhibition, we went to the exhibit room to see it, and they certainly had some very handsome work on show. E. Buchanan had two quilts that were considered very fine, and I should not be surprised if some of them got a premium.

(To be continued.)

Don't Hurry Too Fast.

The sudden death of former Surgeon-General Hammond, brings to mind with force the importance of elderly, and especially portly, persons, who have suspected heart disarrangements, of making haste slowly, writes a physician in the Pittsburg Christian Advocate.

The eminent specialist succumbed after a hurried run upstairs. Herbert Spencer, though warned by his physicians that death would follow any undue exercise, persisted in an effort to vault a stile, which he finally did, only to expire from heart disease a few hours later. He might have lived many years.

I cannot understand why men and women of all ages and degrees of health will race after street cars as though their lives depended upon catching a particular car, when it is common knowledge that the cars are run on a leeway of from one to three minutes. It is the same impelling reason, I presume, that will compel a man who is being carried past his station, to leap from the moving electric or steam car to certain injury or death.

In running the body is entirely thrown from the ground for an instant with each step, and it is the most violent of exercise. The heart and lungs are suddenly called upon to respond to the unusual and violent strain, and hemorrhage from the latter and rupture of the valves of the former often follow. The heart is a tough muscle, but it has its limits. The body, after all, is like a cable—as strong as its weakest point.

This is well exemplified in autopsies upon the bodies of athletes. In many cases of perfect muscular development the lungs, heart or kidneys have been found so diseased that had not death resulted from other causes, this diseased condition would soon have produced it.

In portly persons, in addition to the pressure of tight clothes, especially stays, fat fills up the thorax, crowds the lungs and heart, and interferes with their natural functions. Undue exertion causes "shortness of breath" or a "queer feeling" in the region of the heart. This is nature's warning, when she condescends to give any at all, to go slow.—Ex.

Forming A Character.

Chip, chip, chip! It is a steady sound, and greets our ears betimes, and we ask wonderingly who it is that has so early commenced his task. "Oh, that is old Simon, the stonemason, working on a monument. He is a laborious worker, and has much taste, so that he is often employed on rich carvings and figures."

"Then, that is Simon's task, is it? picking a man out of granite, fashioning him with sharp, steady blows into shape; knocking the rough corners off, so that the perfect image stands out clear and beautiful, growing steadily more perfect beneath the sculptor's hands."

Old Simon looked inquiringly at us as we hovered near the shed where he was at work.

"Forming character out of a bit of granite! That shining chisel and heavy mallet are making an image fit for a niche somewhere," said one.

Simon smiled; we had thought his features plain until then, but now they were lit with inexpressible beauty.

"Lady," he said, "I reckon that is what most of us are doing as we go along in life—forming a character which shall fit us for a niche somewhere!"

Old Simon's words made an impression not soon forgotten.

Our deeds are not like summer clouds, that flit before the eyes and vanish. Neither are they like the seed that springs from the soil, blooms, perishes and is forgotten. On the contrary, they become part and parcel of ourselves; and all eternity shall not be able to erase the work of our yesterdays and to-days.

It may be that the hours may glide by, silent and peaceful enough, uneventful we may call them; but nevertheless, character is forming for all time. Some day the task shall cease. God only knows when, and it rests with us to see that the work with which the Master has entrusted us is returned to his hands perfected for his use; and meet for his kingdom.

Old Simon's image is of marble only, and durable though it may be, some day it shall crumble to dust. It is not so with the immortal soul of man; God has in store for it an eternity of existence.

The little acts of to-day, the thoughts of the mind, the conscientious performance of humble duty, may seem trivial upon first thought; but upon such small things as these is character formed.

The smallest and weakest child has that within him which he is molding day by day into something durable; something which shall not only influence his own after life, but the other lives which touch his in the span of existence. Let us, like Simon, the stonemason, labor to perfect our work.—Sara V. Dubois, in Young People's Paper.

A YOUNG preacher, when about to be ordained to the work of the Gospel, stated publicly that at one period of his life he was almost an infidel. "But," said he, "there was one argument in favor of Christianity I could never refute—the consistent conduct of my father."

Quakerism and the Individual.

BY H. W. CADBURY.

In the course of the history of thought there lies marked out two ages: The age of faith, which too often means only credulity; and the age of doubt or skepticism. And now we are told that the age of doubt is over, and that a new era has begun. It is too soon to characterize that era, but we can see a little of what it promises to be, something deeper than the first age, and happier than the second. And we know that in biology, in embryology, the history of the individual tends to repeat the history of the race. So, too, in the mental growth of the individual there seems to be a retracing of the history of the thought of the race—from faith to doubt, from doubt to something else. I suppose that nearly every one in the course of his mental life, passes through some such experience as this. It is for us, then, of the present generation to help determine what the character of this future thought shall be. This must be our responsibility, and it is for this that we must prepare ourselves.

I need no more than suggest what some of the problems are with which we have to deal, for we are all familiar with them—the nature of the future life, the origin or significance of evil, the responsibility of the individual under hereditary influences, and many others. But where shall we look for their answer? To the doctrines of theology, to the mythology of the heathen, to the religions of the East, to the writings of the ancients, to the books of the Bible? Much as these have given us, they have not answered all. The question at once forces itself upon us—are these the only sources of the revelation of God? It is just such an inquiry as this, an inquiry that is forcing itself upon our minds with an insistence not to be turned aside, that the essential doctrine of Quakerism, the doctrine of the Light of the Spirit, meets with a prophetic answer, an answer given before the question was asked, before its own full significance was felt.

To such an inquiry Quakerism has a unique reply: There is a Light which lighteth every man coming into the world. Combine this with the words of Jesus the Christ: "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now," and we have the suggestion of a great possibility. For the doctrine of the Light of the Spirit teaches that God still speaks and reveals himself to men, and these words of Christ are the promise that he will so continue to reveal Himself. "I have many things to say unto you." All the revelation was not given in the past; to every man some measure of the Light was to be given, that he might learn still more of God and of God's dealings. "I have many things to say unto you." This is the promise of a blessing; the Light is the means for accomplishing that blessing. There are deep and earnest seekers after Truth; there are men and women of strenuous life and constructive thought; there are those who battle against the evil in the world, haunted by the questions why and whence. To such is there no answer to be given? "I have many things to say unto you."

At this point we begin to see the great significance of the individual under Quakerism, yet the individual must feel the burden hereby laid upon him. The thought seems presumptuous, the responsibility stupendous. Nevertheless, weak, puny, miserable nothingness as we often feel ourselves to be, I believe that we belittle God's creation, that we fail of the promise, if we allow such thoughts to be an excuse for shirking the responsibility, for yielding to the tendency to intellectual and spiritual sloth. Even if we be so weak, "why should any be so foolish as to deny (I quote from Barclay), or so unwise as not to seek after this Spirit, which Christ has promised shall dwell in his children? They that do suppose the indwelling and leading of the Spirit to be ceased, must also suppose Christianity to be ceased, which cannot subsist without it." As firmly as I believe in an immediate revelation, so firmly do I believe in a progressive revelation.

If such were the purpose of God, if this be the meaning of the promise, then what follows? Having considered this chief teaching of Quakerism, we come now to the application of that teaching; and here we are brought to the individual who, through the ideal presented by Quakerism, has assumed an importance unknown before. I shall try to show, first, what this ideal demands of the individual, and then what the individual is, as defined by recent philosophy, in order to see how the ideal of Quakerism is restated in terms of philosophy, and how one adds fresh significance to the other.

In the first place, then, what is it that the Quaker ideal demands of us as individuals? If to each one of us may be granted a portion that will add to the increase of knowledge of the great whole of Truth, we must surely prepare to receive it. This can be done best by the cultivating of what, for want of a better term, I shall call an open-minded attitude.

By open-mindedness I mean something that is very nearly expressed by one of our modern writers, when he thus wrote of the dawn of new ideas upon the mind: "God screens us ever more from premature ideas. Our eyes are holden that we cannot see things that stare us in the face, until the mind is ripened; then we behold them, and the time when we saw them not, is like a dream." Open-mindedness is not a fear of the knowledge of good and evil, it is rather an alertness to any or all argument for or against, to all that has been said or known, affirmed or doubted, and is the state of mind that comes with as broad a knowledge of the question as is possible to one's own particular intellect. It is rather the ripening of the mind, the bringing together all the constituents of the soil that will nourish the sprouting seed when it may fall upon it. It is the alertness of the faculties to seize, to comprehend, to classify whatever may come before them, that brings a depth of sympathy and a breadth of experience that nothing else can. To an open-minded man things and events may assume an interest and significance that he never before saw in them; even common things may acquire a power to contribute toward the solution of some problem in his mind; a stray thought or word will open a new field of thought. For it has been truly said that we see not so much what is in front of our eyes as what is behind them. In the various fields of knowledge where research is being carried on, those men succeed best who already have in their minds theories, toward the establishment of one or the other of which they are collecting the facts; while if a man gathers fact after fact, with no selective guiding principle, he is too apt to fail of a good result. We all have experience like this in our own lives. How much we see that we never saw before, if we study geology or botany or zoology. As of external, so of inward things. A little knowledge of psychology will open our eyes to see even in dreams, things that we never saw before. Yet all the time these things were staring us in the face, but our eyes were holden that we could not see them until the mind was ripened, and we had behind our eyes that which interpreted what was in front of them.

(To be concluded.)

The Rights of Children.

Children have a right to the companionship of their parents. The obligations of father to their children are the highest obligation. They cannot be set aside for others which are not so important. If parents have no time to spend at home with their children, something is wrong. The first duty of every father is to his home. The father who spends much time with his children, delights in their society at their sports, can bind them to him with a chain of gold and ever after influence them in almost any direction he may choose.

Children have a right to a noble manly or womanly example and character in their parents. They learn early to look upon God as a Father. If they see in their earthly father nothing but selfishness, unkindness, injustice and hardness, they will turn away, not from him only, but from their Heavenly Father also. If parents knew how much their example as a spirit have to do with the religious life and faith of their children, would they not watch and pray daily that they might walk in wisdom toward their own?

As a rule, children are not restrained unduly by their parents in this day. The danger lies in the opposite direction. Abdication of authority on the part of the parents and over-indulgence of the children are the curse of many a home. This is an age of training. Young people are being trained for almost everything. No one can hope to command the respect of the people whom he serves, or achieve success in his calling, without thorough training for his special work. There is one department of life, and that the most important of all, for which there is no training school. Who has ever been trained for the holy office of parent? Men and women are trained for teachers, physicians, lawyers, ministers, soldiers, engineers, pilots, and almost every calling in a sphere, but no one is trained for fatherhood or motherhood. Is it not time that fathers and mothers should make their holy calling a special study?

What the Church needs, what the country needs, are fathers and mothers who know the obligations of their position, recognize the rights as well as the duties of their children, and hold themselves ready to defend and maintain the rights at any cost.—Christian Advocate.

"It is one of the attributes of the greatest of the Christian graces that it envies not. The envious soul can never be a happy soul."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Secret Orders' Capabilities of Mischief.

The present alarming outbreak in China, the effects of which seem likely to be felt all over the world, has been precipitated by a determinate demonstration of an extensive secret society, the Boxers. They are pledged, "sworn," to an undying antagonism to foreigners and foreign influences, and are now evidencing their loyalty to this claimed patriotic principle by the process of extermination. Displayed thus before foreign eyes, the method appears hateful enough, and has even moved the German Emperor to advise his soldiery who may be sent to the scene of conflict, to give "no quarter" to their antagonists. Possibly the capabilities or the infliction of woe thus glaringly manifested, may serve to open the eyes of peoples claiming to be Christian, to the danger of promoting and cherishing secret orders among themselves.

In a recent address on "Secret Societies in Politics," published in the Christian Cynosure, Charles A. Blanchard, president of Wheaton College, Illinois, stated that the detectives' chief, Allan Pinkerton, had told his father that he first man whom he arrested, after a long chase, had appealed to him as a Mason to let him go. The former sheriff of Blanchard's own county had told him within a year or two that he "had been cursed in open court by a Masonic criminal because he had refused to recognize his appeals for help." He narrated this further incident: "I was, not long since, talking with a gentleman in the Treasury building who was at the time head of the secret service of the United States. He told me that he was a Mason. I said, 'Why do you say was; why not am?' He replied, 'Because I became tired of having men shake Masonic jewels in my face and demand release from arrest in the name of Masonry, and I told my lodge that so long as I was in this office they would have to excuse me from my oath.'" It is an undoubted fact (to adduce a single instance among a multitude of similar sort), that at Hartford, Connecticut, in the year 1895, a Dr. Jackson was expelled from a Masonic lodge for the offence of violating his Masonic oath by testifying against a brother lodgeman who had been arrested for arson, tried, found guilty, and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment therefor.

A visiting member of the recent General Conference of the Methodist denomination, one who had been forty years a minister, being greatly concerned at the prevalence among his brethren of secretism and especially Free-masonry (from which he had come out), took occasion to inquire of the bishops there present as to their connection with or freedom from entanglement in the order. Of the fifteen to whom he spoke, seven replied that they were free, four that they had belonged to the order, but did not attend, and the remaining four are regular members. I recall the sad feeling with which I had several years ago, how one of these active Masonic bishops "officiated" at the funeral, at a Western city, of a millionaire brewer who did not wish the services over his remains to occur in the church building, but in his house, and with the Masonic ritual.

Seeing, therefore, how the church is honey-combed by these oath-bound orders, how their influence may and does to a degree affect the procedure of the criminal courts, and how secret, underhand, wire-pulling ways have corrupted our politics, we need to realize that the peril from this source to society and the State ought by no means to be slighted.

The telegraphic intelligence just received, of the assassination of the king of Italy at the hands of an anarchist—one who had been specially designated by the secret order to take the life of this sovereign—additionally points the lesson intended to be conveyed in this article. The kingdom of Italy is said to be the most onerously taxed of any European State, the excessive taxation being made necessary by the strain to maintain its place as one of the "great Powers." In this oppression the anarchist and nihilist find their reason for being the oath-bound enemies of every occupant of a throne.

JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

Finished and Folded Up.

"There, that is finished and folded up, and I am heartily glad!" said Bertha, as she took off her little thimble and laid on the table a pretty blue muslin dress on which she had been busy for several days.

"Is it well done, too?" asked practical Aunt Mabel.

"Pretty well done for me, auntie; mother says that I improve in dressmaking."

"That is encouraging. Now, Bertha, do you know that something else of yours also is finished and folded up this evening?"

"What else can it be, Aunt Mabel? This is the only piece of work that I have had to do this week, unless it is that tidy. I do not expect to see the end of that for six weeks."

"Still, you have finished and folded up something more important than your tidy, or your dress even—something which will not be unfolded again for ages, perhaps; and yet you will see it again, with every line and fold. Your day's history is done and gone from your keeping. You may remodel the dress, if it does not please you; but you cannot change one jot or tittle of the day's record."

Aunt Mabel had the fashion of dropping these seed-thoughts, which often grew up vigorous plants in young hearts.

"What has the record been?" asked Bertha of her own heart, as she thoughtfully laid away the blue muslin. As, little by little, she tried to go over the hours, there was much that she would gladly have changed if she could.

"I wish that I had spoken pleasantly to Ned when he wanted me to help him with his flag. It would only have taken me a minute or two; and he was first sad and then vexed with my crossness. It is too bad! I left mother to do all the baking alone, and did not even prepare the cherries for her in my haste to finish my dress." The sight of a little Bible, whose clasp had been closed all day, suggested still more reproachful thoughts.

"No wonder I have had such a poor day's record, when I began it in too much haste for prayer, or reading a verse even!"

The day's work did not look so satisfactory from this standpoint, and she sighed as she felt that it was "folded up."—Zion's Watchman.

"BEGIN by denying yourself and by-and-by you forget yourself. The kindness which was at first just a duty becomes a pleasure and a joy."

STILLNESS.

Selected.

Be silent to God; let Him mould thee.—Luther.

Thy lesson art thou learning,
O tried and weary soul?
His ways art thou discerning
Who works to make thee whole?
In the haven of submission
Art thou satisfied and still?
Art thou clinging to the Father,
'Neath the shadow of his will?
Now while his arms enfold thee,
Think well, He loveth best,
Be still and He shall mould thee,
For his heritage of rest.

The vessel must be shapen
For the joys of Paradise
The soul must have her training
For the service of the skies;
And if the great Refiner
In furnaces of pain
Would do his work more truly,
Count all his dealings gain.
For He himself hath told thee
Of tribulation here:
Be still and let Him mould thee
For the changeless there.

From vintages of sorrow
Are deepest joys distilled,
And the cup outstretched for healing
Is oft at Marah filled.
God leads to joy through weeping,
To quietness through strife,
Through yielding into conquest,
Through death to endless life.
Be still, He hath enrolled thee
For the kingdom and the crown;
Be silent, let Him mould thee
Who calleth thee his own.

Such silence is communion,
Such stillness is a shrine;
The fellowship of suffering,
An ordinance divine.
And the secrets of abiding
Most fully are declared
To those who with the Master
Gethsemane have shared,
Then trust Him to uphold thee,
'Mid the shadows and the gloom;
Be still and He shall mould thee
For his presence and for home.

For resurrection stillness
There is resurrection power;
And the prayer and praise of trusting
May glorify each hour;
And common days are holy,
And years an eastertide
For those who with the risen One
In risen life abide.
Then let his true love fold thee,
Keep silence at his word;
Be still and He shall mould thee;
O rest thee in the Lord.

FEW persons can get rid of the thought, when reading the Bible, that it speaks by authority. There is something about it that says, "This is of God, not of man." The inspiring Spirit has so informed it that it has a power to hold the conscience, quicken the feeling and direct the life that no other book possesses. This makes it unique and gives it a perpetuating and dominating property. Thus endowed, it will go on as a light and an authority when its critics are dead and gone.—Presbyterian.

THE earth is more than God's handiwork, it is the mirror of his qualities—for those who have eyes to see."

Ways of Pleasantness.

All are seeking ways of pleasantness. When young men and maidens turn away from prayer and the Bible to a life of indulgence in evil things they are seeking ways of pleasantness. When men turn away from religion to the way which they hope will lead to wealth or power or social elevation they are seeking ways of pleasantness. But they are deceived, and shall be disappointed. Real ways of pleasantness are found only in the service of the Lord. The way of righteousness, the way of holiness, the way of prayer, the way of obedience to God—these are ways of pleasantness. All others lead to misery. They may appear to be easy and inviting, but the way of the transgressor is hard, however it may seem.

The ways of the Lord are ways of pleasantness because they are flooded with light. Traveling by night is never a pleasant task. To travel in darkness through a region infested with peril fills the mind with horror. When the day dawns and the sun rises the traveler breathes easier and feels more comfortable. All the ways of the Lord are in the light of day. "The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

They are pleasant ways because the company is good. Setting out upon a long journey, one is always glad to know that his traveling companions are to be intelligent and agreeable. It relieves the weariness of the journey to be associated with choice spirits on the way. The road may be rough and long, but it seems smooth and short when cheered by genial companions and happy conversation. Who are the Christian's traveling companions? They are the best men and women in the world. God himself has promised to be with us. The prophets walked with God, and so may we.

The ways of the Lord are right. A wise man will not choose the easiest way, but the right way. Many do choose the easy way. They are anxious to escape hardship and trouble, and think of little else. Many turn from the way of the Lord because it is a way of self-denial and burdens. They despise the crosses and afflictions and losses which accompany righteousness. They do not consider it a pleasant but a disagreeable and hard way. But he has not learned the highest lesson of life who does not know how to take pleasure in losses, in infirmities, and afflictions, and to glory in tribulations also. Some choose the way which promises to conduct them to the highest honors. They care for little else. A great American statesman once said, "I had rather be right than be President." Not every statesman is able to say that truthfully. But one who cannot honestly say it does not know the pleasure of righteousness. With all its crosses, hardships, and afflictions, the right way is a way of infinite pleasantness to a right mind.

The way of the Lord is pleasant because it tends upward. The joy of rising is a rich experience. Physical elevation is intensely exhilarating. The journey to the summit of a lofty mountain may be attended with toil and weariness, and even peril, but the reward is ample. As one leaves the low valley and ascends toward the clouds new and grand views burst upon his vision. The field of his vision is enlarged. Hills and valleys, villages and farms, forests and fields, lakes and rivers, are spread out like a map at his feet. Mountain peaks which could not be seen from the narrow valley break upon his view. As he rises higher the air is purer, the sky is brighter, the world is more beautiful, and his mind expands with the expanding range of his vision.

One may rise in different ways. There is a social elevation which some covet. Intellectual elevation is inspiring to many. Others will give all they have for temporary elevation to a prominent official position. Multitudes are seeking to rise in the world. But best of all is the experience of rising in the knowledge and favor of God. The first step in religion is a long step into a higher life. Every succeeding step carries the soul nearer to God, nearer to the summit of the mountain of the Lord. The way of the Lord never tends downward, but ever upward. Higher in knowledge, higher in aspiration, higher in purpose, higher in thought, and higher in love rises the soul that follows Christ. As he rises the range of his vision is enlarged. New beauty and grandeur of the kingdom of God burst upon his view. The atmosphere is purer, the sky is brighter, the clouds are under his feet.

The way is pleasant because it ends well. The end of the way is the chief consideration. What does it signify to walk in a path carpeted with velvet, bordered with roses, and cheered with music and gay companions if those who travel therein are on the way to a dismal dungeon or the scaffold? If, however, one is going to a throne and a crown, it matters not how rough and steep the way. It is this that commends the ways of the Lord. They end well. We have seen the Christian approaching the end of the way. His experience is delightful. He has no fear of death. He dreads not the future. He is going home. One thing he knows—he has a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. He does not sigh, and this is the burden of his song:

"Jesus, my all, to heaven is gone,
He whom I fix my hopes upon;
His track I see, and I'll pursue
The narrow way, till Him I view.

"The way the holy prophets went,
The road that leads from banishment,
The King's highway of holiness,
I'll go, for all His paths are peace."

—Christian Advocate.

VEGETABLE IVORY.—The ivory plant, we are told, is found in South America. It produces the nuts known as marfil vegetal, or vegetable ivory. It belongs to the palm family, and has a graceful crown of leaves and beautiful, fragrant flowers.

The fruit grows in large clusters.

Each fruit has six or seven compartments, and each compartment contains from six to nine seeds. In commercial parlance the seeds are known as "vegetable ivory," and out of them are fashioned knobs, reels, toys and many other things, both useful and ornamental.

Many of the ivory buttons and fancy boxes in daily use, which are supposed to be made from the tusks of the elephant, are the produce of the ivory plant.

At first the seeds contain a clear, insipid liquid; after a time this fluid becomes sweet and of a milky appearance and then changes by degrees until it becomes as hard as ivory.

It is a singular fact that this hard, ivorylike mass returns to its former soft state in the process of germination, and the young plant is for some time dependent upon it for sustenance. If the seed be taken out of the ground after the plant has appeared, in it may be found a substance, half pulp and half milk, on which the plant lives until it is old enough to obtain nourishment for itself.—Sabbath School Visitor.

A Clever Rogue.

The fox is undoubtedly the cleverest of our smaller animals, and it has been suggested that his capacity has been developed, in England at any rate, by the hard life which hunters and dogs compel him to live, says a writer in the Church Record of Toronto. He is a solitary animal, who has probably never been known really to make friends with man. In reality he is a beast of prey; his sight is best at night; he feeds upon rabbits, poultry, game birds, rats, mice, etc., but will not touch birds of prey. The story of the fox feeding upon grapes, associated with the well-known fable, is seriously doubted by some observers.

The cunning of the fox is almost incredible. He will deliberately criss-cross his own trail so as to confuse dogs trying to follow him. It is claimed that unless he is extremely young and inexperienced, he never troubles the poultry on the farm near his own lair, but preys upon those at a distance, and thus saves himself from suspicion in his immediate neighborhood. When he cannot get food that he likes better he will turn to toads, frogs, and even crabs, and a comical story is told of a fox who fishes. He crept down to a pool in which crabs were crawling about, and, notwithstanding his aversion to water, dipped his long tail into it. The crabs laid their claws upon the tail, to be promptly jerked to land by the fox. The following stories, further illustrating the fox's cunning, are told by Wm. J. Long in a charming little book on "Ways of Wood Folk:"

When a fox finds a flock of ducks feeding near shore, he trots down and begins to play on the beach in plain sight, watching the birds the while out of the "tail e' his ee," as a Scot man would say. Ducks are full of curiosity especially about unusual colors and objects too small to frighten them; so the playing animal speedily excites a lively interest. They stop feeding, gather close together, spread, circle, come together again, stretching their necks straight as strings to look and listen.

Then the fox really begins his performance. He jumps high to snap at imaginary flies; chases his bushy tail; he rolls over and over clouds of flying sand; he gallops up the shore and back like a whirlwind; he plays peek-a-bow with every bush. The foolish birds grow excited; they swim in smaller circles, quack nervously, drawing nearer and nearer to get a look at the strange performance. They are long in coming, but curiosity always gets the better of them; those in the rear crowd to the front rank forward. All the while the show goes on, the performer paying not the slightest attention, apparently, to his excited audience, only he draws slowly back from the water's edge, as if to give them room as they crowd nearer.

They are on the shore at last; then, when they are lost in the most astonishing caper of all, the fox dashes among them, throwing them into the wildest confusion. His first snap never fails to throw a duck back on the sand with broken neck; and he has generally time for a second, often for a third, before the flock escapes into deep water. Then he buries all his birds but one, throws that across his shoulders, and trots off, wagging his head, to some quiet spot where he can eat his dinner and take a good nap undisturbed.

When, with all his cunning, Reynard is caught napping, he makes use of another good trick he knows. One winter morning, some years ago, my friend, the old fox-hunter, rose at daylight for a run with the dogs over the snow-fallen snow. Just before calling his hounds, he went to his hen-house, some distance away, and threw the chickens some corn for the day. When he reached the roost, his steps making no sound in the snow, he noticed the trail of a fox crossing the yard and entering the coop through a low opening sometimes used by the chickens. The trail came out, and it flashed upon him that the fox must be inside at the present moment. Hardly had he reached this conclusion when a wild cackle arose which left no doubt about it.

On the instant he whirled an empty box against the opening, at the same time pounding lustily to frighten the thief from killing the chickens. Reynard was trapped sure enough. The fox-hunter listened at the door, and save for an occasional surprised "cut-a-a-a," not a sound was heard within. Very cautiously he opened the door and squeezed through. There lay a fine pullet, stone dead; and beyond lay the fox, dead, too.

"Well, of all things," said the fox-hunter, grinning, "if he hasn't gone and climbed the roost after that pullet, and then tumbled down and broken his own neck!"

Highly elated with this unusual beginning of his hunt, he picked up the fox and the pullet and laid them down on the box outside, while he fed his chickens.

When he came out, a minute or two later, he found the box and a feather or two, but no fox and no pullet. Deep tracks led out of the yard and up over the hill in flying jumps. Then he gazed upon our hunter that Reynard had been the possum game upon him, getting away with a whole skin and a good dinner.

School Life and Citizenship.

I have a firm belief that the life of Thomas F. Buxton, extracts from the Journal of George Fox, and episodes from the history of our Society, had an influence, not insignificant, in the formation of character on many Friends who heard them at Ackworth in the early days. I am convinced that it does an incalculable good to boys and girls to see bright portrayals of the lives of fine Christian characters. Nor, in the choice of our biographical readings, need we fear pitching it too high, so long as the noble lessons presented are sufficiently anchored in incident to hold the attention of the listener. I think, however, that there is good work ready for the leisure of our members, when that article becomes more prominent, in the preparation of biographical and historical works adapted to the edification of our young people from the educationist's point of view.

It is interesting in connection with the subject before us to reflect that the Society of Friends has always been wishful to secure a training apt to benevolent service. In its desire to obtain all that is useful, it has been willing to dispense with much that is ornamental. . . . It has been said that culture without principle is a wrecker's light." We can see the truth in this every day. It must be our ambition to provide the benevolent search-light which shows the rocks and shoals. Man's force, as such, must usually be exercised intellectually, and the keener the intellect, the more potent and far-reaching the force, but the beneficence of the force will be in proportion to the extent by which it is accompanied by the inspiration of largeness of heart.

I like those words of Paul to Titus in which he speaks of the kindness and love of God our Saviour! I do not want to separate them, I do not want to confuse them, for they are children of the same Father with a wondrous family likeness. But for all their similarity, kindness, as a working factor, has advantages I think in the case of a boy, over the less developed faculty of his love.—Henry Thompson, in British Friend, Sixth Month.

Three Things to Observe.

"Watch the brakes, hold a firm hand, start slow," are among the instructions to motormen on a line of city railway. This instruction to the motorman is not without its metaphorical significance for every young man. Here is a sermon in a sentence, and here are the divisions.

1. Watch the Brakes. Be sure that you not only have the power to go, but the power to stop going. Every well-regulated life has a brake as well as a driving-wheel. The driver who cannot stop his car at the desired crossing is as helpless as the one who cannot start it. A friend once told us that one of the most distressing moments of his life was when he got started down a very long, steep hill, where there was no tree or brush to break his descent, and down which he was obliged to rush, with ever increasing speed, until he reached the foot. Yet he only faintly typifies many a young man on the moral down-grade, who has lost control of the brakes.

2. Hold a Firm Hand. Hold a firm hand on passion, on pride, on love of acquisition, on extravagance, on ambition. They are all good servants, if you keep them where they belong, harnessed in subjection to a high moral purpose and Christian devotion. They are terrible masters, if they take the bit in their mouth, and get beyond control.

3. Start Slow. To start the car with a jerk will most likely shake up the passengers, and very likely will jolt the car off the track. There is time enough to reach the end of the route, and keep up with the schedule. There is no reason why you should start life in a brownstone house with six servants. Your father did not start in this way. If he had, he would not be living in one now. There is no reason why you should be worth $100,000 at the end of the first year in business. As many a presidential candidate knows, to his sorrow, the early "boom" often kills the best chance. The one who starts slow often wins the prize.—Zion's Watchman.

To have religion upon authority and not upon conviction, is like a finger-watch to be set forwards and backwards as he pleases that has it in keeping.—Wm. Penn, Fruits of Solitude.

THE mother whose patience is often tried should bear in mind that she is largely responsible for her child's inherited character and have patience with faults and failings.

Items Concerning the Society.

The North Carolina Friend publishes the names of fifty-one as ministers of that Yearly Meeting,—thirty-seven men and fourteen women.

Robert Hatton, who had obtained from Gwynedd Monthly Meeting, about a year ago, a minute of approval for a religious visit to New England, especially to Friends of the "smaller" orthodox body, laid the concern before the Quarterly Meeting [Abington, held at Gwynedd on the 9th inst.], and received its approval.—Intelligencer.

Notes from Others.

Those who have suffered much are like those who know many languages; they have learned to understand and be understood by all.—Madame Swetchine.

J. H. Gardiner says: "If one were to figure the whole range of English prose style in the form of an arch, one would put the style of the Bible as its keystone."

James Sheerin says in the Churchman that "one serious trouble with our postulants for the ministry now is that they are too often made unfit for meeting and knowing men by the sheltered and monastic-like nature of their early training in schools where they associate with but one class of men."

Herman von Hilprecht has written the University of Pennsylvania that he has discovered the great temple library and priest's school of Nippur, which was destroyed by the Elamites 228 B. C. He says the library consists of sixteen thousand volumes written on stones, and covers the entire theological, astronomical, linguistic and mathematical knowledge of those days. At the same place there has been unearthed a collection of letters and official documents, making, with the temple library, twenty-three thousand books in stone.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—Minister Conger has telegraphed to Washington from Peking: "We have been imprisoned and completely besieged since June 23. Continued artillery and rifle firing until July 17; only rifle since, but daily; with it frequent but desperate attacks."

With the entrance of the allied army into Peking, diplomatic intercourse with Minister Conger has been resumed. But the request of Li Hung Chang that Minister Conger should be designated as Commissioner to bring about a cessation of hostilities in China has been declined by the President. One ground of the refusal is stated to be that the United States will take no steps toward negotiations until an opportunity has been afforded Minister Conger to report to his Government in detail the affront that has been put upon this Government in the person of its Minister at Peking.

A patent has been granted to Nikola Tesla for an invention which, if his claims are borne out, will prevent the escape of electricity from a wire. He insulates the wire by passing through it or near it, air kept at a low temperature, producing a coat of ice on the wire, which, the inventor finds by repeated and extensive experiments, cannot be broken through by the strongest currents, and at the same time gives an insulation that costs practically nothing.

Smallpox has broken out on the Devil's Lake Indian Reservation in North Dakota. There are now twenty-four cases.

The steamer Roanoke has arrived at Seattle, from Skagway, with $4,500,000 in gold.

Disastrous forest fires are raging in various parts of Colorado.

Foreign exchange bankers reported their inability to obtain such concessions from the Bank of England as would make further gold shipments from this country now profitable.

Conflicts between white and colored people have taken place in New York City, accompanied with loss of life, and also in southeastern Georgia, where the militia has been called out by the Governor to quell an uprising of negroes, where the blacks outnumber the whites, three to one.

The recent hot spell of weather in this country has been unprecedented in the history of the weather bureau in Philadelphia. The records heretofore show the greatest heat to have occurred in 1896. This has been exceeded both in intensity of the heat and its duration during the present month.

The Liberty Congress of anti-imperialists met in Indianapolis on the 15th inst. and issued an address to the people of the United States in which they say for the first time in our country's history the President has undertaken to subjugate a foreign people and to rule them by despotic power. The policy of the President offers the inhabitants of Porto Rico, Hawaii and the Philippines no hope of independence, no prospect of American citizens, no constitutional protection, no representation in the Congress which taxes him. This is the government of men by arbitrary power without their consent; this is imperialism. As the most efficient means of opposing the re-election of Wm. McKinley they recommend voting for William J. Bryan.

The Hamburg-American Line steamer Deutschland, which sailed from New York Eighth Month 8th, arrived at Plymouth, England, making a new record for the eastward passage, and the fastest time ever attained by any ocean steamer, of five days, eleven hours and forty-five minutes.

The population of the city of Chicago, according to the official count of the return of the twelfth census, is as follows: In 1900, 1,698,575; in 1890, 1,099,850.

At the time of the burial on the 17th inst. of Collis C. Huntington, late president of the Southern Pacific Railroad, every wheel and all commerce on the great system of railroads and steamships with which he was connected were stopped for seven minutes. During the short suspension of business fifty thousand men in all sections of the United States remained idle. It is said that this is the first time in the history of American railroads that there has been a total suspension of business on any system as a remark of respect to the memory of any man.

Heavy timber fires were raging on the 17th inst. in the vicinity of Del Norte, Colo. A despatch says: The damage is the greatest in the history of the country. There is almost conclusive evidence that these fires are incendiary. No rain is falling, and the fire has unlimited sway across nearly fifty miles of country.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has ruled that after Fifth Month 1st, 1900, Porto Rico is not to be considered as a foreign country within the meaning of Schedule A of the Internal Revenue Laws of the United States.

Figures from the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department show that commercial relations are now fully restored between the United States and Spain. The exports and imports last year came within a few hundred dollars of equalling those of the highest year on record.

The tonnage that went to St. Louis by boat last year was 50,000 tons below what it was the year before. The river business of Pittsburg last year included 1,318,323 passengers and 8,813,166 tons of freight.

The population of Greater New York, as indicated by the count just completed at the Census Office, is 3,437,202. This includes the population of the boroughs of Manhattan and Bronx, and those of Brooklyn, Richmond and Queens. An approximate estimate of the increase since 1890 shows it to have been 37.9 per cent.

Treasurer John Crosby Brown, of the India famine relief fund in New York has received a total of $212,079.54.

At present the war in the Philippines is costing this country an average of $10,000,000 per month.

There were 550 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 98 more than the previous week and 169 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 301 were males and 249 females: 54 died of consumption; 25 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 10 of cancer; 10 of apoplexy, and 10 of diphtheria.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, new, 104 to 105; 3's, reg., 109 to 109½; 4's, reg., 115 to 115½; new 4's, 132½ to 133½; 5's, 113 to 114.

COTTON closed on a basis of 10½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.40 to $2.60; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.40 to $3.50; Western winter, straight, $3.45 to $3.65; spring, straight, $3.70 to $3.90; city mills, straight, $3.15 to $3.65. RYE FLOUR—$3.10 to $3.20 per barrel, as to quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 70½ to 70¾c.
No. 2 mixed corn, 43½ to 44c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 30c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5½ to 5¾c.; good, 5¼ to 5½c.; medium, 5¼ to 5¾c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4½ to 4¾c.; good, 4 to 4¼c.; common, 1½ to 2¼c.; spring lambs, 4 to 6¾c.

HOGS.—7¼ to 8c. for best Western.

FOREIGN.—Reports by cable setting forth briefly the occupation of Peking by the allied forces, have been received in Washington confirming the safety of the foreign Legations. Fighting is reported as going on, and the inner or "forbidden" city has not been invested by the allies. The allied forces entered Peking on the 15th inst.

The principal Russian papers, notably the Novoe Vremya, commenting upon the victory at Peking, declared that Russia should go no further in participating in common armed intervention, but should limit her military action to the frontier and the Manchurian Railroad.

Telegrams received by the London missionary societies indicate that missionaries and other foreigners are arriving safely at Chinese treaty ports, some of them from places hundreds of miles in the interior. More than one hundred foreigners have arrived at Shanghai.

Conflicting statements are made respecting the flight of the Empress Dowager from Peking.

The British Minister at Peking is reported to have said: "The Chinese broke every engagement with the foreign Ministers. There is no truth in the story that the Imperial Palace supplied the Legations with food. They sent vegetables which were refused. The total casualties during the siege of the legations were 67 killed and 120 wounded."

A despatch from Pretoria says: "General De Wet has managed to elude General Kitchener, in spite of the fact that all the British wagons had double teams of picked animals. The Boers evaded the British by marching at night over grounds known to them, while their pursuers were obliged to march in the daytime."

The Japanese Government has given permission to the United States to establish a hospital on Japanese territory.

Severe floods have occurred in Japan, and it is reported that 200 persons have been drowned.

By the enlargement of a ship canal nineteen miles long Brussels becomes a port for ships of 2000 tons. The old limit was vessels of 300 tons.

Germany produced 1,580,000 tons of raw sugar during the twelve months ending Seventh Month 31st, as against 1,520,000 tons the previous twelve months.

Two of the greatest literary productions of the Chinese are a dictionary of 5020 volumes and an encyclopædia in 22,937 volumes.

An effort is being made in the neighborhood of Lyons, France, to dissipate hail storms by firing cannon at the clouds. The two experiments thus far reported are pronounced successful. A writer in one of the wine growers' organs says: "The results obtained from these experiments are such that organizations will be established at once in all places that have heretofore been ravaged by hail." The practice of shooting at the clouds was known in France over a hundred years ago. It is to be more extensively carried on this year than ever before.

From the latest report on the destruction of wild animals and snakes in India it appears that during the last ten years an average of twenty-one thousand human beings have been killed annually by venomous snakes; or, in other words, no less than sixty people die on an average every twenty-four hours from snake bite in British India.

It is said that an Australian manufacturer in search for a cheap raw material for paper making, has successfully experimented with turf. It is alleged that from the cleaned and leached turf fibres he produces a remarkably durable paper substance. Paper of various kinds, pasteboard and paper boxes are now made out of turf, and are declared to be of a good quality and to have great power of resistance.

The Viceroy of India telegraphs that the heavy, general rainfall has continued in most of the affected tracts. The crops promise well in the central provinces and Berar, sowing is active elsewhere, and the necessity for free kitchens will shortly disappear. Prices, however, are still very high everywhere.

Cholera is prevalent throughout Hyderabad and in Bombay. There are 5,688,000 people receiving relief.

RECEIPTS.

Unless otherwise specified, two dollars have been received from each person, paying for vol. 74.

Joseph Henderson, Agent Ia., $22; for Lorenzo Rockwell, Lewis L. Rockwell, Roy W. Rockwell, David C. Henderson, Archibald Henderson, Daniel J. Peckham, Hugh L. Knowles, N. Y., Christian Thompson, Ole P. Tjossem, Severt Tow and Omen K. Tow; Lewis Harvey, Pa.; Elmira S. Deats, N. J.; John Letchworth, Gtn.; John K. Hulme, Phila.; P. Ellis DeCon, N. J.; Anna Pancoat, Pa.; H. B. Garrett for Frances Garrett, Gtn.; Samuel T. Haight, Agent, Canada, for Edward Waring; for Margaretta W. Roberts, Gtn., to No. 27; Marianna Darnell, N. J.; J. Barclay Hill-yard for Mary E. Hilyard, N. J.; Alva J. Smith, Agent, Kans., for Hannah N. Hinshaw; Edward Lippincott, Gtn.; Chas. A. Lippincott, N. J.; Margaret Maule, Pa.; J. Albin Thorp, Pa.; Wm. Archut, N. J.; Wm. W. Hazard, Agent, N. Y., for Elizabeth Gardner; Hannah P. Smedley, Pa.; Abbie P. Pickett, Ind.; Jonathan Chace, R. I.; Frank M. Normart, Phila.; Rebecca Nicholson, N. J., $6, for Sarah Nicholson; Rebecca N. Taylor, Pa., and Henry Read, N. J.; B. H. Coppock, Agent, Ia., $26, for himself, Edward Edgerton, Lydia Hampton, David Sears, Evan Smith, Joshua P. Smith, John Q. Spencer, John Hoge, Edwin Hoge Lydia S. Worthington, Benjamin Briggs, Albert Emmons and Ruth Edmundson; Charles Ballinger and for Mark B. Wells, N. J.; Richard W. Hutton, Pa. John E. Southall, Eng., 18s 10d; Josiah Wistar and for Priscilla M. Lippincott, N. J.; Hannah W. South Phila., $6, for herself, Edward L. South and Walte South; Thos. H. Whitson, Pa., $36, for Jane S. Warner, $10, for herself, Electa J. Warner, Mo., Jos. E. Meyers, Ia., Elizabeth W. Simms, N. J., Martha Price Thos. F. Scattergood, $10, for himself, T. Walter Scattergood, Anna M. Woodward, Mary E. Forsythe, Debbie C. Spackman, Debbie E. Cope, and for David Cope, Abiah Cope, Thomas C. Eldridge, Geo. O. Hibberd, Hannah F. Fell, James Davis and John M. Rasmussen, Ill.; Seth Shaw, agent, O., $28, for himself, Job Huestis, Jonathan K. Blackburn, Jesse Edgerton, J. Howard Edgerton, Wilson M. Hall, Linton Hall, Hannah Blackburn, Nathan M. Blackburn, Chas. Blackburn, Phebe Ellyson, Abner I. Hall, Natha Kirk and Theophilus Morlan; Wm. M. Cupp, Idaho; Joshua Brantingham agent, O., $36, for Alfred Brantingham, Wm. Brantingham, Chas. Gamble, Mary Fritchman, Anne Hutton, Louisa Harris, Martha Harris, Martha Harris, John Hoyle, Jos. Masters, Geo. G. McGrail, Rebecca Price, Rachel Stratton, Jos. C. Stratton Dillwyn Stratton, Chas. W. Satterthwaite, Mary I. Tes', Lydia Winder and E. J. Woolman; Mary M. Dillon, Kans.; Joseph S. Middleton, N. J.; Lindie M. H. Reynolds, N. C.; Mary Ann Jones, $4, for Isaac Morgan Fla., and Margaret Outland, N. C.; Margara E. Rhoads, Pa., R. Satterthwaite, Del.; Mary A. Shepard, Holmesburg; John R. Tatum, Del.; James N. Moon, Pa.; Anna Horst, Pa.; J. A. Holloway, agent O., $24, for Asa Branson, Ellen Branson, Joseph Baile Thomas Conrow, Mary J. French, Ann B. Hog Sarah F. Holloway, Edwin F. Holloway, Asa G. Holloway, Henry Stanton, Abigail Sears and Charl Stratton; Benjamin F. Starbuck, agent, O., $18 f. himself, Martha Binns, Lindley M. Brackin, Lindl Hall, Jacob Maule, Nathan Steer, Israel Steer, Elisl B. Steer and Wilson J. Steer; Aaron Mekeel, agent N. Y., $12, for Elizabeth Mekeel, Chas. B. Owen, J. Foster Owen, Edward Pyle, Edward Wood and Ma. E. Wood; Anna P. Chambers, and for Alfred Sharless, Pa.; J. H. Dillingham for Albert C. Hill at William Wendte, Mass.; Hannah E. Sheppard, Phi-

Remittances received after Third-day noon will appear in the Receipts until the following week.

NOTICES.

A YOUNG woman Friend wishes to engage for the position of housekeeper. Add. "H," Office of THE FRIEND.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. 16th St., Phila.—On and af Ninth Month 1st, 1900, Friends' Library will be open week days from 11.30 A. M. to 2 P. M. and 3 P. M. to 6 P.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—The school year open Third-day, Ninth Month 4th, 1900. For the admission of pupils early application should be made to
WM. F. WICKERSHAM, Principal,
Westtown, Pa.

DIED, near her home, Iowa Falls, Iowa, Seventh Mo 28th, 1900, in the sixty-ninth year of her age, MALE T. MELAND, beloved wife of Laurity Meland and val member of Stawanger Monthly Meeting of Friends. ceased and her sister were returning home from town a buggy—the former driving—when the horse back only a short distance the vehicle dropped over a sr culvert on the road. Malena died within thirty min of the occurrence with no visible injury on her person her sister altogether unhurt. Though so suddenly ca hence, a large circle of friends have no doubt that she prepared to enter into the joy of her Lord. From e years and throughout her life she had a lively concern the truth as it is in Jesus and expressed in the profes of the Society of Friends. Her open hand and open b will be much missed by many, but the savor of her un tending life will long continue.

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, NINTH MONTH 1, 1900.

No. 7.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,

(South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth.)
PHILADELPHIA.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to
JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

The Lamb that was Slain Worthy to Receive Dominion.

No religion invented by man would propose the world as its conquering Potentate and powerful Dictator so innocent, meek and gentle as a lamb. It is natural to represent victorious might under the name of the lion, as king of beasts; or to display upon the standards of governments the figure of the eagle, the Dragon, or the Bear. But here now comes an aspirant for the world-power under the guise of the dove and the lamb. No man, human religion-makers, could have expected such a claimant to succeed, in the acceptance of even a few.

But now this is come to pass, that millions even though still largely at heart of the religion of the Beast, profess to bow in homage to the empire of the Lamb. That they should acknowledge Him as at times to borrow his manner for the work of the Beast; is a confession that the religion of the Lamb has an inwardly working dominion not of human calculation, but of a wisdom higher than man and produced by the inspiration of God.

The Beast professes by violence to conquer from the outward towards the inward. The Lamb by love seizes the inward citadel of the heart, whence his conquest outspreading empires and subdues the outward. The warfare of the Beast knows only carnal violence and carnal passions and sufferings. Brute force is its one argument, and its one appeal is to fear. The Lamb's warfare gently working in tender motives and intents of the heart, converts to his love and service the will, which the Beast can but stun, silence and enslave. The Beast and his enthroned minions can have but his carnal day. "They receive power as kings one hour with the beast. These have one hour and shall give their power and strength to the beast. These shall make war with the Lamb and the Lamb shall overcome them; for He is Lord of lords and King of kings; and they that are with Him are called and chosen and faithful" (Rev. xvii: 13, 14).

Two classes are here divided: those with the beast, "kings one hour," those with the Lamb, who "shall overcome them" as "Prince of the kings of the earth," He exercising his government by way of the heart and they theirs only by way of the body. Which is the more effectual working for the conquest the nations? Are violence, destruction and hate to win their hearts, or the Lamb and his followers to have the victory?

One "Quaker gun" has been fired into Cuba this summer, which has done more for its real conquest, than all those heard with shrieks of the mangled at Santiago. This more decided dominion over the Cuban heart has been won by an invitation of love to our hospitalities to do her people good. The spirit that inspired this ministry of blessing will continue to be silently storming the citadel of her heart, as more than a thousand returning teachers shall spread the flame of good will. And yet this movement for Cuba's welfare is but a feeble hint of the virtue of the deep and self-sacrificing warfare and victory of the Lamb and his followers, which we trust will yet be the spirit of Christian nations—must be, if they are Christian—a rivalry to do foreign peoples good, replacing the beastly scramble to get their goods.

Worthy—not the slaying Beast—but "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive power!" (Rev. v: 12). Victory, dominion, triumph, not by self-seeking, but through self-sacrifice! "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me. This he said signifying what death he should die," having immediately before said, "Now shall the prince of this world be cast out!"

The apparent victim of the Beast (according to the flesh), by giving "his flesh for the life of the world," becomes the "Prince of life," and "Prince of the kings of the earth," through the victory and drawing power of that love in which He "tasted death for every man," "ascended on high, received gifts for men, even for the rebellious," and a name above every name, "that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow." Worthy is He who died for us—to have the daily dominion of our lives, that we too, alive with Him as called and chosen, and faithful ones, may be overcomers of the Beast and his kings—even of the whole "lust of the flesh, lust of the eye, and pride of life."

Good Tidings.

The realization that there has come into the world One who is able and willing to save all who come to him should have a transforming effect upon us even in regard to the commonest things of life. A recent writer tells of a perplexity which not unnaturally assailed a child to whom the story of the Gospel was indeed "good tidings of great joy."

A poor little street girl was taken sick one Christmas and carried to the hospital. While there she heard the story of Jesus coming into the world to save us. It was all new to her, but very precious. She could appreciate such a wonderful Saviour, and the knowledge made her very happy as she lay upon her little cot. One day the nurse came round at the usual hour, and "Little Broomstick" (that was her street name) held her by the hand and whispered:

"I'm havin' real good times here, ever such good times! S'pose I'll have to go 'way from here just as soon as I get well; but I'll take the good time along, some of it, anyhow. Did you know about Jesus' bein' born?"

"Yes," replied the nurse, "I know. Sh-sh-sh! Don't talk any more."

"You did? I thought you looked as if you didn't, and I was going to tell you."

"Why, how did I look?" asked the nurse, forgetting her own order in her curiosity.

"Oh, just like most o' folks—kind o' glum. I shouldn't think you'd ever look glum if you know'd about Jesus being born."—Advocate and Guardian.

THE BATTLES OF PEACE.—The battles of peace differ also in another respect from the battles of war. They go on without end. The devil fights that most disastrous of all campaigns, a campaign of waiting. The battles of war are for the most part sharp and short. The opposing forces hurl themselves the one upon the other, and in an hour or two the day is lost and won. But these long moral battles last forever. There is no truce in this war. Temptation never rests. They who have a quiet time and are altogether out of the fight have won that shameful peace by their surrender. They have put their hands between the hands of the adversary. Everybody else has to fight, and keep on fighting, over and over again, like the battle with the giant who, when thrown to the earth, got up stouter than ever; the same strife with an unruly temper; the same contest with an ungoverned appetite, the same hard struggle to beat down under our feet and keep there the indolence, the selfishness, the meanness, which seem to be inseparable from our life; day by day we must be at it in a fight where to be weary means to be in danger of defeat, and the flag of truce is the signal of surrender.—George Hodges, in the Parish Messenger.

Doukhobor Notes.

(Continued from page 43).

Seventh Month 22nd.—Left Winnipeg at 7.15 A. M. for Regina, and have had a quiet day. Jonathan carried on some conversation with passengers, but I rather improved my opportunity by myself.

Passed over the vast expanse of prairie, arriving at Regina at 5.10 P. M., Regina time, which would mean about 8.10 P. M., Philadelphia time. Hired a team and went out to the barracks to see Charles Constantine, the superintendent of the mounted police, whom I have met with on former journeyings in this section. We found him in his office, and were invited into his house, which showed a well-kept establishment, although his wife is on a visit to England.

The mounted police of the N. W. T. number seven hundred and fifty, Regina being their headquarters. The Government buildings are very creditable; they consist of some nice little homes, a training building for horsemanship, hospital, etc. The policemen of the N. W. Territory seem to be men of intelligence, although the superintendent said he was crippled by some of his best men having been sent off to South Africa; he told us that the mounted police made their way within two hundred miles of the Arctic Ocean.

Charles Constantine's wife had fitted out a building with the idea of having some of the matronly Doukhobor women use it as a boarding-house, where Doukhobor women could be trained to prepare them to go out among the farmers, as helpers to their wives; but she failed in getting the Doukhobor women to leave their homes with that view, for which I am not particularly sorry; I would rather have them trained on their own reservation and not be obliged to leave their homes.

Seventh Month 23rd.—A lovely morning, and we are on the train for Saskatoon, with sixty Doukhobors returning to their homes, having been at work on the railroad for two months.

The appearance of some of the fields indicates a great lack of rain; it is spoken of as being almost unprecedented, but I am told that in Prince Albert district rains have been seasonable.

There is quite a company of tourists on this train from Ontario, and some interesting conversation has been had with them. Amongst the company is Judge Maguire, of Prince Albert.

Arrived at Saskatoon at 2.55 P. M. As the train stopped for about forty minutes, it gave us an opportunity to speak with all the Doukhobors, all but one of whom belong to the villages not visited by William B. Harvey and myself last winter; but I was recognized as having been on shipboard with some, if not all of them. There was one sick man among them, and one with sore eyes; the rest of them appeared pretty well.

A policeman stationed here told me that after the planting of their crops they went to work on the railroad, and were now going home to harvest; he gave a pretty fair account of them, and Judge Maguire appeared to be interested in conversing about them, stating if they got started with some stock they would get along.

We met with Thomas Copeland, who said he would come to our hotel when he got through with an engagement he had on hand. We wanted to talk with him about the distribution of our goods shipped here, some of which I saw in the warehouse, but I judge the most of them have been distributed.

On the opposite side of the railroad track there were three wagon loads of furs that we are told have been brought down from Onion Lake, two hundred and thirteen miles from here, by teams that have been nine days on the journey, with half-breed Indians for teamsters. The furs, I believe, are to go to England.

Seventh Month 24th.—At the cabin of the mail contractor, where we have arrived after a twenty mile ride from Saskatoon, and it has been the driest section of country I have travelled over; but, from what has been told us, we are likely to see greener fields about ten miles from here. Last winter this cabin was inhabited by an intelligent man, who knew divers Friends in England; he is now at Battleford. Frederick Leonhardt has just told us that he has forgotten to put knives and forks in our provender box, but he is getting up a dinner all the same, and we can use our pocket-knives.

We arranged for the distribution of goods left in the warehouse at Saskatoon, among the three villages nearest there.

Seventh Month 24th to Eighth Month 2nd, 1900.—The journey from Winnipeg to Saskatoon, via Regina, (about five hundred miles), was quite restful compared with the ride across the prairie in the carriage, and we arrived at this western settlement, (known as the Duck Lake Colony), on the 24th ultimo, in pretty fair condition of health. The sight of a number of men and women, coming in from the harvest-field with their implements held up over their heads, was very picturesque.

The table set for their guests by the Doukhobor women was quite elaborate—under their circumstances. Eggs, fried potatoes, pancakes, with strawberries or raspberries, were placed before them, and when Joseph S. Elkinton came to a stop, a good Doukhobor woman said, 'Eat on, eat on,' and he replied, 'I can't, I can't;' and he adds, "I was glad that we had a pleasant time at the supper table, for it was followed by the most exercising meeting of any; and it was calculated to take the strength out of us."

There were some Russians who were not members of the "Christian Brotherhood," who came across the Atlantic with these colonists a year ago, and these did not always join in the community plan, and had exacted rather heavy commissions when hauling goods from the railroad to the villages.

The Government agent had gotten somewhat provoked with these teamsters, and as grace did not greatly abound with either party, the services of a peacemaker were very timely. Some sound business counsel was given, and Joseph S. Elkinton says, "I told them after all that had been done for them they must keep the peace, and be kindly disposed each toward the other, and not feel it a hardship for any of them who had teams to send to Saskatoon for the goods designed for those who were most in need." A good meeting for worship followed this talk, and two of the men made up their minds to go for the goods, to whom an order was given, so as to remove any misunderstanding at the railroad.

The two-seated carriage used between the villages must have been well built, as the "cargo" it contained is thus described: "A regular tent, three satchels, (besides what the driver had for himself), four adults, with provisions, umbrellas, canes, bags of oats, overcoats, gun boots, dust coats, a robe and two blankets and an ape."

"Seventh Month 25th.—A first-class Doukhobor breakfast, the women all seemed in good humor," (the good feeling was particularly appreciated as, the evening before, two of them had considerable complaint to make of the way they had been treated), "and we had a good parting."

The sick were visited in every village, and in some cases, money was given to those who were suffering. Scurvy is spoken of in the community as indicating a shortage of food last winter.

There was a most touching case of a mother who had lost her mental balance under all the strain of emigration, including the death of her husband at Tuartue, and now having recovered in an asylum in Winnipeg, had settled near Yorkton, and wished her two children brought to her; this was to be done by the interpreter Frederick Leonhardt, after his return to Winnipeg. Another case of "a woman with lovely countenance, but very delicate," who wanted to have a home in Winnipeg, appeals strongly to their sympathies, and Joseph S. Elkinton remarks in connection with this case "While the prospect for such getting the comforts of life that delicate people with fine minds should have, among their own people, is not flattering, for some time to come, yet to take them away and place them amongst those who do not understand their language, is about as serious a problem, and we will have to leave what we cannot control to a merciful Providence."

They finished this day's work by driving about twenty miles across the prairie, with the lightning rather unpleasantly vivid all about them to the home of a German Mennonite. The family, consisting of the parents in middle life with nine children, gave the travellers a warm welcome, and invited them to sit down at the table, around which all were gathered when they entered.

The father had brought his family here from Minnesota in order for his sons to take up homesteads, and the improvements, made in a comparatively short time, showed what could be done by well-directed industry. Eight hundred Mennonites have thus migrated from the United States. The piety of this sect is well known, and the evening and morning reading from the New Testament in this household, was accompanied with a weight of feeling very cordial to the visitors.

After leaving this haven of rest the Saskatchewan River had to be crossed by fording it. The water came into the body of the wagon and the horses were kept on the move for fear of quicksands. The scenery along the banks of this stream is grand. The making of bricks by the women was an interesting and encouraging sight in one village in this district. Vegetable gardens were also in evidence in all the villages, and sunflowers were being raised for food, both for the people and their chickens.

A funeral was about to take place at Sposofka; a young man had been injured while working on the railroad. This was a ve touching occasion, as the wife had not been able to get home from Prince Albert. The parents, sister and little son, and most of the villagers made up the procession, followed by Jonathan E. Rhoads and Joseph S. Elkinton. The exercises of chanting, etc., were very similar to those observed on First-day mornings. The mosquitoes were very annoying, but the company listened to some words of sympathy from the Friends, who were invited by the father of the deceased to partake with them at the family table, saying, "Come and eat of my bread." Dipping into a common dish brought to mind the custom of the Jews two thousand years ago; Wooden spoons are used by the Doukhobors. The night was short, and the sleeping apartment not altogether attractive. The breakfast, next morning, was early and well served; potatoes grown in the neighborhood were of good size.

A meeting for worship was held promptly after breakfast, and Jos. S. Elkinton comments thus: "After it was over I said to Jonathan E. Rhoads that with all the trial of patience we had had on account of the mosquitoes, and whatever else we might have felt to be taxing, we ought to be satisfied, for it was a solemn time to go in amongst them, and we had been favored with true solemnity, and had felt the Divine power to be in our midst. We parted as we would wish to, and much tenderness prevailed."

Eight miles distant a village was built on the banks of the river; the houses were in tiers, and had the appearance of being huddled together. The crops, however, were flourishing, and the sight of the women returning from the field, singing as they came in, was calculated to leave a lasting impression on the mind, as also when gathered together in a meeting capacity. The sick and afflicted of every age were visited, and assisted, so far as money could relieve their most pressing needs. The children were particularly interesting in this settlement. Joseph S. Elkinton says they made "a very pretty group, and both Jonathan and I were drawn to address them, and we left the place with a sweet feeling."

At another village the women were digging out sand and loading it upon a wagon for building purposes, and they used their shovels dexterously. The wagon thus filled was drawn by eighteen women—six abreast, three on either side of sticks or cross pieces, connected with the wagon by a chain. The movement of the load, with a woman on top of it, indicated much muscular strength, accompanied with concert and grace of action. Horses were scarce, and the men being employed in working on the railroad, were the reasons the women were thus engaged. Twenty women, ten abreast, holding up new rakes and pitchforks as they came in from the field, was a pretty sight here, as elsewhere.

The meeting for worship was held indoors, and "it was a sight to see the arrangements, with stands on the benches or sleeping berths and on the sides of the room," to allow the greatest number to see and hear. One woman aid to Joseph S. Elkinton, (through the interpreter), "I have seen you three times; when we are ready I want to see your women." He answered, "When you are ready I want you to see our women, and I would like one of them to learn Russian and come to see you."

"Send me one, and I will teach her Russian," was the quick reply, to which the interpreter added, "Now, she has got you!" and Joseph S. Elkinton had to say "It looks that way." He continues, "We had a good meeting, if it was late when it was over. We were piloted out to the larger tent which they had provided for us to sleep in, and it looked as though it might be called a royal tent, good enough for the Czar of Russia." Perhaps a description of the interior of so regal a bed chamber may be of interest to the reader. It is thus described: "New mown hay was spread on the ground, a large piece of felting spread over the hay, and on top of this a Russian rug, and surmounting all, two huge cushions, that made a bed about two-thirds the usual length of a mattress; a heavy sheet covered this pile, upon which the sleeper is expected to lie, with a very heavy quilt over him." The pillows consisted of old coats, or anything available, with a cushion on top.

"Frederick, Jonathan and I were fitted out in this way, while our driver took refuge in his own tent, although there would have been plenty of room for his bed and a table in ours."

"Seventh Month 28th.—Slept finely, with pure air, and our frames in a condition to appreciate the luxury. We had our breakfast in our tent, and got an early start to the village of Petrofka, which is the fifty-fourth on the list visited this year.

"As we approached the village we saw a load of hay drawn by a yoke of oxen, which were driven by a woman; a man was walking not far off, I supposed her husband. We had a nice little talk with them; they both seemed like intelligent persons, and we got some directions from them.

"We saw, near by, a small flock of sheep, (about thirty-one), which they said had been allowed them on the shares."

A member of this community had died six weeks previously, and, as is their custom, his friends were expected to meet on this day, at his son's home, which engagement was carried out by the members of the family, with much feeling. The meeting for worship followed, and our dear Friends were harmoniously engaged in testimony, concerning the advantages and great gospel privileges to be enjoyed by those who fully accepted the appearing of Jesus Christ to their souls; as many had endured much, and, for a long time, in hope of his spiritual coming to them, and had not been disappointed.

At the close of this memorable opportunity, and in the midst of a profound silence, the cry of fire was made, and there was a rush to the other end of the village to put it out, but no serious damage resulted.

"Jonathan E. Rhoads felt drawn to go back and tell a certain fine looking woman, who had either sprained her back or was suffering from lumbago, that he had faith to believe she would be restored to health and be a blessing to her people."

In pressing on they arrived so much after dark one night at a village that they could not see the houses, and with difficulty found a resting-place.

Joseph S. Elkinton says: "We did seem a surprise party, but were received cheerfully, and it was a pretty nice place. The women asked Frederick what they should do for us, and he said, 'Boil us some milk.' In came a number of men to greet me with a kiss. I never had such a time in that line, but we settled down to the table presently, and the boiled milk, with some soda biscuit, suited me well, for I did not want much but sleep, and it did not take long to clear away the table. After this Frederick Leonhardt pulled out some Siberian letters, one of which was to a mother who was in the house we were in, written by her son, with a photograph of himself and his wife. They both had sweet countenances, as though the Saviour's mark was really upon them, and this was not the only letter." Information was given that an order to release twelve of their people, now in Siberian exile, had been given by those in authority. If this can be confirmed it will mean some happy reunions in Canada.

(To be continued.)

The Difference.

BY J. L. HARBOR.

I have for a year or two been a good deal interested in two boys who have been going by my house to their work every morning. They are young fellows about eighteen or nineteen years of age, and I am slightly acquainted with both of them. There is a railroad station within two blocks of my house, and the boys go into the city on the 7.30 train each morning.

One of the boys' names is John Burk. I get up to my study soon after seven every morning, and from my window I can see far up the road. At about twenty minutes after seven John comes along, fresh and neat and trim.

He steps along with a brisk, swinging gait, and must get to the station fully five minutes before the train is due. I do not think that he has missed that 7.30 train a single time in all of the two years he has been employed in the city.

At about 7.28 the other boy, Fred Mills, comes along, rushing and panting, for he has barely time to get the train, and I have known him to miss it again and again. He came along one morning last week just as the train was leaving the station. I chanced to be down in my dooryard, and I said:

"Lost your train, haven't you, Fred?"

"Yes, I have," he said, surlily. "It's the second time I've missed it this week. Now I'll have to wait until the 7.45, and my boss will raise a row, because I shall be ten minutes late. I hurried as fast as I could."

He bore evidence of very hurried preparation for leaving home. His necktie was but half tied, and it showed above the back of his coat collar. His clothing was unbrushed and his boots needed polishing. Some of the yolk of the egg he had evidently been eating for his breakfast was on the lapel of his coat, and there was a smear of it at one side of his mouth.

I could not help contrasting him with the neat and trim John, who was always tidy, always on time, and always cheerful, and I felt very sure that if I wanted to engage a boy my choice would certainly be John instead of Fred.

Lord Nelson said once: "I have always been a quarter of an hour before my time, and it has made a man of me."

It will help any boy to become a reliable and respected man if his friends can say of him, "He is always to be depended upon, and he is always on time if he makes an engagement." —Young People's Weekly.

For "THE FRIEND."

The Mission of the Comforter.

"I have yet many things to say unto you."
"It is expedient for you that I go away."

When we consider that the testimony, "If I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you," was uttered by the same Divine lips which prophesied that the Comforter should guide Christians "into all truth," it would seem to follow, not only that the guidance into fresh truth was to be the bracing and supporting means of the imparted "comfort," or spiritual fortification; but also that, as a precious part of the "all truth," the very reason for the Divine "expediency," or the human necessity that the historic Christ should "go away," or vanish in his historic character, should be seasonably made plain to the church in the course of its advancing edification. If therefore, in the growing light of the ages there shall be found one only conceivable reason for that necessity, that reason may well be accepted as the presumably true one.

The mission and message of Christ being addressed to the whole nature of mankind, including of course that element of our common constitution which is the highest medium of communion between spiritual and unspiritual persons, namely, the mind or intellect, it is thence inferable that the same reason at least might have been that the said going away was necessary to the satisfaction of our naturally unsophisticated, though capricious intelligence, as to the genuineness or authenticity of our Lord's pretension as the great pioneer preacher, or practical exemplification and living embodiment of unselfish love. Any personal triumph which might have been achieved by Him without that completeness of self-prostration which was indicated in the language of prophecy as the making of his "body as the ground, and as the street to them that went over" (Is. li: 23), would still have been liable from that limited and unregenerate intelligence, to the imputation of selfish calculation and mere worldly ambition. The contemplation of such a triumph could not have conveyed the needfully cheering ray of hope to the humblest and most benighted of the wandering sons of men. It could not, in their occasional moments of serious introspection have banished the terror of regarding themselves as hopeless outcasts in the invisible life, nor as virtual victims of the curse of caste in their social relations. It could not have presented a gospel which the "common people" would "hear gladly," nor even have assured them that with all his conceded Majesty, the alleged Benefactor was

Not glad, as the low-loving herd,
Of self in other still preferred;

but that He had indeed

Heartily designed
The benefit of broad mankind.

—Emerson.

In short, it could not have set the soul-satisfying seal of confirmation to that witnessing unto the truth which He came into the world to bear (John xviii: 37).

On the other hand, the gospel of Christ as it stands is an instrumentality through which the humblest menial among its faithful recipients is rich, even in the contemplation of his outwardly low estate. In that low estate he can at least boldly assert his claim to the tribute of social toleration. On, or from, that meagre vantage-ground, whenever and wherever that single due is conceded to him, without coveting admiration, or even waiting for sympathy, he is content and glad to prosecute his own humble individual mission (Is. lx: 4; Prov. xviii: 16) in the world, even as He, the only begotten Son, was sent into the world by the Universal Father. Accepting thus the Lord Jesus Christ as "the way, the truth, and the life," his own individuality is more or less sunk, as that of his Lord and Master wholly was, in his allotted work; and he will not fear on occasion to call on those about him to sink their individuality also in the same happy service.

For still endures the righteous decree that "before honor is humility." A genuine and effectual aspiration must ever begin in utter self-prostration. That spurious dignity which is so current in the world under the euphemism of "pride"—strange euphemism that should thus borrow the brand of a deadly sin!—is sometimes too ready to resent the proffer, and even the thought of toleration, as a piece of disparaging and insulting presumption. The illusions of self-consciousness and of effete tradition are however too rife in all directions safely to allow in any the stooping from principle to personality by casting stones at the unconscious transparencies of other people. In that truly searching illumination which it is the mission of the Comforter to promote, and which may be even now preparing to break forth "from the one part under heaven to the other part under heaven," let us all freely adopt the aspiration of that "Hebrew of the Hebrews," "let God be true but every man a liar!"—accordant as it is with the warning extended to the Patriarch of Uz, perchance before Abraham's time, that the Most High will surely find a way to "hide pride from man."

Tact.

SOCIAL, DOMESTIC, INTERNATIONAL.

Compare, for instance, two men of equally good character and intentions, one of whom has tact and the other none. They are perhaps both interested in the same good cause and both anxious to promote it. The former surveys the ground, seeks for persons who are likely to respond, approaches them carefully, weighs their preconceived opinions, their prejudices, their dispositions; appeals to the motives which will be likely to move them, offends none by his manner, or his pertinacity, or his eagerness, but wins them by his quiet energy, his respectful attention, his calm and moderate, yet vigorous and convincing, presentation of the matter in hand. The other man prides himself on his absolute straightforwardness; he carries the same message to all in the same way, without preparation or variation. Not having studied their peculiarities, he offends some by an appearance of superior knowledge, some by his pertinacity, some by his brusqueness. Very few are convinced, few are won over, none are inspired by his enthusiasm or melted by his sympathy. In pleading his cause, although sincere and earnest, he fails simply from want of tact.

The same difference is seen in business, in social life, in the home, in national affairs. He who uses no tact with his customers cannot sell goods. Many an honorable and industrious man loses his position simply from this lack. How many collisions between employer and employed might have been prevented by this means! How many quarrels in married life, how many estrangements between brothers and sisters, how much bitterness between dear friends may be traced simply to a blind and headstrong determination, which, without discrimination, sympathy or tact, pushes its way against insuperable obstacles! How many cruel wars, how much bloodshed and agony and ruin might have been saved had the originators but exercised a little patience, a little forbearance, a little willingness to explain and to hear explanations, a little power to understand the view of the opposite party, in fact, a little tact in allaying the passions, or in repressing the greed, or in subduing the love of conquest, which gave rise to these tremendous calamities! Arthur Helps says:

"It may well be doubted whether any conqueror, or warlike statesman, or military monarch has ever done his conscientious scruples sufficient justice before he has come to the dread resolve of commencing a war, the burden of which commencement is to be upon his soul forever. Better be the maimed soldier, the ruined peasant, the bayoneted child, the dishonored mother, better endure the whole misery of a disastrous campaign, collected and heaped upon one person, if such a thing could be, than have the fatal responsibility which lies upon that man, who, in wantonness, or selfishness, or even from reckless miscalculation, has been the main promoter of a war that might have been avoided."

It would, indeed, be tragical if a quality, the lack of which is so fatal to human welfare were only an endowment granted to some and beyond the power of others to acquire. But this is not so. One in mature life who is deficient in it may never gain it to the degree of another who has had it in full exercise for years; but it is a plant that all may cultivate. For tact demands that insight into others which enables us to understand their thoughts, feelings and standpoints and the skill to use that understanding in our intercourse with them. We cannot gain this suddenly. Only by close observation, deep reflection, great patience and some degree of sympathy, long continued and exercised, can we hope to obtain it. The more we care for others the better we shall comprehend them, and the more skill, discretion and tact we shall develop in our intercourse with them. And if these qualities are united with an honorable character and a loyal feeling of brotherhood to all men, our service to the world will be assured and our lives will not be lived in vain.—Ledger.

STIER, a commentator of our Lord's teachings, calls them "The words of the Word." In studying which we should remember He himself is the final Word of God; interpreting the will of his Father in his teachings, and by almost every breath and act of his life. For, as Dr. Stallrer, in his Christology of Jesus has well said: "His miracles, and his sufferings, his earthly history are all 'Words of the Word' on a level with his spoken words."—James Todd.

If we could but conquer our inmost enemies we could stand thousands of our outward ones.

Selected for "THE FRIEND."

THE UNBARRED DOOR.

When on Columbia's Eastern plains
Still roamed her forest child,
And the new homes of Europe's sons
Were rising in the wild,
Upon a clearing in the woods
Amos had built his cot,
And tilled his little farm, and lived
Contented with his lot.

A just, peace-loving man was he,
Kind unto all, and true;
And well his ever open door
The wandering Indian knew.
But often were the settlers' lands
By force or fraud obtained,
And to the red man dispossessed,
Revenge alone remained.

And round the blazing fire of logs,
When winter nights were cold,
To shuddering listeners dreadful tales
Of Indian raids were told.
But Amos feared not, though his home
All undefended lay;
And still his never-bolted door
Was open night and day.

One morn a neighbor passed in haste—
"Indians, they say, are nigh;
So Amos, bar your door to-night,
And 'keep your powder dry.'"
"Nay, friend," he said, "the God I serve
Commands me not to kill;
And sooner would I yield my life
Than disobey his will.

One gun I have, but used alone
Against the wolf or bear;
To point it at my fellow-man
My hand would never dare.
But I will put the thing away—
They shall not see it here;
For the old gun in hands unskilled,
Might do some harm, I fear.

Besides, the Indians are my friends—
They would not do me ill;
Here they have found an open door,
And they shall find it still."
"Well," said the neighbor, as he went,
My path is not so clear;
If wretches come to take my life,
I mean to sell it dear."

But the good wife of Amos stood
And listened with affright;
"Unless," she said, "the door is fast
I shall not sleep to-night."
They barred the door, and soon the wife
Was wrapped in slumbers deep;
But Amos turned and tossed about,
And vainly tried to sleep.

Then came a voice within his heart,
A mild rebuke it bore;
It whispered "Thou of little faith,
Why hast thou barred thy door.
Weak is that poor defense of thine,
Against a hostile band;
Stronger than strongest fortresses,
The shadow of my hand.

Hast thou not said these many times,
That I have power to save,
As when my servant's trembling feet
Were sinking in the wave?
Now let thy actions with thy words
In full accord agree,
Rise quickly and unbolt thy door,
And trust alone in Me."

Then Amos from his bed arose,
And softly trod the floor,

Crept down the stairs, and noiselessly
Unbarred the cottage door.
Then forth he looked into the night—
Starlight it was, and still;
And slowly rose the waning moon
Behind the tree-fringed hill.

He looked with trustful, reverent gaze
Up to the starry sky,
As meets a child with loving glance
A tender father's eye.
The cloud was lifted from his mind,
His doubts were over now,
The cool air breathed a kiss of peace
Upon his tranquil brow.

Then back to his forsaken bed
He softly groped his way,
And slept the slumber of the just,
Until the dawn of day.
That night a painted warrior band
Through the dark forest sped,
With steps as light upon the leaves
As panther's stealthy tread.

They reached the farm—"We make no war
With good and faithful men,"
The forest Indian turned and said—
"Here dwells a son of Penn."
"Brother, if still his heart is right,
How shall we surely know?"
Answered another, "Time brings change,
And oft turns friend to foe."

Then said the first one: "I will go
And gently try the door;
If open still, it proves his heart
Is as it was before"
It yielded, and they entered in,
Across the room they stept,
And came where Amos and his wife
Calm and unconscious slept.

With tomahawk and scalping-knife,
They stood beside the pair;
A solemn stillness filled the room—
An angel guard was there—
When eye sought eye, and seemed to say,
"How sound the good man sleeps!
So may they rest and fear no ill,
Whom the Great Spirit keeps."

Then noiselessly they left the house,
And closed the door behind,
And on their deadly war-trail passed
Some other prey to find.
And horror shrieked around their steps,
And bloodshed marked their way,
And many homes were desolate
When rose another day.

But Amos with a thankful heart
Greeted the morning light.
And knew not until after years,
How near was Death that night.

BRIEF HINTS FOR BRIGHT GIRLS.—Some one has suggested fourteen things that every girl can learn before she is fifteen. The following "accomplishments" are within everybody's reach:

Shut the door, and shut it softly.
Keep your own room in tasteful order.
Have an hour for rising, and rise.
Learn to make bread as well as cake.
Never let a button stay off twenty-four hours.
Always know where your things are.
Never let a day pass without doing something to make somebody comfortable.
Never go about with your shoes unbuttoned.
Speak clearly enough for everybody to understand.
Never fidget or hum, so as to disturb others.
Never fuss, or fret, or fidget.

Quakerism and the Individual.

(Concluded from page 44.)

Openmindedness is not only the power to interpret facts when they are presented to us, but it is the alertness to seize an idea when it comes. There is a serio-comic element in our mental life, which arises from the fact that we cannot get an answer when we want it, but must abide its own time of coming. We vex our brains to find an answer to a question that has been troubling us for years, and then some day, while walking down the street, the long sought answer comes sauntering into our mind as leisurely as if it had never been called upon, suggested, perhaps, by the flowers in a lady's bonnet, or even by nothing at all that we can discover. Thus uncontrollable is the advent of an idea, and hence the importance of cultivating the faculty that will make as easy and as frequent as possible, the advent of new knowledge.

Thus openmindedness is a form of expectation, an active, strenuous waiting. It is an expectation that while it waits, does all in its power to smoothe the way, to remove the obstacles of ignorance and prejudice, to bring together all that will help and not hinder the advent of the great thing waited for.

We cannot insist too strongly on the great importance of the cultivation of this faculty, because for us as Quakers, who believe in the inspiration of the laity, so to speak, it bears a special significance. For where all may be ministers, where all may have a contribution to make, surely it is imperative that all should be as well qualified as possible to do that service. There is still variety of gifts, and there is still variety of ability, but upon each one none the less, lies the responsibility of cultivating to the utmost the best that is in him. This can be done by education, as we very well know; but let the conception of education be a broad one. Let education contribute to the development of the spirit as well as of the mind, for mind and spirit should be brought into such harmony that we need not distinguish between them in the religio-mental life which is our ideal. For education, the knowledge of the best that is known and thought in the world, contributes to the development of the whole man, both mind and spirit, and not to any one part. Education and religion, the study of the earth-worm and the rapt contemplation of the spheres, may each contribute their full share to our knowledge and love of God.

This being the demand of the Quaker ideal, let us now turn to the Individual of whom the demand is made—the Individual, which is the highest creation, the development of which, as one great philosopher tells us now, is the goal of all our being, the consummation toward which all our strife is tending. If Quakerism, by its doctrine of the Light of the Spirit, tells us that to us also may be committed a new word of Truth, and causes us to lay stress upon the development of the faculty that will make possible that revelation—namely, openmindedness—so also by this same doctrine of the Light of the Spirit it exalts the individual to a place never before granted him, and makes the working out of our individuality a sacred duty to each one of us.

The philosophers tell us that individuality is the consciousness that selects and chooses facts in order to express a meaning; and that the individual is the expression of this selective principle. As my will makes this choice, it is striving toward the completion of a whole that shall be unique, that is, that there could be no substitution of other facts whose whole would express precisely the same meaning. Also, they say, the world is an individual fact, the unique expression of a divine meaning; and we, being facts in that unique expression, are also individual and unique, and uniquely contribute to the expression of the divine meaning.

This is the language of philosophy, but see how it sounds in our own heart-language. I an individual and thou an individual. In our lives we select and choose the facts that will tend, we hope, toward the fulfilment of the meaning of that life. "My life," we say, "shall have a meaning that no other life has, and every action in my life shall be so chosen that no other action would serve to express the unique meaning that I desire my life to have. I an individual and thou an individual. Yes—and here comes the word of our Quakerism made more significant by the word of philosophy—but each an individual representing the divine, each expressing a meaning that the Divine Being would have us express, and each guided by the Light that never fails toward the goal of the perfection of our own life. Christ in us, the Light of the Spirit: if these are to mean anything they will lead us toward a life of such high ideals and expectations, that our lives will be one concentrated purpose for the fulfilling of the divine meaning in ourselves; they will consecrate all that comes into our lives—knowledge, experience, gladness, sorrow—toward that end. Nothing less than the expression of the divine meaning can be our object; with nothing less shall we be satisfied. Being in God and He in us, working with Him for the same purpose, striving against all that is contrary to the expression of that divine meaning, we join with all creation in groaning and travail, while we wait, with earnest expectation, for the revealing of the sons of God, who, at last, shall perfectly express the divine ideal.

Thus the Individual is made contributor to, and partaker of, the glory of the whole, while at the same time he is not lost in the whole, nor without significance in making up that whole. And Quakerism, by giving unparalleled importance to the Individual, meets the deepest thought of philosophy and the highest need of the spiritual life, and therefore is pre-eminently suited to a time when men are seeking the restoration of the Individual to his true place in the philosophic scheme of things. At the same time we see our own religious principles made more significant by the word of philosophy, one interpreting the other, till we realize more deeply than before that "if only our hearts are right" all things and all knowledge "will be to us a fountain of light and a book of holy teaching," and all things will speak of God.

H. W. CADBURY.

WHEN you have acquired all that is possible in the world you will find that nothing endures except the character that was formed in the processes of material acquisition. We brought nothing into the world, and all that we can take out of it is the character formed while passing through it.—Methodist Protestant.

Music.

For "THE FRIEND."

Music, which has such a great influence over the nerves and natural feelings of man, has no place in spiritual worship.

We read that Jubal, who was descended from the first brother-murderer, was the father of those who handle harps and organs.

Music has always been a means of passing time for the thoughtless, who reject a better occupation.

Music has more effect than anything else on the nerves of man, on the beasts and on the inhabitants of the sea. Seals follow vessels at the sound of musical instruments. So do the dolphins and other kind of fishes—even the venomous serpent is charmed by it.

The great organ in the cathedral brings often one person to tears and paroxysms and another into a highly martial condition.

A stranger having been in a military camp said: "When I first heard the music at their parade I was ready to cry. Next time I felt wicked, and I feared to hear any more."

Music is a great factor in bloody scenes. In the capture of Constantinople by the Turks the cries of fear and of pain were drowned by martial music, and the foremost ranks, consisting of the hosts of peasants and vagrants who had joined for the sake of plunder, excited by the sound, pressed on to the trenches, where they fell and filled them up, and were tramped down and served as a bridge for the coming troops. Yes, it is truly said that musical sounds will act on the human machine more forcibly than the eloquence of reason and honor.

Napoleon in crossing the Alps used martial music. When the army met with obstructions or were on the edge of horrible precipices, then the music ran higher and wilder till the army went on—how many perished we do not know. The wild music worked wonders on the natural man.

William Penn, in his highly esteemed work, "No Cross, No Crown," has quoted from the Waldenses a warning against dancing in which there is sin against all the commandments; but it is the music which is the root of dancing. Here is a fact known to me:

A proprietor of extensive lands and manufacturers had employed a party of laborers from a remote district to work in stone quarries and in building stone walls. This employer was frank and open to all; reliable in his words and promises; well liked by all who knew him. The employed worked to satisfaction, but they wanted some way to pass the time when not at work. On a certain First-day they invited young men and women to a dancing place, which they had hired at the outskirts of a small town. They danced to four o'clock the following morning, and when a little later some of the men came up to the office for instruction, the employer said: "Your crew have danced all night, and I order them to dance all day, too. I will pay them common day wages, but you have to stay with them and see that the work is done honestly—without any girls, drink or music. I take this method of punishing the men, so they shall not dance any more here."

The men felt themselves unfit for anything, but commenced to dance. But it was a sorry dance, without music, drink and girls. They were not able to hold out more than two hours, when they prayed for release from the hard work, which was granted, under condition that the next morning they should resume work and never get up any more dances.

We are to have no fellowship with the deeds of darkness to which music belongs.

The prophets of old knew that the Divine dispensation of Light would not require any outward show and ceremonies, and although such still existed in their time, they cried against it.

When people become self-satisfied and lukewarm, they lean on other men and outward things and forget their first love. But they have to remain in their sorrow until the Light dispels the trouble. Where God is, there is order, and the spirit of the just makes men subject to the order of God. And where the Sun of Righteousness shineth there a brother needeth not to teach a brother and say "Know the Lord," because the Lord is known and glorified by his children who walk in the Light.

How can a soul expect that people can be wise unto salvation by submitting to outward things that are in the highest degree hostile to spiritual worship, when God is a Spirit and must be served in Spirit and in Truth?

Can you reconcile Christ and Belial? Do you think our God wants such musical honors as Moloch? Consider where you are drifting.

CHARLES SHIELDSTREAM,

PALMER, Merrick Co., Neb.

What One Colored Man Could Do?

A writer in the Evening Post tells a story of what one intelligent, enterprising and industrious colored man has been able to do for himself that is worth more than volumes of abstract reasoning on the solution of the colored problem. Monroe F. Clark is his name, and he is a full-blooded negro twenty-three years old. He went to Chicago from Kentucky in the World's Fair year, with no money, but with a fairly good education for one of his meager opportunities, and with good morals and ambition. He became a newsboy, and his attention to business and his thrift soon enabled him to buy a horse and wagon to use in his growing news business. Now he owns and uses eight carts and horses, and he has a smart trap in which to drive around. He owns real estate in the city worth some thousands of dollars, and also one hundred and sixty acres of land in Kentucky. Few white men can show such results from so unpromising a beginning. Clark is also a philanthropist in a small way. Three years ago he established a home for his news boys, now numbering fifty, the great majority of them negroes. He couldn't bear, he says to see the little fellows "going straight to the reformatory and to the penitentiary," so he renovated a rented barn, and provides there board, lodging and recreation. He is ambitious now to build a good home for his boys. "I eat up a good deal of my profits," he said "It cost me more to feed and clothe these boys and send them to school in winter than it would to hire them and let them shift for themselves. But I'm not hungry for money—never was."

No one is truly rich who has not wealth of love, wealth of sympathy, wealth of good-will for men. No one knows what luxury is who has not enjoyed the luxury of doing good. No one has real happiness who has not the happiness of making others happy.

A PRECIOUS truth our Lord would have us know is, that in the day of his reckoning we will be rewarded according to the service we could have done Him if we could have found opportunity for it. In his parable, those who worked but one hour received as much pay as those who worked twelve hours. They were able till the eleventh hour, only because they could find no man to hire them. They were wishing and looking for work all that time.—Malcom Smith.

"GREATNESS in any direction is an accumulation of little faithfulnesses towering into the height of the world. Days full of fidelities are like a fall of rain, bringing the life to flower and fruitage."—S. S. Times.

Items Concerning the Society.

Mary P. Nicholson has been granted a minute by Western District Monthly Meeting to attend Hadfield Quarterly Meeting; also to some service in Burlington and Bucks Quarterly Meetings.

The N. Y. Sun says: "This seems to be the monoclastic Age. All old things must succumb to new ideas. The convention of two sects of Friends first held in New York, has resulted in a determination to abandon the distinctive garb for both men and women, and also to drop the use of 'thee' and 'thou.'"

Canonor compels us to admit that the garb could be lightened a little; but we really regret to give up the "thees" and the thous."

After transacting some business with one of the Society of Friends, and about to take his leave, an American Envoy said:

"I admire your Society. The principle contains of Christianity that I have any idea of; but I am sorry to see that some of you are losing your edges, and I don't see how you can retain your principles and forego your little peculiarities, your marks of moderation, self-denial, and difference from the spirit of the world. You are lights; the world should come to you, and not you go to the world. You may gather them; but they will scatter you."

The Yearly Meeting of Friends for North Carolina, held at High Point, Eighth Month 7th to 14th, 1900, was well attended. There were present several ministers from other Yearly Meetings. J. J. Leave was too unwell to attend. We had considerable in the way of teaching and explanation of the Bible, and one young Friend on First-day, before a large audience, revived the apostle's words, "That God had made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth," and affirmed the doctrine from some personal knowledge, that God had not left himself without witness to any people, aye, even in the dark heart of Africa. There were some changes made this year in the way of collecting money for special purposes, passing cards and envelopes round for money, or for name and amounts subscribed by the donor; and ten applications were made to the Yearly Meeting and approved of, it was referred to the representatives to decide on the amounts. The finances of the Yearly Meeting were found to be in better shape than usual, and there was nearly enough money to our credit in bank to pay off the $1,000 due on our new meeting-house incurred when we transferred the old one to Guilford College, which was the cause for rejoicing in our expectation to be soon free of debt. A good report was read from Guilford College. The number of pupils was not up to last year, but there were more Friends. The financial condition was not cheering—hope it will be better this year. Two of the sittings were mostly taken up by the reading of a proposed uniform discipline and the consideration thereof. It is revolutionary in its changes, and yet met with some approval. It was referred to the Quarterly Meetings to report on next year. It is only a few years since some changes were made in the old book of Discipline, and even these were not approved of by many, who liked the old way better. Our principle is to wait on the Lord and take heed to the voice of his spirit through our Leader and Commander, "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day and forever," and some of us think we ought not to move in it unless by his Divine drawing. Preparative Meetings are to be given up, and birthright membership; a change made in the way of recording ministers, and elders to be triennially appointed.

No answers required to the queries which in time will become a dead letter. New way of collecting money hinted at, and the payment for railroad fare for members to a five-year conference proposed. Our Yearly Meeting is the farthest south of all, and has quite a number of the farming and working classes who need all their resources to enable them to live and to educate and bring up their children; and in the Wisdom of Truth in the setting up of our Discipline it was spread over a broad basis, from Monthly to Quarterly, and then to Yearly Meetings; and we still believe through our Divine President we have men and women of good judgment and understanding to decide all questions coming before us, and to hold on our way rejoicing. "A good understanding have all they who do his commandments." Now the proposal is to transfer to a few men at a distance, who are to meet every five years, certain questions which may be pending or at issue. This new board of Friends' Church Inquisition must do something, and on the idea of E. T. Pritchard that sharpened tools seek employment, will cut down our young cherry trees with their little hatchets and deprive us of fruit; also make muzzles for unruly oxen and whips of small cords well knotted for poor Mordecais. It has been done before, and as to enforced uniformity, it was pointed out that it was tried in old England by the Episcopalians, Presbyterians and Independents, and in New England by the Puritans, and proved after determination suffering a miserable failure. We have been in the past sturdy and unflinching non-conformists, and are not slaves, but true men drawn together by conviction of the Truth as it is in Jesus, and looking to Him as our Leader and Upholder; One is our Master, even Christ, and all we are brethren. We need to return to the old standard of purity, integrity, language, brotherly love, humility and deportment, and are in the Lord's hands. He is unchangeable, and, if suffering for his great name's sake, is before us, He will support. To whom be glory in the churches throughout all ages.

A. FISHER.

WOODLAND, Eighth Month 20th, 1900.

The above is accompanied by a copy of a minute from Rich Square Monthly Meeting, N. C., adopting the report of its committee "recommending to the Yearly Meeting the non-adoption of said proposed uniform discipline."

Notes from Others.

Manila has a Protestant non-sectarian college. It was formerly opened Sixth Month 29th, with an enrollment of five hundred pupils. It is the first educational institution ever organized in the Philippines without the sanction and domination of the monkish orders.

In a talk on "Children's Lies: Their Intellectual and Moral Significance," Dr. Leighton Witmer, commenting on the judgment of children from the absolute standard, said: "We should look at the way we behave in truth-telling in our sphere of life. How often are we prepared to equivocate in words to maintain our place in social circles! Not even the clerical profession is exempt from the idea of occasionally indulging in slight prevarications."

Our Divine Lord and Master declined to take sides in the political issues dominant while He was upon earth, and though he went about doing good to the bodies of men, his gifts of healing were altogether subsidiary to the great object of his mission. He came to save his people from their sins, to give his life a ransom for many. Standing in the place of sinners, Jesus fulfilled the law and "bore the sins" of those who had broken it, and it is dishonoring and belittling both his work and Him to regard Him as a political or social reformer, no matter how excellent and desirable the reform may be. Him hath God exalted to be a Saviour.—Episcopal Recorder.

The Church Standard has the following: "Our pulpits should be not merely convenient elevated positions, into which anyone may go in order that his voice may be better heard, but the places from which Christ's authorized messengers are to speak as from the place of authority."

[This is good, if a right view of "authorized" and "authority" is intended. It is not good if ecclesiastically authorized is held to be sufficient, and the "place of authority" is but a clerically ordained seat of ministrations. "Christ's authorized messengers" are authorized, not constructively, but by Christ's direct, immediate authority and gift; and his Spirit is the sole "place of authority" for any message to be delivered.—EDITOR.]

Dr. Cyrus Hamlin founded a boys school in the great Turkish city of Constantinople. When persecution arose against his pupils who had become Christians, he established laundries and bake-houses and other industrial establishments, and induced the people to patronize these. This gave employment to his native converts and secured them a living. When the Crimean war came on he was at his post, not only as a missionary, but directing his laundries and bakeries. The sick soldiers in the hospital must have good bread, and Florence Nightingale soon discovered the bake-shops of the American missionary. Henceforth no other bread was used in the hospitals, or by the soldiers in the city. Tons of bread were made and distributed every day, and the profits from the sale were very large. He could have selfishly laid up a great fortune for himself, but he used the money thus made for church building, and more than a dozen church edifices in the Turkish empire were built and endowed by this means.

After the Crimean war was over Dr. Hamlin undertook the greatest work of his life, in the founding of the Robert College in Constantinople. Christopher R. Robert, of New York, furnished the money and desired Dr. Hamlin to superintend the work of building an institution for higher education. He undertook it in the face of the opposition of the Turkish Government, which refused permission to erect college buildings. After an effort of seven years he succeeded in securing a site in the suburbs of the city, studied architecture so that he could draw his own plans and superintend the building himself, and the result all the world knows in the famous Robert College in Constantinople. He was president of the College till 1876; then became Professor of Theology in Bangor Seminary in this country; afterward president of Middleburg College, Vermont. The last fifteen years of his life have been spent in literary work and in the calm repose of declining years. His death came suddenly and unexpectedly, [Eighth Month 8th, at the age of ninety], in Portland, Maine, where he had gone on a brief visit.—Presbyterian.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It is understood at Washington from Minister Conger that the foreign Ministers were requested by the Chinese Government to leave Peking when the Taku ports were fired on. They refused, and then were ordered to go. Again they refused, and the imperial troops were ordered to remove them. The Ministers resisted, and the Legations were attacked by the imperial infantry, under direct command of officers, in control of the Empress Dowager.

A despatch from Washington says: So far as the President is now advised, it is difficult to suppose there is a responsible Government in China with which a peace could be negotiated. The flight of the Empress and of the Emperor leaves China practically without a government.

The reply of the United States Government to Li Hung Chang says that it cannot enter upon negotiations until there is a Government in China which can prevent the hostilities of Chinese troops and Chinese citizens against the forces of the Powers. The text of the reply has been communicated to the other Governments.

Orders have been issued by the War Department directing that the troops on the transport Meade, intended for Taku, China, be sent from Nagasaki, on arrival there, to Maoula. Orders also have been issued diverting all other transports with troops for China from Nagasaki to Manila. About four thousand troops will be affected by this order.

It is reported from Washington that it has been decided to ascertain whether the Powers would entertain a proposition for united action for a settlement of the Chinese troubles. If the efforts of this Government in that direction should be unfavorably received, and one or more of the Powers should insist upon the partition of China, then the United States would withdraw from the allied movement.

Official cable despatches were received in Washington that the German Government had taken action substantially similar to that of the United States in rejecting China's peace proposal. Germany insists that no negotiations can be conducted with Li Hung Chang until his credentials make plain that he has authority from the responsible heads of the Chinese Government.

Over thirteen hundred and fifty Cuban teachers visited Philadelphia on the 23rd and 24th insts., and were shown much attention.

Indian wars in this country have been expensive as well as bloody. It is estimated by the War Department that, excluding the time covered by wars with Great Britain (1812-14) and with Mexico (1846-8) and with the Confederate States (1861-5), three fourths of the total expense of the army is chargeable, directly or indirectly, to the Indian. The aggregate thus chargeable is put at $807,073,658, and this does not include cost of fortifications, posts and stations; nor does it include amounts reimbursed to the several States ($10,000,000) for their expenses in wars with the Indians. The Indian war pension account in 1897 stood at $28,201,632.

The production of iron ore in the United States for the year 1899, according to the annual report of the United States Geological Survey, which has just been compiled by John Birkenbine, amounted to $24,683,173 long tons, an increase of 5,249,997 tons; or twenty-seven per cent., over 1898. The records for 1898 and 1899 represent the largest output of iron ore mined in any country in one year, the nearest approach being a total of 18,062,040 tons mined in 1880 in England.

The Census Bureau announces that the population of Philadelphia is 1,293,697, an increase since 1890 of 244,733, or 23.57 per cent. The increase from 1880 to 1890 was 23.58 per cent.

The population of Baltimore is given as 508,957, and of Denver, 133,859.

The Summit Hill mine fire, in the anthracite coal regions of Pennsylvania, which has been burning forty years, is spreading to adjacent collieries, throwing three hundred miners out of employment. It is estimated that the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company, which owns the property, has expended more than a million dollars in an endeavor to extinguish the fire.

It seems clear that the United States has a very difficult and costly task before it in the Philippines, and the large army now on the islands does not appear to be large enough to subdue the natives.

As a result of a riot, one person was killed, twenty injured, one fatally, and fully a million dollars in property has been destroyed by fire in Akron, Ohio.

The United States is not the greatest producer of petroleum. Russia last year produced 9,000,000 tons, or 850,000 tons more than the United States.

Ten million dollars damage is estimated to be the result of the forest fires in Colorado and Wyoming. According to report the loss on timber is only a comparatively small item. In many places the fires are spreading over almost bare country land where there is nothing but young growth, which might have made the forests of ten and twenty years hence if it had not been for these fires. Lands which could have been sold for homes because of the pleasant surroundings will now for years not be worth much. The vicinity of Glenwood Springs and such places, where the tourists resort, will be much affected in a commercial way, because the scenery will be impaired.

Pennsylvania has a greater number of national banks in operation than any other State, the total being four hundred and fifty-two.

The Mississippi jetties are among the most gigantic engineering feats of the world, costing in the neighborhood of $5,000,000, and making a twenty-six foot channel out of a stream where there was formerly but eight feet of water. This has made of New Orleans a port for the largest among ocean going vessels.

The Census Office made public the census returns for St. Paul and Minneapolis, Minnesota. The population of St. Paul is 163,632, an increase over 1890 of 22.89 per cent. The population of Minneapolis is 202,718, an increase over 1890 of 23.05 per cent.

Cyclones or general storms may be 1,000 miles in diameter. Hurricanes operate on a path averaging 600 to 800 miles wide. Tornados are much smaller. They may be only a mile wide at the top and but a few feet at the bottom, but they are much more dangerous than either a cyclone or a hurricane.

The National Negro Business League, made up of delegates from about twenty-five States, assembled at Boston on the 23rd. Booker T. Washington was appointed President.

There were 372 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 178 less than the previous week and 34 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 186 were males and 186 females; 37 died of consumption; 18 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 9 of apoplexy; 9 of diphtheria, and 7 of cancer.

Markets, &c. — U. S. 2's, new, 104 to 105; 3's, reg., 109 to 109½; 4's, reg., 115 to 116; new 4's, 133 to 134; 5's, 112½ to 113.

COTTON CLOSED on a basis of 9½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.40 to $2.60; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.40 to $3.50; Western winter, straight, $3.45 to $3.65; spring, straight, $3.70 to $3.90; city mills, straight, $3.45 to $3.65. RYE FLOUR—$3.10 to $3.20 per barrel, as to quality.

GRAIN—No. 2 red wheat, 72½ to 72½c.

No. 2 mixed corn, 43½ to 44c.

No. 2 white oats, clipped, 28 to 28½c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5½ to 6c.; good, 5½ to 5¾c.; medium, 5¼ to 5½c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4½ to 4¾c.; good, 4 to 4½c.; common, 1½ to 2½c.; spring lambs, 4 to 6½c.

HOGS.—7¼ to 8c. for best Western.

FOREIGN.—The French Foreign Office has received from Li Hung Chang a request similar to the one addressed to the United States Government, asking for the appointment of Pichon, the French Minister at Peking, or another person to represent France at the peace negotiations. It is said that all the Powers have received a like message.

Fires, fighting and dissension are apparently following in the wake of the relief of Peking. The Daily Mail publishes despatches from the Chinese capital of the 17th, declaring that a great fire was then raging in the Imperial City. The Russian commander had declined to accept the decision of the other generals not to violate the imperial precincts, and street fighting was going on.

A despatch from Korea says a thousand rebels have attacked Song-Ching, burning the Government buildings located there.

King Oscar has formally agreed to act as arbitrator of the claims for compensation for losses sustained by British and German subjects and American citizens in Samoa.

So far as the wholesale meat markets in London are concerned, each succeeding year shows a huge increase in the quantity imported from America and the colonies and gradual diminution in the bona fide English supply. Last year but 42 per cent. of the entire consumption was forthcoming from the provinces. America supplied 23 per cent. and Australia and New Zealand 20 per cent.

A despatch of Minister Conger from Peking of the 19th says: "The entire city, with the exception of the Imperial palace, is occupied by Japanese, Russian, British, Americans and French. No representatives of the Chinese Government are in sight in Peking, and the conditions are chaotic.

The Chinese admit having lost 3,000 in the various attacks upon the Legations at Peking. The foreigners' rations dwindled to one pound a day, consisting of horse-flesh and rice.

Germany insists that no negotiations can be conducted with Li Hung Chang until his credentials make plain that he has authority from the responsible heads of the Chinese Government.

A despatch received from Tien-Tsin says large bodies of Boxers are concentrating at a point, supposed to be on the Pei-Ho River, about sixteen miles from Tien-Tsin, on the way to Peking.

Every animal kept by man, excepting the cat, is taxed in Austria.

A despatch from Bombay of the 23rd says: "Famine distress appalling. Thousands will die of starvation unless rescued. Money is needed to buy both food and blankets. The suffering from lack of clothing is terrible. Cholera still active. The condition of destitute women and deserted children specially pitiable. Many boys and girls are in heartrending need."

Through secret intelligence agents the British learn that Botha and 8,000 Boers have assembled at Maehad dorp, the new capital of President Kruger, with the whole of the Boer artillery, including the heavy pieces formerly at Pretoria.

RECEIPTS.

Unless otherwise specified, two dollars have been received from each person, paying for vol. 74.

Walter L. Moore, N. J.; Anne W. Boone, Canada; Julianna Peele, N. C.; Geo. Haines, Jr., N. J.; Hanna P. Smith, O.; Josiah W. Leeds, Pa., and for B. Fran Leeds, N. J.; Rachel S. Maris, Phila., and for Alfre E. Maris; Margaret Ward, Canada; James H. Moor, Pa., $6, for himself, Dr. W. W. Moon, N. Y., and Everett Moon, Minn.; Ole T. Sawyer, Ia., $12, for himself; John Knudsen, Iver Oison, Sighjorn T. Rosdale, M. Linda Thompson and Anna T. Tostenson; John V. Garwood, agent, Ia., $6, for John Williams, Almed R. Wroe and George Standing; Jacob L. Evens, N. J. Allen T. Leeds, Phila.; Jonathan E. Rhoads, N. J. S.S., for himself, Joseph Rhoads, Geo. A. Rhoads and Robert R. Tatnall; David Heston, P'k'd; Sarah L. North, Phila.; Susanna Brinton, Pa.; Wm. T. Coope N. J.; Mahlon Johnson, Ind., $8, for himself, Ashle Johnson, Nancy T. Hadley and Ruth Ann Stantor; Alva J. Smith, agent, Kans., for Milton Chammes; Thomas D. Hoopes, Pa.; Anna Manchester, Mich; Martha R. Newkirk, Phila.; Geo. W. Thorp, P'k'd; D. S. Pennell, Pa., $4, for Joseph Pennell and Elizabeth C. Yarnall; George M. Warner, G't'n; Hem B. Leeds, agent, N. J., $4, for John M. Roberts and Isaac Lippincott; Jesse Negus, agent, Ia., $12, for Archibald Crosbie, Tristram Coggeshall, Elias Cre Hannah M. Kundson, Lydia B. Oliphant and Clarson T. Penrose; John Ramsey, Kans.; John C. Haines, Pa., $6, for himself, Levi S. Thomas and W. T. Zook; Mary Ward for Thomas Ward, Calif.; Jam E. Armstrong, Pa., $4 (2 vols.); John Stamp Keelin, Ireland, 10s.

Remittances received after Third-day noon will appear in the Receipts until the following week.

NOTICES.

A YOUNG woman Friend wishes to engage for the position of housekeeper. Add. "H," Office of THE FRIEND.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. 16th St., Phila.—On and after Ninth Month 1st, 1900, Friends' Library will be open week days from 11.30 A. M. to 2 P. M. and 3 P. M. to 6 P. M.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—The school year opens on Third-day, Ninth Month 4th, 1900. For the admission of pupils early application should be made to

WM. F. WICKERSHAM, Principal,
Westtown, Pa.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL will re-open Ninth Month 17th. The school office will be open daily, after Ninth Month 3rd, from ten until one o'clock.

J. HENRY BARTLETT, Supt

DIED, on the twenty-third of Seventh Month, 19 MARY W. HARMER GRISCOM. She was an overseer and a loved member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Western District. Sweetness of spirit and fearlessness were prominent characteristics, enabling her to fulfil her many public duties, as well as those of her home life, with such fidelity and love that she was endeared to all. Her funeral was held at Twelfth Street meeting-house. Testimony was borne to the loveliness of her character, and a belief expressed that she had entered into the joys prepared for the faithful ones. —, on the evening of Eighth Month 17th, 1900, at his home, 2110 Tioga St., Philadelphia, JOHN KIRKBRULME, aged fifty-six years; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Northern District.

—, on the sixth of Eighth Month, 1900, WALTER WORTHINGTON, in the thirtieth year of his age; a member of Chesterfield Monthly Meeting of Friends, Morgan, Ohio.

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, NINTH MONTH 8, 1900.

No. 8.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,

(South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth,) PHILADELPHIA.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

Letter from Esther Tuke to Martha Routh.

YORK, England, Seventh Month, 8th, 1794.

My Dearly Beloved Friend:

Thy sisterly communication was refreshing and edifying. It arrived yesterday morning just as our valued friends (I. and H. Grant who had partook) were leaving us, after spending six days with us, much to mutual comfort. I believe they thought their time well bestowed, though our principal conversation was on common things, yet a savor of life attended, which rendered the converse pleasant and instructive, and in some opportunities, particularly our school meeting seemed to bear the comparison of the water proceeding from under the threshold, inasmuch that I. G. expressed that the satisfaction he had felt whilst here, and particularly in that opportunity, was beyond all conception, or the power of words to set forth. His diffidence is so great that he thought he could be ashamed to sit with us, but his heart was so opened as to hand very suitable portions to our girls, and a great encouragement to the teachers. I think it was an opportunity of divine favor which will be long remembered, though much of our counsel was cast on floating minds.

My mind was very low when they came, not only from my complicated infirmities, but from fears respecting our great undertaking, particularly the new house, but I. G. like R. B. revived me, not doubting it was under Divine protection, which would have a reward far exceeding any little risk of property.

It might seem a little unfeeling to tell thee of so many outward things, [but remember whose child it is] who seemed clothed for superior work. But I think little changes are necessary which thou hast experienced, and I hope will, when thou hast entered the land of promise now in view, for it would be very unwise always to wear the royal robes. Our friendship thou knowest is on that Rock which cannot be moved, and I hope our feet will abide upon it through all the changes of a weary pilgrimage to the land of rest. And though myself and that prince William Rotch, with his family have been almost the constant companions of my mind since the Yearly Meeting, yet a sense of my weakness, like that of Jeremiah, when drawn out of the prison by rags, made me conclude silence much better for me at a time when blessings are poured upon you by the heads of the tribes, and prayers offered up like incense in which according to my feeble ability my heart unites.

And though thou, my beloved friend, may have some deep baptisms in a foreign land, and perhaps be ready to conclude as dear William Hunt did, that thou hast run and not been sent, yet I am persuaded that thou wilt have the cry of Hosanna by that disposition which sought to make the holy Jesus a king, under which I trust his hiding in the wilderness will remain with thee in legible characters, and though thou may be favored to tread upon scorpions and know evil spirits to become subject unto thee, with the unity and language of encouragement of spiritual brethren, yet thou knowest there is no safe cause of rejoicing but in the renewed evidence of having the new name. No spiritual riches nor anything to glory in, but the continued knowledge of living under his government, who exerciseth judgment, loving kindness and mercy.

This I pray may be thy blessed experience, and that thou may, if consistent with the Divine will, return to thy native land in peace, clothed with the beautiful adorning of self-abasement, a thankful sense of preservation in being favored with the King's messages and enabled to deliver them in as few words as the commission required; seek for nothing to beautify but his royal superscription, which hath been and will be sufficient for the end proposed.

It is most probable I may be gathered into one of the lowest mansions in the heavenly house, before thou returnest to receive in peaceful quiet the salutation of the spiritual body who will discover thy humble clothing to resemble that query: "Who is this that cometh from Edom with dyed garments from Bozrah? traveling in the greatness of his strength." Marks already indicating thy garments have been renewedly dyed, and thy traveling whilst in Edom by and with Him who speaketh in righteousness.

I anticipate this blessing; may it in an abundant manner be thine, and that, unlike divers who have returned from that large field to their native soil, thou mayest labor with increased dignity, the root having been strengthened by no luxurious branches being suffered to grow, hindering the first fruit being fully ripe. Thus my dearly beloved friend, as thou has drunk many bitter cups, those of consolation will be administered unto thee, and thy sun will set in brightness, having the same testimony with the apostle, that of having fought the good fight and kept the faith—the crown is laid up for thee.

That love in which there is perfect freedom and sisterly affection, drew me to give what occurs, as it is not likely I shall ever write again so largely—though so long as I am clothed with this body, my spirit will nearly accompany thee by sea and land, as also the royal band, William Rotch in particular. Please say to him, that my belief is unshaken in what I told him respecting Job, and oh that he may not retard the happier days by setting himself in a seat the Master never made. He has seen miracles, and as great as those wrought for Thomas; and I believe the language of Truth is "Reach hither thy hand, and be not faithless, but believing."

Dear John Wigham may go forth weeping, bearing precious seed, but I hope will return again with that rejoicing, which the Master (dearly loved) sees meet. He hath often been queried of as Peter was, and would make the same acknowledgment. Indeed, I often think he resembles that apostle. Our dear love to him, as also that good old veteran, Samuel Emlen. I wish to retain a place in his remembrance, as he always will in mine, having been a great instrument of good to me in my youth and in days like those of Jacob's troubles, though to him then unknown. Few could have rejoiced more in his company here than myself, but I relinquish the gratification with a degree of thankfulness that such bitter cups in traveling are not now handed, but a peaceful opening to his native land, where I believe he will lay down his head in peace, and his spirit be united with the just of all generations.

The particulars of thy Wycomb excursion were truly comfortable, particularly thy account of that dear young woman of whom I well remember prophesying when a child.

I am glad thou mentions our pilgrim daughter, Ann Alexander, with approbation; my heart is often moved in thinking how she seems like one who is to have no certain dwelling place, and many are my fears lest the time for putting off the harness should be missed; but the testimony of others, especially dear Job Scott's, often settles my mind in reverent trust that she knows the Shepherd's voice and is under his care.

When thy spirit is refreshed in the company of our beloved Rebecca Jones and S. Smith, salute them affectionately for me. I rejoice they are yet spared for the church's sake. And now my beloved sister, yea far more than one so by nature, when not so by spiritual relationship, the salutation of that endeared love which hath bound us as one body, flows toward thee with fervent desires that He who led Joseph as a flock, may be thy keeper under every dispensation, covering thy head in every engagement, causing thy bow to abide in strength and thy arrows to hit the mark.

And may the blessings of Ashur be thine, in having plenty of bread and dipping thy foot in oil. In humble trust that this will be thy happy experience, I remain in nearest fellowship thy truly affectionate friend,

ESTHER TUKE.

Doukhobor Notes.

(Concluded from page 51)

Seventh Month 29th.—Duck Lake Settlement, near Rosthern Saskatchewan, Joseph S. Elkinton went on an exploring expedition among the houses early one morning and “got completely lost in the tangle of houses, stables, hay stacks, etc.” Several of the Doukhobors invited him to take breakfast with them as best they could by signs, but fearing lest Jonathan E. Rhoads and the interpreter would not understand his absence, he at last found someone to pilot him back to the house where they had lodged. This experience gave him an opportunity to realize how helpless they would be without an interpreter.

It was in this village Joseph S. Elkinton writes: “We met with some very interesting characters, and my feelings were enlisted in behalf of some aged women in particular, who have seen of the exercises of life, and their strength is impaired, but we have reason to believe they know of the support of religion.”

The villagers assembled on First-day morning in their best clothes, and “the sight was beautiful, as the men, women and children stood in order of age, and we were in condition to enjoy it and to get something deeper than the outside appearance. I don’t know that I have heard more sobbing from any one company for twenty years than we did during that time of offering prayer, though not expressed in their own language. This shows that solemnity and contrition is not dependent on the nationality of the tongue, but that the language of the heart of both speaker and hearers is understood by the Omnisipient One who sees in secret and rewards openly.” A meeting was held afterward, and the parting was attended with very comfortable feelings.

While attempting to reach the next village, they lost the trail and got into high grass and sloughs, and, finally, in crossing a stream, the water came up into the wagon and nearly to the top of their boots, soaking the provision box and baggage, and the poor horses were sorely tested before they were on the opposite bank. They then came to a village, apparently deserted, made of sod-houses, the occupants having gone seven miles distant to reside in better homes.

“After leaving this place” Joseph S. Elkinton says: “We were favored to get on the right track for the village No. 57, and, on reaching it, found the people had been expecting us, and quite a company were gathered together. A little building, probably designed for a store-house, was fitted out with beds and a table, aiming to accommodate Jonathan, Frederick and myself in good style.” Upon opening their valises they found the contents rather limp—“not a collar left fit to put on. But the Doukhobor women were merciful, and seized collars, cuffs, shirts, towels, etc., and made off with them. They also captured the valises and hung them up in the sun. In going our rounds we came into a house where a good woman was doing her best at the wash-tub and another at an ironing-table. In the meeting which followed Jonathan spoke of having been in all the villages and the desire he felt for their preservation, growth and establishment in the true faith, putting forth plain Scriptural doctrines.”

Joseph S. Elkinton bid them farewell, as a people, for the present, willing to meet with them again, but if this should not be permitted, he would often think of them, and hoped he might have a place in their thoughts. He also referred to their landing on this continent and the welcome extended to them and the satisfaction he had felt in visiting them when settled in their prairie homes, as well as the comfort he had in helping them through the past winter by soliciting and forwarding contributions to them.

The hardships of their lot still appealed to his sympathies, especially on account of the trial of separation from their companions in exile. As it was the Lord who had given us our loved ones, if He thought them worthy to suffer for his names’ sake, or to be employed in his service, it was an honor, and we must have faith in his supporting power, as also that the righteous would not be forsaken.

The song which he heard from the lips of those who were on board the first ship which brought them to our shores eighteen months ago, commenced with “Our God is with us; He has carried us through,” so it was well to believe He would carry them through to the end. Tears were in evidence of their appreciation.

Seventh Month 30th.—The homeward journey was begun, after a good breakfast served with marked hospitality. Quite a number of letters were sent by them to Doukhobors in the Yorkton district. A lame boy gave the interpreter a pair of pigeons from his own flock as a token of gratitude for favors received. Chickens had been raised and sold at twenty-five cents each. This was the beginning of business and very promising of future development.

The Saskatchewan River had decidedly less water in it than they found when fording it a week before. Their next stop was at the house of a German Mennonite Bishop, with a family of nine children and thrifty surroundings.

Eleven thousand Germans went into Russia at the invitation of Empress Catharine, but many of them had come to America. An excellent dinner was provided, and the privilege of meeting with such Christian people was mutually appreciated.

That night the travellers reached Rosthern, and had a pleasant visit with Albert Sauer and his wife. They are missionaries under the auspices of the Evangelical Society of Canada, and there was evidence enough of need for the right kind of labor in some of the towns in that section of country.

Eighth Month 1st.—From the rear end of a mixed (freight and passenger) train were to be seen some very interesting sights as they journeyed over the prairie.

Horses brought in to be “broken” were in pens along the route. Some of these were beautiful animals, and the method of “breaking” them was apparently more merciful than has been represented at times. Cattle are herded here in great numbers and transported on the cars.

A mounted police of the Northwest Territory gave this testimony about the Doukhobors. They were industrious and well calculated to make good settlers, although slow to adopt the customs of a new country and that immorality was not known among them.

A great many agricultural implements were seen along the line of this railroad. The Doukhobors have been somewhat imposed upon by those who grind their wheat. The attention of the immigration agent was called to this.

In reviewing the condition and educational needs of these poor people, some suggestions have been forthcoming from several directions and many are interested in their welfare. We would however advise keeping them together on their allotted lands in the Northwest, and as anyone feels it right to go among them, to teach, that such should be themselves well informed concerning the difficulties of living there at the present time and be able to dispense liberally and wisely whatever they may possess. These Russians have not suffered as they have to be easily led about, and they have a strong preference as to whom they send their children and what sentiments are taught them.

A selection from the several villages of the most promising young women to attend school, centrally located, would be desirable so that their own people may teach as soon as practicable.

Eliza H. Varney and her cousin Nellie Baker have begun an excellent effort in this direction, and it is to be hoped that they will be succeeded by those in whom the Doukhobors feel as much confidence.

Eliza H. Varney has been closely occupied in preparing and dispensing medicines to the sick who have continuously applied to her since she arrived. So an improvised hospital and a satisfactory doctor would be among the greater boons at the present time.

If a teacher desiring to instruct the Doukhobors would become familiar with the Russian language a great step would be made helping them learn English.

The many mercies vouchsafed during their late journey among them calls for renewed thankfulness, and the belief in their ultimate prosperity is strengthened. The repeated expressions of appreciation from those who received the valuable supplies sent last winter inspired the Friends with confidence in the being both thoroughly worthy of the help generously given them, and wise in distributing the same among the most needy of their number. Any goods forwarded for them will be marked for the villages where relief is most needed, and by another season it is quite probable they will be self-supporting.

Donations in money should go to Wm. Evans, 252 S. Front Street, Philadelphia, as heretofore, while all merchandise may be sent to 8 Mifflin Street, Philadelphia, care of Jos. S. Thomas Elkinton, marked “for Doukhobors.”

A SIGNIFICANT SPEECH.—The Neue Freie Presse of Vienna tells of a curious and encouraging movement among a community of Russian Jews with its chief seat at Odessa. These Jews recently held a meeting to congratulate themselves upon the revision of the Dreyfus affair. A young Jew arose, and in an eloquent speech said revision of the Dreyfus case put the obligation upon all the Jews of the world to revivify another unjust trial, which ended in an unjust sentence of death and the execution of the victim—namely, of Jesus of Nazareth. The orthodox Jews present, it is said, protested vehemently, but a number of young men declared the idea to be worthy of consideration, and they have since formed a society who call themselves the “Revisionists.”—The Churchman

Johann Gutenberg.

Germany has just celebrated in a most fitting way the five hundredth anniversary of the birth of Johann Gutenberg, the inventor of printing, one of the most notable and characteristic of her sons. In the beautiful old Rhenish city of Mayence, the birthplace of the inventor, there was an exhibition of the best and the most curious which the printer's art has produced during the past five hundred years. There was an historic procession through the old streets in which the costumes of Gutenberg's time were reproduced. Hundreds of scholars and specialists in printing came from all parts of Europe to do honor to the great man's memory. No one can accuse the Germans of neglecting the memory of their great men.

It is impossible to state with accuracy the exact year of Gutenberg's birth, but there is strong reason for believing that he first saw the light some time near the close of the fourteenth century. His real name was Gensfleisch, Gutenberg being only his cognomen, probably the name of the place whence the family came. He belonged to a patrician family of Mayence, and his father seems to have been a man of political importance, for we hear of him as involved in the turmoils which at that time were rife between the Bishop Elector of Mayence and the guilds and burghers. With his family, he was obliged to fly to Strassburg, and it was in the Alsatian city that Gutenberg learned the arts which he was afterward to turn to such good account. He devoted himself to goldsmith's work, to the manufacture of mirrors, and to experiments in iron, copper and lead. During Gutenberg's residence in Strassburg, we get one or two glimpses of him, but nothing that is sufficient. He had a legal dispute with some citizens as to a certain plant in which he was interested, but of more human interest is a complaint made against him to the Bishop by a certain Anna of the Iron Gates for refusing to fulfill a pledge he had made to marry her.

This is all we know of Gutenberg until we again hear of him in Mayence, a man of married middle age, probably fifty years old. Mayence at that time was a great ecclesiastical centre, and likely enough Gutenberg had returned to his paternal city to manufacture goldsmith's work for the Bishop Elector and his clergy. But he must have had other views as well. While in Strassburg, he had his attention turned to the tedious processes involved in the printing of the "Donati," as the elementary Latin grammars of the time were called. His letters were engraved on a large block of wood, much as our wood cuts are at the present time. We do not know Gutenberg's processes of thought, but the idea had evidently struck him that this cumbersome method of production would be vastly simplified if movable metal letters were employed instead of engraved blocks of wood. In Strassburg he had set himself the task of molding these letters of various degrees of hardness, and it is evident that when he returned to Mayence he brought with him a considerable supply of movable types.

Gutenberg was always a poor man, and evidently thriftless. So on his arrival in Mayence he made the acquaintance of a certain Johann Fust, a fifteenth century capitalist, who for a consideration was willing to set up the inventor as a printer in a properly equipped printing office. Gutenberg, anxious to get to work, accepted Fust's offer. But the business association of the two men was a failure. Gutenberg could pay neither capital nor interest, and Fust was compelled to cast about for a more business-like partner, whom he found in the celebrated Peter Schoffer. Poor Gutenberg was deprived of much of his best type, and had it not been for the merciful interposition of a wealthy burgher, who believed in him, he would have suffered complete commercial shipwreck. He never, however, was able to get his head above water, and after two or three years of painful struggle, he gave up the contest against the powerful firm of Fust & Schoffer.

Toward the close of his life, probably broken down by cares and disappointments, he seems to have joined the confraternity of lay brothers of St. Victor, and to have led an ascetic, prayerful life. His friends managed to procure for him a position as one of the Elector's servants, a nomination which secured for him a new suit of clothes every year, and a sufficiency of corn and wine for his necessities. Once a year he went to the Elector's castle at Eltville to obtain his suit of clothes. He was over sixty when he died, an unnoticed man, and few of his townsmen followed him to his humble grave in the cloisters of the Dominican monastery.

It is to Gutenberg's association with Fust that we owe the celebrated Gutenberg Bibles. There were two of these, the first (1453-1456) with forty-two lines to the page, the second with thirty-six lines. Only thirty-one copies of the forty-two-line Bible are known to exist, some of them imperfect, and of the thirty-six-line only nine, more or less complete copies. It is not probable that the forty-two-line Bible was printed in a larger edition than one hundred copies. A short time after its appearance in 1456, a forty-two-line Bible was sold in Mayence for forty gold gulden, equal to about seventy dollars; and a few years ago in London a good copy reached the enormous price of nineteen hundred dollars. It is pleasant to remember that this old citizen of Mayence had felt the need of printing the Bible. It was this that spurred him on to his work, and we are grateful to him for the large share he has taken in enabling us now, five hundred years after his birth, to circulate this most glorious of all books in millions of copies in all the languages of the earth.—The Independent.

PICKING UP SLIGHTS.—She was a bright little woman, and when some one apologized for an occurrence at which she might have taken offence, she laughingly disclaimed any such thought. "I am honest, you know, and so I never pick up things that don't belong to me—not even slights," she said, merrily. "I don't like them any way, and I have to be quite certain that one is intended for my use before I appropriate it." So many people spend wearisome days and nights in nursing grievances that they have only "picked up," and in brooding over slights which were never designed for them, that this sort of honesty is heartily to be commended.—J. R. Miller.

"The Bible is not a book of soft speeches, but of hard duties, and the hardest duties are those which demand conquests which are interior, invisible, unreportable."—N. Y. Observer.

Day School and Boarding School.

BY ROBERT ELLIS THOMPSON.

The comparative merits of boarding-schools, in which young people live in a world of school, away from home, and of the day-school, which they attend while living at home, have been much discussed. It is safe to say that neither kind of school is better for all kinds of boys or girls. There are those who do better in the separation, for a time, from their home surroundings in their school life, and there are those to whom that separation is both painful and hardly beneficial. The English practice is commonly that of separation from home. The English boy, from the time he becomes too mischievous to be easily controlled by his mother, is a stranger to home, visiting it only in vacations, and living the life of the group of young people he meets at school and the university. Our American tendency is to copy England in this as in much else.

Undoubtedly, the life of the boarding-school is a great corrective of the relaxed family discipline of which there is so much in our country. The rapid growth of wealth in America during the last forty years creates a situation which is awkward for the training of children. Few people grow rich gracefully and without a relaxation of their habits of living, to both themselves and their children, which is unwholesome. It is when wealth has become a matter of course that it does the least harm to those who own it. The hero of Kipling's "Captains Courageous," who learns discipline on board a fishing-boat after being badly spoiled by an indulgent mother, is a case not wide of the fact. The life of a well-disciplined school, in which the boy must conform to rules, and is wholesomely stinted in money and leisure, may take the place of the fishing-boat to advantage.

On the other hand, where this kind of temptation does not enter into the boy's problems, and the discipline of home is healthy and bracing, the boy or girl will be much better for the daily change from home to school which is involved in attendance on a good day-school. The one is often a good corrective of the limitations of the other. School takes the young out of the interest in a limited group of persons and ideas, and brings them into touch with all the world of past and present. It enlarges the scope of their reading, and gives it a purpose and standards of judgment. It thus reacts on the family life more effectively than when school vacations are the only time that brings the two fields into contact.

And the school gains from the home. The influence of the latter tends to check the growth of those curious tendencies to a conventional standard of right and wrong which attend the grouping masses of young people in a community of their own. Its lessons of deference to mother and father make school discipline easier. Its atmosphere of purity is a help across the worst temptations of youth. The school should help to make the family life more valued, and the family should co-operate with the school, not only in keeping the young steadfast to their work, but in the development of character on its social side.

The question of temperament in children is one which must enter into a decision between day-school and boarding-school. The latter undoubtedly has the merit of curing much shyness, and of developing a manly self-reliance in boys especially. But it does not follow that every shy boy will derive this benefit, any more than that every weakly child will benefit by the "hardening" treatment which the doctors of fifty years back were so unanimous in commending. It is now seen that "hardening" sent many a child to an untimely grave, where a gentler course would have saved life. And in some children shyness is so deeply rooted that fine management is required to prevent its becoming constitutional melancholy. For such natures the best of remedies is constant and kindly association with others, but this often may be obtained in a life which combines home and school in the daily routine, and enables the shy child to take its troubles to one who understands it best, better than in the larger and more indiscriminate life of the boarding-school. Pitching a boy in among his equals in age, and leaving him to shift for himself, sometimes secures no result at all commensurate with the suffering inflicted. What is needed is discrimination, such as the best physicians use in dealing with the child's physical life, but which we are slow in learning to apply to its spiritual existence.

The selection of a school is the choice of a man. In no walk of life can so little dependence be put upon mere surroundings and apparatus as in this of a school. The whole history of education is the biography of men who have stamped their minds upon successive generations of youth. Garfield touched the matter with the proverbial point of the needle when he said that his idea of a college was a bench with himself at one end and Mark Hopkins at the other. The prevalent talk about means and methods of teaching is generally misleading, as it too often leads to the supposition that a poor and ill-developed nature can be converted into an efficient teacher by "pedagogic method." Method is good chiefly in proportion to the extent to which it removes obstacles to the free contact of mind with mind, and eliminates the mechanical and obstructive things which have come to us by tradition.

It is the man who has an equal interest in his subject and his pupils, and has the gift of reaching them, who is the greatest desideratum. It is the man who commands confidence of his students by the weight of his character, his kindness of disposition, his steadfastness in justice, his frankness in intercourse, and his loftiness of aim in the discharge of his duty to them. There are no keener judges of character than the young, and none who get more good or harm out of familiar contact with its various types. The man whom the father cannot respect is not going to command the respect of the child. The latter is going to get much more harm out of his relations with a vulgar or imperious or slothful or otherwise low-pitched nature, than he would at any less impressionable period of his life.

The schoolmaster pervades his school, under ordinary conditions, in both types of school. If he be unworthy of his place, the best his boys can do is to assume an attitude of resistance to his influence, such as hardly befits their years, and brings with it mischiefs of other kinds. Authority should be clothed for them in reverence, not antagonism. Of the latter they will get quite enough in their life as citizens.—S. S. Times

WONDERFUL.

BY JULIAN S. CUTLER.

Isn't it wonderful, when you think
How the creeping grasses grow,
High on the mountain's rocky brink,
In the valleys down below?
A common thing is a grass blade small,
Crushed by the feet that pass—
But all the dwarfs and giants tall,
Working till doomsday shadows fall,
Can't make a blade of grass.

Isn't it wonderful, when you think
How a little seed, asleep,
Out of the earth new life will drink,
And carefully upward creep?
A seed, we say, is a simple thing,
The germ of a flower or weed—
But all earth's workmen laboring,
With all the help that wealth could bring,
Never could make a seed.

Isn't it wonderful, when you think
How the wild bird sings his song,
Weaving melodies, link by link,
The whole sweet summer long?
Commonplace is a bird always,
Everywhere seen and heard—
But all the engines of earth, I say,
Working on till the judgment day,
Never could make a bird.

Isn't it wonderful, when you think
How a little baby grows,
From his big, round eyes that wink and blink,
Down to his tiny toes?
Common thing is a baby, though,
All play the baby's part—
But all the whirring wheels that go
Flying round while the ages flow
Can't make a baby's heart.

—Jewish Comment.

The Hermit of the Wissahickon.

Although his picturesque figure appears in various poems and romantic novels, the Hermit of the Wissahickon is no creation of the imagination. He really lived for fourteen years near that beautiful stream which winds through Fairmount Park, Philadelphia's great pleasure ground, and he sleeps in an unmarked grave upon its banks.

The loiterer along the Wissahickon Drive may chance to notice a park sign, "Hermit's Bridge." On the opposite side of the creek, shady Hermit's Lane leads to the Hermitage or Monastery; while, if curious enough to push his way through undergrowth he may be rewarded by finding the Hermit's Spring, said to have been hollowed by his own hands, and the Hermit's Cave, built against the hillside, and now only an arched entrance opening upon earth and rubbish. Here lived, some two hundred years ago, a learned man, a devout mystic, beloved by his contemporaries, but nearly forgotten by later generations, the Hermit of the Wissahickon.

Johannes Kelpius was born in 1673. He early became an earnest and brilliant student, graduating at sixteen with the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. He wrote several learned treatises in the quaint style of those days and bade fair to become a model professor in some European university.

But an undercurrent of religious dissatisfaction was strongly felt throughout the student world of that century. This Pietist movement, as it was called, led by Philip Jacob Spener, was largely the result of a study of Dr. John Tauler and Jacob Boehme, whose writings awakened a desire for an inward rather than an outward religious life. Societies of devout men were formed, but edicts, both of Church and of State, were issued against them. Fines, imprisonment and excommunication scattered the Pietists abroad.

Of the company of forty brethren, at once Pietists and Rosicrucians, believing in that mystic philosophy mingled of alchemy, astrology and the cabalistic meaning of numbers, who emigrated to America, Johannes Kelpius was a prominent member. The leader of this Chapter of Perfection, a talented astronomer, died on the eve of embarkment, and Kelpius became Magister in his stead.

On June 23rd, 1694, the band landed at the wharf at the mouth of Dock Creek, Philadelphia, where William Penn had landed twelve years before. The odd looking company, some clad in tow-colored homespun, and some in student gowns, proceeded to the house of Deputy-Governor Markham—which was probably the Penn house, on Letitia Street, near Second, which has since been removed to Fairmount Park. Here they took the oath of allegiance and explained the purpose of their coming before seeking their new homes.

A tract of land had already been secured. Along the Wissahickon they settled in various rude dwellings. A log building, called the Tabernacle in the Wilderness, was put up for their religious meetings. It was forty feet square—forty being one of those numbers to which the Rosicrucians attached a mystical value—and stood true to the cardinal point of the compass. On its roof was a rude observatory furnished with a telescope and other scientific instruments, the first astronomical station in America. Here some of the mystics watched every night, blending religious vigil with scientific observations. They were looking for the "Day of the Lord," the second coming of Christ, which they firmly believed to be near at hand, but in the long night watches they also cast horoscopes and pore over books of astrological lore.

Scattered about in the wilderness were the log huts of the Mystics. Part of one of these cabins, one in which Kelpius is said to have dwelt for a while, still exists as the foundation of a tenant house. The brethren cleared the ground around their little homes, and planted gardens of prosaic vegetables for the table, and of medicinal herbs for their healing craft.

Every morning and evening, meetings for prayer and praise and the exposition of the Scriptures assembled in the Tabernacle. Men of all creeds were welcome to listen to the teachings of the Brotherhood.

Though mingled with the oddities of cabalistic philosophy, the creed of the Mystics was in the main evangelical German Lutheranism. They were men of sincere piety, who taught the children and preached the Gospel up and down the new country around them. To the evangelistic work was often added a doctor's services, so their lives were not, by any means entirely passed in fasting and prayer.

But this is only the practical side of the hermit life. Whittier, in the Pennsylvania Pilgrim, sings of "Kelpius, maddest of geniuses;" and truly, his life was a strange blending of devout piety with "white magic."

Astrology and astronomy were scarcely distinct in those days. The casting of horoscopes was believed in by all classes. It is said that when Old Swedes' Church (Gloria dei) was built, Kelpius cast a horoscope to ascertain an auspicious day to begin the work.
 It is a matter of trustworthy record that when the three days' feast of consecration of that church took place, the mystics participated, chanting responses and playing on their musical instruments.

Anhangsel, which were astrological talismans, were also prepared by the Pietists; these were of parchment, inscribed with curious arrangements of astrological signs and hieroglyphic figures, were made at the culmination of some favorable star, or the conjunction of certain planets. Some were prepared on midsummer night and buried for a time under the ashes of the Sonnenwend fire, that fire kindled and extinguished with strange rites, which marked the turning of the sun on its downward course in the zodiac. Such amulets were deemed potent against evil spirits.

Brass seals, cut with astronomical signs and figures, were used to heal diseases by local application, being smoked over a flame and then pressed on the affected part. The application, to be efficacious, was accompanied with certain incantations. These seals were also used upon cattle as preventives for straying of the mystics.

The divining-rod, for locating springs of water and veins of metal, was often used by mystics.

Another exercise of their occult powers was in deciding the proper time and vein for bloodletting. It was held that the good or ill effects of this very common practice depended greatly upon having it done under correct planetary influences, and for this purpose recourse was had to the learned recluses on the Wissahickon.
 What is probably one of their peculiar astronomical instruments is to-day in a cabinet of the American Philosophical Society. It is an instrument showing the true time by sunlight or moonlight, the relative length of day and night, the orb's perigee and apogee and other astronomical matters.

But these mystics were not mere quacks, imposing upon a credulous people. They were truly believed in their curious signs and rites, and aside from their Rosicrucian theosophy, their doctrines were orthodox enough. They were cordial friends with the pastor of the Swedish Church on the Delaware; many of their quaint theological books are to-day in the Christ Church, Philadelphia, to which they were presented by one of the last of the mystics; and by all the denominations the brethren were sincerely respected.

The clearest insight now attainable into the hearts of these men can be secured by a study of the personal journal and the hymn book of their leader, Kelpius.

The original manuscript journal still exists in the possession of Charles J. Wistar, of Germantown, but a photographic fac-simile by Julius F. Sachse is in the collection of the Pennsylvania Historical Society.

This book contains seventeen pages of diary,

*Julius Sachse's valuable work on "The German Pietists of Provincial Pennsylvania," is the only complete account of these mystics, and to it the author of this sketch is indebted for much of her material.

written in Latin, followed by copies of a number of long letters; two of them in English, the others in German or Latin. Much of the matter is scarcely intelligible to the ordinary reader, the vein of mysticism is so strongly marked; the visions of the Apocalypse and his own rhapsodical interpretations thereof filled this man's brain, but the fervent piety breathing through the quaint and allegorical phraseology is unmistakable.

The other volume, the hymn book, is perhaps the more interesting. Its yellow manuscript pages, bound in leather cover, are in the possession of the Pennsylvania Historical Society.
 As frontispiece, a square of canvas folded in shows a rude oil painting of Johannes Kelpius.
 This portrait was the work of the last survivor of the band, Dr. Christopher Witte. It does not give a vivid idea of the hermit, but with a written description of him, as slight and tall in stature, with an affection of paralysis of the left eyelid, is all that we know of his personal appearance.

The book of seventy pages contains twelve hymns. On the left-hand page are the German words, on the right-hand page the English translation. In most cases the musical score is also given. The whole manuscript is in a small and rather peculiar handwriting, but the words are more legible than in much manuscript of the present day.

Many of the hymns are quite long, one contains one hundred and thirty-six stanzas, and the arrangement in "parts" suggests that they were intended to be sung responsively as the wonderful music of the white-robed monks at Ephrata, Pa., was afterwards rendered.

Some of the titles are curious. For instance:
 "A Comfortable an Incuraging Song Made intentionally for two lonesome Widows. But here, for common good something altered by occasion of a great Cold which seized one in July, 1706."

As a specimen of these hymns, one stanza is transcribed from the sixth, whose title is:

Upon Rest.

As I once in the Wilderness in Poverty had made me weary with Labour, October, 1697.

"Each day that springs—vexations brings,
 With certain Cares and Sorrow
 Yet shall the smart—not once our heart
 Be gnawing till the morrow:
 God's promise true—is daily new,
 To hearts in him abiding
 In his good grace—in every case
 We still may be confiding."

A stanza from another will show the mood in which the hermit looked forward to death which early sealed his slight frame. The title is:

"Colloquium of the Soul with its self
 O'er her Long during Purification
 Set in a Pensive Longing
 in the Wilderness
 Anno 1698 ye 30th Jan.
 "O Blessedest Dying!

Which break'st death no less!
 The wisht for Decaying!
 And end of Distress!

"Oh, break once the junctures of this turning wheel!

And shorten the Path which so tedious is still!
 And make the way straiter unto Sion Hill!"

The hermit was not to live till old age in his chosen retreat. Doubtless exposure and night watches hastened the progress of his disease, consumption. He was but thirty-five years old at death, but the exact day of his gaining "Sion Hill" is unknown.

It was a cherished belief of this band of mystics that if they were true to their theosophical principles they might be absorbed into the unseen world with which they sought daily communion without passing through death. An old account of the last days of the hermit relates:

"The Magister spent three long days and nights in praying to God, struggling and sup-plicating that in his case the Lord Sabaoth would receive him bodily as he did Enoch and Elias of old, and that there might be no actual dissolution, but that body and soul might remain intact and be transfigured and received in the flesh.

"At last, on the third day, after a long silence, he ceased his pleadings and addressing himself to his faithful famulus, said:

"My beloved Daniel, I am not to attain that which I aspired unto. I have received my answer. It is that dust I am, and to dust
 I am to return. It is ordered that I shall die like unto all children of Adam."

The rites when the beloved Magister was laid to rest were simple and touching. Just before sunset the procession carrying the bier issued from the tabernacle in the Wilderness, and, chanting the De Profundis, the brethren ranged themselves around the open grave.
 The coffin was placed over its mouth till the last rays of the sun fell upon it; then the body was lowered, a white dove let loose, and the brethren with palms outspread and eyes fixed upon the bird's upward flight, thrice repeated,
 "The Lord grant him a blessed resurrection."

After the death of Kelpius a number of his followers maintained a recluse life upon the banks of the Wissahickon.

A branch of the "Camp of the Solitary," whose monastic life at Ephrata, Pa., is so full of interest, built a monastery in 1737, a little distance beyond the old tabernacle in the Wilderness. It is quite probable that some of the mystics became absorbed into this later organization. Certainly friendly relations existed between the successors of Kelpius and this Zionitic Brotherhood.

Of the old tabernacle no trace remains, but the monastery is now a farm-house. Very near it is the tenant-house, whose lower story was once the cabin of a mystic. These, with the Hermit's Spring and the Hermit's Cell, which was once a room sixteen feet long by nine feet wide and eight feet high, but now choked up and overgrown, are all that are left along the banks of the picturesque Wissahickon to recall the days of the hermit.

Of allusions to him in literature it will be sufficient to quote only one, the characterization by Whittier in The Pennsylvania Pilgrim, which may fitly conclude this brief sketch of a remarkable man:

"Or painful Kelpius from his hermit den
 By Wissahickon, maddest of good men,
 Dreamed over the Chilfast dreams of Petersen.

Deep in the wood, where the small river slid Snake-like in shade, the Helmstadt Mystic hid,
 Weird as a wizard over arts forbid.

Reading the books of Daniel and of John,
And Behmen's Morning-Redness through the stone
Of wisdom, vouchsafed to his eyes alone.

Whereby he read what man ne'er read before,
And saw the visions man shall see no more,
Till the great angel, striding sea and shore,

Shall bid all flesh await on land or ships,
The warning triumph of the Apocalypse,
Shattering the heavens before the drear eclipse."

—Amelia H. Botsford, in The Presbyterian.

War and Superfluities.

BY C. E. STEPHEN.

From the earliest times of our Society its members have borne their testimony against war and against superfluities. These two testimonies have an essential connection, the nature of which has been clearly brought out by John Woolman, especially in his "Word of Remembrance and Caution to the Rich."*

"Where," says he, "that spirit works which loves riches, and, in its working, gathers the wealth and cleaves to customs which have their root in self-pleasing, and whatever name it hath, it still desires to defend the treasures thus gotten;—this is like a chain where the end of one link encloses the end of the other; the rising up of a desire to obtain wealth is the beginning: this desire, being cherished, moves to action, and riches thus gotten please self; and while self has a life in them, it desires to have them defended. Wealth is attended with power, by which bargains and proceedings contrary to universal righteousness are supported; and here oppression, carried on with worldly policy and order, clothes itself with the name of justice, and becomes like a sea of discord in the soul; and as a spirit which wanders from the pure habitation prevails, so the seeds of war swell and sprout, and grow, and become strong, until much fruit is ripened.

"Thus cometh the harvest spoken of by the prophet, which 'is a heap, in the day of grief and desperate sorrows.' Oh! that we, who declare against wars, and acknowledge our trust to be in God only, may walk in the light, and therein examine our foundation and motives in holding great estates! May we look upon our treasures, and the furniture of our houses, and the garments in which we array ourselves, and try whether the seeds of war have nourishment in these our possessions, or not. Holding treasures in the self-pleasing spirit is a strong plant, the fruit whereof ripens fast."

Every conscience will surely bear witness to the truth of this warning that luxury is the seed of war and of oppression; the earnest desire "to be disentangled from everything connected with selfish customs," must find an echo in every Christian heart. But what is luxury? we shall be asked: and how can we be so disentangled from it, as to be clear of the reproach of the misery which goes along with it? The problem is essentially a practical one, and the answer will be found by those, and only by those, who honestly desire to work it out in their own lives.

When we speak of the duty of renouncing superfluities, we are certain to be met with the objections that it is impossible really to draw a line between superfluities and necessities; that, in fact, what are superfluities to some are necessities to others; and that if we made it our object to pare down our way of living to the very utmost, we should have to become mere hermits, and to sacrifice to the achievement many of the good and useful purposes of life.

From these obvious and undeniable truths, many people, in our time and country, come to the conclusion that there is no sense or meaning in the idea of renouncing superfluities, and that what we cannot theoretically and precisely limit we may unlimitedly indulge. But the Christian instinct goes deeper than this. With or without a completely satisfactory theory, it is matter of familiar observation that Christians do, in proportion to the depth and fervor of their religion, experience a tendency to abandon the use of many things formerly enjoyed, and in themselves innocent. In spite of all difficulty as to boundary lines, and of all opposition from within and from without, there is in fervent Christianity a radical incompatibility with self-indulgence. There is a rising tide which lifts those who boldly launch out into the Christian life above many things to which they have formerly clung, and changes the current of their desires. Lower pleasures pale and fade before the Dayspring from on high, and pilgrims going to the Celestial City must needs leave behind them much of this world's treasure. Many things which to those whose horizon is bounded by this life seem necessities, become manifest impediments in running that race of which the prize is the inheritance of the saints in light.

In truth, the answer to all difficulties about renouncing superfluities lies in the fact that the expression is obviously relative. When we speak of rejecting "superfluities," we do not mean that everything should be laid aside without which it is possible to exist; but that life should be freed from whatever is superfluous (i. e. not conducive) to its real object. The necessity of a winnowing away of superfluities in this sense is recognized in every art. We say of a well trained athlete that he "has not a superfluous ounce of flesh;" a painter knows that the purity of his coloring depends upon his not laying on a single superfluous tint; the first condition of good writing is not to use a superfluous word. And Christians, as "pilgrims and strangers," should not encumber themselves with a single superfluous burden; that is, with any possession or pursuit which does not in some true sense promote their great aim—the glory of God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will towards men.

It is perfectly true that we can lay down no precise or invariable rule as to what things are superfluous to the Christian life, any more than we can give rules as to what is superfluous in art or literature. But none the less is the principle clear. Whatever does not help, hinders. "He that gathereth not with Me, scattereth." In this world, as we are continually finding out in all directions, nothing stands alone—nothing fails to produce some effect. Whatever adds nothing to the general harmony weakens it. Upon each one of us lies the responsibility of distinguishing in our own case between the weapon or the armour necessary for our warfare, and the burden which is but an encumbrance. We cannot make rules for each other, but we can, if we will, bring all our own habits and possessions to this one test—Do they invigorate us in body and mind? Do they increase in ourselves, and in other concerned in them, the power to bless and to do good? Do they really feed the flame of Divine love in us, or do they clog, choke, and impede it?

Seen in this light, there is in the idea of renouncing superfluities nothing niggardly, rigid or artificial. To get rid of encumbrances is not, from this point of view, more important than to use liberally whatever does really serve the great purpose of our life. We are not recommending an arbitrary or selfish asceticism but recognizing the inevitable result of engaging heart and soul in the Christian warfare. The spirit lusteth against the flesh now, as in the days of the Apostles; there is, and always while we are in this world must be, a strife between the inward and the outward, the permanent and the transitory. We cannot get or keep hold of that which is unchangeable without letting go what is perishable, for no man can serve two masters.

And we are not called upon to limit the freedom of others in this respect. For it is most true that what is a superfluity to one is a necessity to another.

Our natural characters and physical and mental conditions make some far more dependent than others upon outward help and comfort. It would be idle to propose one rule for old and young, sick and well; and equally idle, at worse than idle, to wish the scholar and the artist, the preacher and the merchant, to mould their outward lives on the same pattern. The surroundings which are needed to keep a highly educated man or woman in full health of mind and spirits, would be thrown away upon an agricultural laborer. Endless diversity seems to be as much the glory of the kingdom of heaven as of the animal and vegetable kingdoms.

Some again are providentially called to administer a larger outward domain than others and these, of course, may require for their peculiar service a comparatively complicated and extensive machinery. Without corresponding experience, it would indeed be an impertinence to attempt to judge what particular things make in such cases, be the mere necessities of life on a large scale. But the principle of eliminating whatever is useless and burdensome is, obviously quite as applicable (if not even more urged in its application) to life on a large as on a small scale.*

There is lastly a great variety of experience in this matter, depending upon our various stages of spiritual growth. What is necessary to the child is superfluous to the man. In this sense, superfluities may be said to be the things which we outgrow,—things, perhaps, which have served a very useful purpose in their season, which may even have been necessary for the full development of our spiritual life,—but *I may, perhaps, here venture to suggest that the whole question of domestic service seems to me to need, in this view, very thorough consideration, and a large measure of reformation. The hiring of a greater number of servants than we really need (involving, as it must, either the maintenance of a number of people in idleness, or the laying upon some of them much labor for things which do not really profit any human being, or most likely combining both these evils), seems to me to be one of the most prolific of the weeds which over-run and choke our domestic life.

*Journal and Works of John Woolman.

hich, like a husk or egg-shell, would inevitably cramp it unless thrown aside at the right me. Without undervaluing or condemning any of these helps to our infancy, we may yet rejoice as we perceive ourselves to be outgrowing them. What was necessary has become superfluous. What is this but the growth of dependence? No doubt all growth must be gradual. No doubt it is wisest to be very patient with ourselves and others, and not to hurry any process of development, lest we sacrifice vigor to precocity. But if we are really growing, it is impossible that we should not outgrow many things in which we formerly delighted, and in which we can still rejoice to see others innocently delighting. Every high aim demands the laying aside of lesser pursuits; the highest aim of all will assuredly not be less exacting. As we advance in singleness of eye and devotedness to the service of our Master, we shall inevitably find ourselves parting company with many of the objects which formerly occupied us. But we may rejoice in such evidence of our growing hold upon the unseen and eternal, without desiring to deprive those who still lean upon what is seen and temporal of any real prop.

The service rendered to the cause of peace on earth by the winnowing and sifting away of superfluities is two-fold.

In the first place, it is an increase of spiritual vigor. To have our lives severely and increasingly purged from all clogging and impeding luxury, is to go from strength to weakness; to become more serviceable and valiant soldiers of the Prince of Peace. For not only does growing strength and independence convert many former necessities into superfluities, but resolution in freeing ourselves from what is unprofitable, reacts with bracing effect on the mind. It must be remembered that this is not only with regard to expense that things may be superfluous. In the service of Christ it is not only money but time is redeemed from waste. Plainness and simplicity of living set us free from superfluous interests and occupations as much as from superfluous possessions; and the deliverance is even a greater one. Indeed it is obvious that the chief evil resulting from superfluous possessions is that they occupy time and strength in things not conducive to the real object of our lives.

(To be Concluded.)

NOT A FIRST-CLASS CHRISTIAN.—A college acquaintance of mine died not long after graduation. Just before the end some one said to him: "Harry, you are not afraid to die, are you?" "No," was the reply. "I am not afraid to die. I am ashamed to meet Jesus." He was asked why, and, with faltering breath, he responded: "Because I have not been a first-class Christian." Sooner or later to all of us will come the time for reviewing our Christian life and service. Oh, may we be spared the mortification of realizing, when it is too late, that we have been half-hearted, indifferent, inconsistent, second-rate Christians. — H. A. Tidgman.

WISDOM said of those memorable utterances of Jesus, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God" and "Blessed are the pure in heart." Such words belong to the greatest that have ever been uttered.

Who Knew Best?

"I just think it's too bad that I can't ever have a good time like other boys."

"What do you think keeps you from having a good time, Jack?" inquired his mother in a cheerful tone.

"Why—just because you're so strict and all that."

"What do you mean by 'strict,' Jack?" his mother asked, still unruffled.

"Why, you always want me to do something that the other boys don't have to do, or not to do something they are allowed to do."

"Who is the oldest boy among your associates, Jack?" queried his mother.

"Tom Frazer," answered Jack. "He's fourteen, and he's almost as strong as a man."

"And almost as wise as one, too, I suppose you think. Well, does Tom Frazer know any more than you do?"

"A whole heap," answered Jack.

"And do you suppose that when you are fourteen you will know a 'whole heap' more than you do at ten?"

"Of course I will."

"Well, then, listen. I am forty-two. Would you suppose I ought to know any better how a boy may have a good time than a boy of fourteen knows?"

Jack was silent for a moment, and then he answered in a tone which showed conviction, "Yes mamma."

"And don't you suppose that I want you to have a good time, as much as Tom Frazer does?"

"Yes'm, I s'pose so; but you aren't a boy, mamma."

"Well, your papa and I are pretty well agreed as to what is good for our boy, and he was once a boy, and I can tell you, for my memory is pretty good, he was about as lively as any in his time. He is forty-five years old, and don't you suppose that he ought to know more than Tom Frazer does what is good for a boy?"

"I s'pose so," assented Jack; but this time there was a slight ingredient of doubt in his voice.

"Well then," went on his mother, "if there is any who knows more about it than your father, whom do you suppose it would be?"

Jack thought a moment. It had always seemed to him that the wisest and best man in town was Colonel Hutly, who kept a large store on the main street and drove a beautiful pair of horses, so he finally admitted to his mother that possibly Colonel Hutly might know more about some things that his father did, because he had traveled all around the world and had been a member of Congress.

"Then would you be willing to admit that Colonel Hutly knows more about how a boy may have a good time than Tom Frazer?"

"Yes ma," answered Jack.

"Then," said his mamma, "I want you to go and have a talk with Colonel Hutly about it."

So a few days after, Jack rang the door-bell and inquired for Colonel Hutly. He was told that he was just starting to visit one of his mills, and when he came into the room smiling and holding out his hand to Jack, he at once invited him to get into the carriage and take a ride with him. Jack was willing to do so.

On the way they talked about the horses, about Colonel Hutly's steam yacht, and things in general; but when they came to the mill the talk at once turned upon the machinery.

"Do you see that wheel there?" asked Colonel Hutly of Jack, pointing to one of the swiftly revolving wheels.

"Yes, sir," replied Jack. "What about it?"

"Why," said the colonel, "that is a piece of machinery which I designed myself. Do you notice the way the wheel is running?"

"It is running the opposite direction from the wheels around it," answered Jack.

"Exactly," said Colonel Hutly. "I suppose if it were a boy now, it would feel a little lonesome, and as though the designer of the machinery had made a mistake and didn't know what was good for wheels; but suppose it should try to run the other way, or some one should try to make it run the other way, do you know what would be the result?"

"The machinery would break down, I guess."

"That is just what would be done,"

"Jack," said Colonel Hutly, "you know your catechism pretty well, I guess. Who made this world and all in it?"

"God," answered Jack.

"Then if the man who makes an engine knows what is best for the wheels and which way to set them spinning, don't you suppose that the great Being who could make the world and the people who inhabit it, knows best how to set a boy turning in order that he may have the best time in life?"

"Yes, sir," answered Jack. "I'm sure He does."

"And you're sure, too, I guess, that the best way to have a good time, is to keep running in the direction the great Creator of the universe started you and wants you to go. Isn't that true?"

"Mamma," said Jack, when he got home, "I won't say another word about your wanting me to do differently from the other boys. I'm going to try to run the way the Architect wants me to."

"Who's the Architect, Jack?" asked his mother.

"God," answered Jack.

—Zion's Watchman.

EREUNATE in John v. 39 is the original, which can be equally translated "ye search" or "search ye." Purver, in his "Essay Toward Amendment," says: "The present tense of the indicative mood, as du-Gard puts it in his Concordance, and the English translator of 1729, with Doddridge, render it; being also what Beza says pleased him far more than the imperative; and Gell says it appears by the context to be indicative, not imperative."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A session of the Cabinet at Washington on the 29th ult., considered proposals which had been made through the Russian Embassy there in which it is understood that Russia suggests the agreement among the Powers to maintain the integrity of the Chinese Empire, co-operate with the Imperial Government in the restoration of order, recognize Li Hung Chang as Envoy Plenipotentiary to negotiate a settlement of the demands arising out of the recent outbreak and withdraw all the allied troops from Peking. It is distinctly outlined in the assurances given by Russia that she has no ulterior purposes beyond the present settlement of complications. She is satisfied with the enjoyment of her already vast commercial intercourse with North China, which after the restoration of peace and the full operation of the Trans-Siberian Railroad, can only increase steadily and at a rapid rate of progress as time passes. She does not desire a continuation of war or disorder, and stands practically with the United States upon the propositions laid down by President McKinley in his note to the Powers of Seventh Month 3rd.

The answer by this Government reaffirmed the position taken by the President in that statement of policy to the nations of the world, and accepts the assurances and suggestions of Russia in full sympathy with their humane and enlightened purposes.

The United States Government, having acted upon the Russian proposition as to the withdrawal of troops from Pekin, is now waiting for responses to the notes which have been sent to various representatives abroad for presentation to the Powers.

With the United States, Russia and Japan favorable to recognizing Li Hung Chang as the representative of the Chinese Government for the purpose of opening negotiations, it is confidently believed the other Powers will acquiesce.

It is believed in Washington that the withdrawal of the troops will be responded to by the Chinese Government in the return of the Empress and Emperor to Pekin, and the inauguration of peace and indemnity negotiations soon thereafter.

Wisconsin produced 100,000,000 pounds of butter and 64,000,000 pounds of cheese last year. The butter was valued at an average of 20 cents a pound, or $20,000,000, and the cheese over 12 cents, or $8,000,000.

The largest raft ever floated on the Mississippi is on the way to St. Louis. It is 768 feet long and 256 feet wide, and contains 9,000,000 feet of lumber, to say nothing of sixty carloads of shingles and lath on its decks.

Complete official returns for the fiscal year ended Sixth Month 30th, 1900, show that 1446 vessels of 393,168 gross tons were built and documented in the United States. Since 1856 this record has been exceeded only twice—in 1864, when 415,740 gross tons were built, and in 1874, when 432,725 gross tons were built. Of these 1446 vessels, 375 were river steamers and 20 ocean screw steamships.

The flour mills at Minneapolis have produced during the year ending Ninth Month 1st about 14,500,000 barrels.

The Eighth Month just passed has been the hottest in this city since the records have been kept by the Weather Bureau here. There were 14 days when the thermometer registered ninety degrees or more. More than one-fourth of the 413 deaths in this city last week were attributed to the direct or indirect effects of the heat.

Owing to a railroad blockade in Argentine, Kansas, on the 2nd instant, it was estimated that there were twenty miles of cars filled with wheat waiting to be forwarded. Other roads in Kansas are unable to handle the wheat offered. All the elevators are full, and farmers are dumping wheat in big piles on the ground near the railroad station.

A Washington dispatch says: On account of the danger of the transmission of the plague here from Glasgow, health officials at all ports will be unusually rigorous in their inspection of vessels arriving from Glasgow, and special instructions supplementary to the regulations governing such cases will be issued.

The gross revenues of American railroads from freight amounted last year to $1,000,000,000, or about the rate of $1 for each ton of freight carried, a remarkably cheap rate. There are about a million and a half freight cars in use on American railroads carrying from fifteen to twenty-five tons of freight each. The policy of American railroads in recent years has been to increase the carrying capacity of freight cars, and to lengthen freight trains and increase their speed.

A year ago the records of a million dollars a day of exported manufacturers for every business day in the month was considered a phenomenal one; now a record of a million dollars a day for every day in the month is an ordinary occurrence.

America is rapidly displacing Great Britain as the great coal exporting country of the world. American miners are actually "carrying coals to Newcastle" by selling cargoes of coal in the United Kingdom itself. Other European countries, too, that have heretofore drawn coal supplies from the United Kingdom are now drawing largely on the United States.

The six largest cities in the United States, according to the last census, have a population as follows: New York, (including Brooklyn, etc.), 3,137,262; Chicago, 1,698,575; Philadelphia, 1,293,697; Boston, 560,892; Baltimore, 508,957; Cleveland, 381,768.

Governor Brady, of Alaska, reports that the natives along that coast and on St. Lawrence Island have lately died in great numbers, from an epidemic of la grippe, attended with pneumonia or measles. Officers of the Government are endeavoring to relieve them.

The machinery of the United States is doing the work of 1,000,000,000 men. To-day one man and two boys can spin as much cotton as eleven hundred spinners could have done one hundred years ago. One weaver does the work of fifty-four.

Direct telegraphic communication between the United States and Germany has been opened through the New German cable, in conjunction with the Commercial Cable Company's system from New York to Fayal and thence to Emden, Germany.

In comparison with some of the other sea islands of the South Atlantic coast that were abandoned by their white inhabitants during the war and given over to the possession of their former slaves, the island of St. Helena of the group now almost entirely occupied by negroes is in better condition, so far as its cultivation by them of crops of cotton and provisions and all that contributes to its advancement in the scale of progress, than any of its adjacent islands. To a great extent this favorable condition is due to the disinterested labors of Laura Towne and other intelligent benevolent Northern women, who settled amongst this people, opened schools and influenced them in various ways for good.

Nicola Tesla's famous invention for the electrical transmission of power by the use of mechanically generated electric currents has been declared supreme by the decision of Judge Townsend, of the United States District Court. The suit was brought by the Westinghouse Company, who bought the right to Tesla's invention. Millions of dollars are involved in the Westinghouse claims.

By the Hague treaty each of the nations to it was authorized to appoint four members of an International Board of Arbitration. Under this authority President McKinley has requested ex-Presidents Harrison and Cleveland to accept appointments on this Board. Responses are expected soon, when the remaining members may be selected.

There were 413 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 41 more than the previous week and 77 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 233 were males and 180 females; 49 died of consumption; 25 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 16 of cancer; 13 of diphtheria, and 11 of apoplexy.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, new, 103½ to 104½; 3's, reg., 109 to 110; 4's, reg., 114½ to 115½; new 4's, 133 to 134½; 5's, 112½ to 113½.

COTTON closed on a basis of 9½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.40 to $2.60; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.40 to $3.50; Western winter, straight, $3.45 to $3.65; spring, straight, $3.70 to $3.90; city mills, straight, $3.45 to $3.65. RYE FLOUR—$3.10 to $3.20 per barrel, as to quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 73½ to 73½c.
No. 2 mixed corn, 45½ to 46c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 28c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5½ to 6c.; good, 5½ to 5½c.; medium, 5½ to 5½c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4½ to 4½c.; good, 4 to 4½c.; common, 1½ to 2½c.; spring lambs, 4½ to 6½c.

HOGS.—7½ to 8c. for best Western.

FOREIGN—The number of the allied forces which took part in the recent advance upon Pekin is stated to have been about fifteen thousand. After the entry of the troops the looting of Pekin proceeded openly. The officers of every nation, except the Americans, ignored the repressive order, and the allies ridiculed the Americans for their abstinence.

From the beginning of the campaign the conduct of the Russians has been especially brutal, and many non-combatants, women and children, have been murdered by them in the presence of their officers.

On the 25th a parade of allied troops through the imperial palace took place, apparently designed to dissipate a Chinese tradition that foreigners could not enter their sacred palace and live. This invasion of their temple is understood to be a great humiliation to the Chinese.

W. W. Rockhill, special commissioner of the U. S. Government to investigate and report on conditions in China, attributes the late troubles to a deliberately planned movement on the part of the Chinese Government to expel all foreigners.

Germany's Porto Rican imports for 1899 amounted to 12,900,000 marks, an increase of 400,000 upon the previous year. The exports totalled 9,800,000 marks, an increase of 5,200,000.

Hamburg had eighty-two days in 1899 when the sun was not visible at all. There were in all thirteen hundred and sixty-seven hours of sunshine, or four hundred hours less than in Heligoland.

According to the recent census, the population of the Russian Empire is 129,200,000.

So useful are toads in gardens that they are sold in France by the dozen for stocking gardens, to free them from many injurious insects.

Another death, supposed to be due to the bubonic plague, has occurred at Glasgow, where ninety-three cases of the disease are now under observation.

The soil of Peru contains a large number of minerals. At the present time the number of mines in exploitation is said to be twenty-five hundred, employing seventy thousand workmen. The value of ore has increased by more than fifty per cent. within the last two years over that of 1898.

The coal famine in Germany has become very serious and a number of Chambers of Commerce have petitioned the Government for relief. The Prussian Cabinet has resolved to grant a modified railroad tariff for foreign coal in order to facilitate the importation of coal from the United States.

It is said that all arrangements have been practically perfected by the Taft Commission for commencing its duties in connection with the establishment of civil government in the Philippines. The Commission will assume the functions which properly belong to the legislative branch of the government. It is not proposed that it shall be in supreme control. The Commission and the militia will work zealously together to propitiate the natives and induce them to return to their peaceful avocations.

RECEIPTS.

Unless otherwise specified, two dollars have been received from each person, paying for vol. 74.

Geo. Blackburn, agent O., $14 for Anne C. Bousa Wm. J. Blackburn, M. D., Martha J. Cook, Mart H. French, Mary R. Fawcett, Stephen Hodgkin a John M. Stratton; Mary Reynolds, Ind.; James McColin, Phila., $12 for himself, Frances B. McColl Thomas H. McCollin, Charles Potts, Margaretta Reed and Benjamin Vail; Hannah F. Smedley, P. Anna M. Ormsby, Phila.; James Edgerton, O.; Margaret J. Scott, Pa.; Isaac Kiteley, Canada, $1.; Elizabeth B. Alger, R. I.; Milton Stanley, agent, Ind., for Joel Newlin, Nancy Jane Newlin and David Thomas; Richard J. Allen, Phila.; Milton Mills, Ia.; M. Hodgson, G'tn; Walter J. Buzby, N. J.; Rebecca Nicholson for Louisa W. Heacock, Pa.; James F. R. Pa.; Elizabeth S. Brinton, F'kf'd; William Stant agent, O., $16 for Anna Bundy, Joseph Gibbons, J. G. Hall, James Henderson, Charles Livezey, Mary Taber and James Walton, $4 (2 vols.); Anne S. I pincott, G'tn; David Wallace, O.; B. V. Stan agent, Ia. $6 for Wm. T. Spencer, Hannah Shaw Russel Z. Taber; Caroline W. Bacon, N. J.; Mary Carlsake, N. J.; Jacob V. Edge, Pa.; Thos. H. W son, Pa., $24 for Deborah G. Brinton, Sibella S. C. Lydia H. Darlington, Philena Hoopes, Ralston Hoopes, Samuel Forsythe, J. B. Jacobs, George Mellor, Deborah C. Smedley, Edward Savery, Thos. B. Taylor and Philena S. Yarnall.

Remittances received after Third-day noon will appear in the Receipts until the following week.

NOTICES.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—The school year of Third-day, Ninth Month 4th, 1900. For the admission of pupils early application should be made to

WM. F. WICKERSHAM, Principal,
Westtown, Pa.

REDUCED RATES TO OHIO YEARLY MEETING, beginning on the 29th, via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, have been requested, so that Friends desiring to attend can go for return for one fare and a third, or $15.50 for the round trip. More particular notice expected to appear next week.

CORRECTION.—In last week's issue of THE FRIEND page 50, third column, seventh line, read "ax" for "a

DIED, in Mariposa, Ontario, on the twenty-fifth Eighth Month, 1900, ELIZABETH RORKE, widow of Edward Rorke, aged eighty-eight years and eight months. She was a member of Mariposa Monthly Meeting, and a sister of the gospel for thirty years. Though her mind became impaired, her ministry continued to the end sound and edifying, which, with a steadfast love to the Truth, and an exemplary walk, gained her a large measure of the esteem of Friends; nor can we doubt that she, through mercy been permitted to enter into the presence of her Lord, whom she so long loved and faithfully served.—at Elizabeth City, N. C., Twelfth Month 1899, JOHN F. DAVIS, aged fifty-seven years and six months; a member of Stillwater Monthly Meeting, Friends, Ohio.

WILLIAM H. PILE'S SONS, PRINTERS
No. 422 Walnut Street

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, NINTH MONTH 15, 1900.

No. 9.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,

NO. 207 WALNUT PLACE,

(South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth),
PHILADELPHIA.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

NO. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

Responsibility of Our Columns.

A valued contributor's letter from a distant region, contains the following words of instruction and encouragement:

In writing these I have experienced the Master's promise, "They which wait at the altar are partners with the altar." Often have I received the many of peace, and have been myself instructed these simple openings of Truth.

As George Fox said, "Let every voice and every man be consecrated to the Lord's service," and I have thought that, much as we feel the blessing conveyed to us through Yearly Meetings' Epistles, such publications as THE FRIEND, a never-failing weekly visitor, true to its name, ever welcome to our roof, has no small share, like visits of ministering Friends, in bringing our much scattered people into the unity of the faith.

Webster's Spelling Book has the credit of giving the uniformity of our language during the early settlement of so many States and territories throughout so vast a country. We might have disputed this claim with the English Bible, until we reflected that the uniform spelling book gave its written English over the whole country to all that learned to read, while the reading of the Bible was limited chiefly to a fraction of these—namely, the religious.

A literary standard of spelling and vocabulary was introduced just in time to serve as a standard of unity for our language, and the further service of Webster's great Dictionary helped largely to confirm the security of one speech and one language throughout English-speaking North America. So that this land differs far less from dialects, than the much smaller mother-country herself.

The Author of our faith, even the Word of Truth himself, has recognized the importance of introducing from time to time among men, they were able to bear it, writings to serve as permanent standards for the perpetuation of his Truth on the earth, and these in the lapse of time being gathered into a volume of sacred Scriptures, and able to make wise unto salvation through Him, are "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." He himself, has as it were, acknowledged before all men the importance of a literary or written standard for the preservation, unity and spread of his truth and gospel from generation to generation, under the quickening of his spirit that gave it; so that, as between Truth and Scripture, a man does not get far from the one without getting far from the other.

Our Heavenly Father's employment of literature as his handmaid is no small encouragement to us in keeping this sheet spread before our people and others. But that it may be of any service at all, our reliance is on such infilling of his Spirit as he may vouchsafe. May He who of old indited Scriptures of Truth, own this periodical and use it, and help the agencies that would help Him make it up. And may every writer seek a sense of the acknowledgment, "I am the Lord's contributor!"

The multitudinous literature of our early Friends shows how alive they were to that which led them to pile up written offerings into a monumental mass of testimony for Christ as the Word, divinely speaking to each man of his soul's condition, and himself guiding his learners into all the Truth.

This mass of declaration and testimony of that doctrine and those fundamental teachings that alone give us the right to stand as a separate people, cannot, we deem, be gotten far away from by the whole Society without continually calling it back to a reminder of its first love and first principles; and serving to make it uneasy with the status of a mixing Ephraim or a prodigal son. May that uneasiness have its honest effect of recalling as many as will be recalled, to the standard which the body of our early literature so faithfully spells, and however antique the spelling, its concern for all ages is "not the oldness of the letter, but the newness of the Spirit," and this not the novelty of our spirits, but the freshness of that which is of old, from everlasting to everlasting, Christ Jesus, "the same yesterday, to-day and forever," the "Head over all things to his church," and to be waited for and waited on as such.

Either this, or the other turn of the "honest effect" of our principles as early committed to writing, must be for the uneasy to get out from under the name which misrepresents them. The recent tinkering with the name to modify it begin to confess this; but the honest end of non-conformity would be the assumption of another name, which our early literature could never be rising up to disown as our heritage.

Whatever our scatterings, a remnant remains, and we believe will remain, both in the dispersion and in separate organizations; and even if this appear as "a cloud no bigger than a man's hand," its overspreading by the Spirit may yet be mighty, and much rain of his Word again baptize the earth. To this end we would serve the remnant, and the true seed in all the bodies, that they may have a literary messenger from week to week conducive to "the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace," and some common epistle, as if communicants in the same household of faith.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Japan in the Lead.

An anti-smoking bill was passed in both houses of the Imperial Parliament early this year, prohibiting smoking by minors under twenty years of age.

An interesting fact, in connection with the passage of this bill, is that it was framed and introduced by a Christian Japanese (Sho Nemoto), who obtained the united support of his fellow statesmen not of that faith.

The latter even added to the age limit two years, changing the original bill from eighteen to twenty years, under which none should be allowed to smoke.

Sho Nemoto was educated in the University of Vermont, under the patronage of the late Frederick Billings, who said to him, "I wish you to be useful in Japan."

He reported to the House of Peers that children in the common schools of Japan were smoking cigarettes calculated to "benumb the nervous system and weaken the mental powers and thus give a death blow to the vitality of the nation. Therefore, from the standpoint of our national policy we must strictly prohibit the smoking of tobacco by children and young people, and further, it is outrageous for youths who get financial assistance from the national treasury for their education, to indulge in smoking."

He also said, "If we expect to make this nation superior to the nations of Europe and America we must not allow our youths in common schools who are to become the fathers and mothers of our country in the near future, to smoke."

"DOING the duty that lies nearest will ever bring us to the next duty."

Scattering "Deeds of Kindness."

"That's a Canadian dime. I can't take that," said the post-office clerk. The child looked at the rejected coin, and then at her unstamped letter perplexedly.

"Here's a dime—I'll change with you," said a young woman standing by.

"Oh, thank you!" said the little one, gratefully, "I ran all the way to get mamma's mail in time—and it would have been too late if I had had to go back."

"How thoughtful that was," I said to myself. "How few people, comparatively, would have bothered to do that for a child; and yet how little it costs—and how much it often means."

A little later in the day, it so chanced that I met again the young woman of whom I have spoken. It was at a restaurant at the noon hour, in a hurried, crowded throng.

"Dear me, isn't it warm!" sighed a flushed, nervous looking girl near me, to her companion.

"Won't you take this fan?" said a sweet voice. I looked, and lo, the speaker was the angel of the stamp! I was very much interested in the young woman by this time, and ensconcing myself comfortably in my corner took more time to my meal than was necessary, in order to observe her. I did not have long to wait to see another proof of her kindness and consideration.

"This is the last order of Indian pudding," said one of the waiters to a pale, poorly dressed girl, as she set down a steaming plate before her neighbor, the young woman whom I was observing.

"Oh, dear!" murmured the girl disappointedly.

"Won't you take this? I would exactly as soon have something else for dessert." Quick as a flash the dish of pudding was transferred.

"That young woman is worth her weight in gold," I said to myself as I rose to go. "I wonder when I shall ever see her again."

This time was at a reception. I wondered whether she would be able to do any kindly act in such a formal gathering, and observed her closely. It was not ten minutes before I saw her talking to a shy, unattractive looking girl in a corner, and introducing her to her friends.

These three brief occasions were all upon which I ever saw "the angel of the stamp," and yet how fraught they were with acts of friendliness and consideration! At the end of such a life how manifold must be the good deeds placed to the account.

The giving of ourselves because we can no more help giving than the flower can help unfolding its petals, or the rose exhaling its fragrance, that is Christliness indeed; it is the most potent of all levers for bringing about that blessed day "to which the whole creation moves."—Zion's Watchman.

THE VOICE IN THE SICKROOM.—Speak in low, cheerful, but perfectly distinct tones. If there is anything to be said which the invalid must not hear, go outside of the room to say it, for there is nothing which so irritates the sick person as whispering. A whisper is more penetrating than a full tone, and it rasps every nerve. Do not speak in a loud tone, nor talk about the medicine, the disease, or the food. Never tell anything of an exciting nature, and avoid all reference to what is annoying or unpleasant. If there is a jar in the domestic machinery, never let it come to her ears. It will surely trouble her, and may retard her recovery. It is of the utmost importance that all family troubles or vexations be rigidly excluded from the sickroom, and that it be pervaded at all times by an atmosphere of cheerful and restful peace. The one special qualification needed to get on in the sickroom is tact. With this allied to patience and gentleness the duties of nurse will be much lightened.—Sallie Joy White.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Sound Words.

(Continued from page 58.)

Why not use the term "altar" as some others do, to some particular part of the place where they meet to worship?

Because we have come to that "tabernacle" or "sanctuary" which God hath pitched and not man. In God's temple in Jerusalem, there were by Divine ordinance such altars erected, but Christ Jesus used not these when He offered himself up once for all as a sin-offering for the world. The altar on which He offered himself was the "Divine will;" and the offerings the Lord now is well pleased with, are those of his own preparing, "humble and contrite hearts" offered to God on that altar used by the Lord Jesus, "the will of God." It is the altar that sanctifieth the gift; but altars of wood or stone cannot do that, but, says the apostle, we are "sanctified by that will;" and this refers primarily to God's will as done by Christ Jesus whilst in the flesh, and consequently to his will as now done in us.

For like reasons we use not the terms. God's house, temple, tabernacle, church and the like to buildings made by men's hands, as it is not in these God makes his dwelling, but in hearts purified and "sanctified by his will." The church is built up of living stones, God's people, among whom He walks, and in whom He dwells; these are sanctified by his presence, as the fulness of the Godhead dwelt in Jesus, so the church is Christ's body, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all.

Do not many speak of the "Lord's table," "Communion service," "Holy water," "Extreme unction," and the like? It is indeed too true, they do. But to learn what these terms signify as used by them, we must leave the Holy Scriptures, and apply to the teaching of men. But having done so, we can never come to a certainty, for men themselves differ widely as to their use and meaning. And how men can of an ordinary Jewish Passover supper, taken in a private house, where bread was broken from one to the other, establish what they call a "Divine ordinance" like to one of those which under the Mosaical dispensation were truly ordained of God, how they can take these tables out of a private house, establish, what they call, but is never so called in Scripture, "a Divine ordinance," placing it in an outward temple, and an "ordained priest," behind it, administering, as he calls it, "the Lord's supper," on "the Lord's table," is incomprehensible to those who know and believe the Truth as taught them by the grace of God,—except as the "Jewish fables," which some even in the Apostle's days turned after, but which could never profit those engaged in these things, for the kingdom of God is not in "meat and drink," but "in peace, in righteousness and in joy in the Holy Ghost."

It is true the substance of these things, once dimly foreshadowed by Jewish carnal ordinances is to be found, but these "carnal ordinances" but cast a veil over this substance, like as they did to the Jew, which veil is taken away in Christ. This substance, the Lord's supper, is partaken of where Christ Jesus himself having knocked and found entrance to the contrited heart, there sits down with the humbled believer and gives to him heavenly bread and of the water of life, "a feast of fat things, of wine on the lees well refined," of which the soul eateth and is satisfied, as Jesus said, "He that eateth of this bread shall live forever" (John vi: 58) This and this alone is the Lord's table in the Lord's house; here He dwelleth and abideth For this we cry, "Give us this day our daily bread," and He provides of his bounty; nor does He ever forget the need of the soul to be nourished up unto eternal life as spoken by the prophet "Can a mother forget her sucking child? Yea, she may forget, yet will I never forget thee" (Is. xlix: 15).

God is a spirit. And we hold "communion" with Him in his own spirit, which He gives to us through his beloved Son, the one appointed Mediator between God and man. That God holds communion in spirit with man, or man one with another through eating and drinking, of "weak beggarly elements" which eventually all pass away as the dead refuse of the body, is not (nor was it ever taught by either Christ or any of his apostles) that "communion of the spirit" which the apostle so often prayed for in conjunction with "the love of God" and "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ." And these two latter might as well be reduced to outward carnal ordinances as the former, indeed one of them is not so done by them calling this "man-commanded ordinance" a "meal of grace." Here we see how unsound words lead to unsound doctrines and practices. An again to make all such things valid, and have virtue, all they who use the like substance claim that a priest, properly ordained, must be present as a mediator.

No minor things are these. They obscure the glory of the gospel of Christ Jesus, who came to redeem those who were under the law of carnal ordinances; "He took them out of the way" and nailed them to his cross; and I Paul He left this command to us Gentiles, who never by any law were under the like, "Touch not, taste not, handle not, which are all to perish with the using after the commandments and doctrines of men" (Col. ii, 21, 22).

As in the use of these, so in the use of so called "Holy Water" (which is, after all, but water salted and blessed by a priest) and "Extreme unction" an anointing of the body with oil before dying, we see in all, how these things make work for priestcraft, as the duty and prerogative of the priest alone. The Apostle John speaks of all Christians as having received Christ's anointing, and of its all sufficiency in all things to teach them God's requirements, which doing, they enjoy God's peace and joy. Of these the priest robs the people and at the last moment of life sells, and substitutes for Christ's anointing, his own elementary oil. Alas! I fear many like the unwed virgins will then have to go to those who sell and on coming back find heaven's door forever closed; for heaven's bounty is free to all who rightly come, without money and without price; nor need we go to men, and if we do, we are sure to be imposed upon.

When will men cease to make merchandise and sordid profit out of the things of God which He so freely bestows? In order to do so, man must first blind men to the fulness of God's gifts, and then sell something as a substitute therefor, but which utterly fails to do that, which the genuine grace alone can do.

W. W. B.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Some Thoughts on the Quakers in the Revolution.

BY ISAAC SHARPLESS, OF HAVERFORD COLLEGE.

This book, we think, has hardly as yet received either from the public press or the publications of the Society of Friends the attention it deserves considering its own merits and the character of its subject. With students of American history, interested in the period it covers, we doubt not, it has found its place as a side-light, showing in a great crisis and in a commonwealth where leading events were focussed, how a people holding Christian ideals of the loftiest character conducted themselves under distressing circumstances.

With the lay reader, and, we are sorry to add, with too many of the intelligent members of the Society of Friends itself it will be passed by, overwhelmed by the hundred and one historical studies of similar periods, unnoticed probably in the pressure of present-day interests, and thus fail of its undoubted message and prophecy. For, following in order and illustrating the same conditions and tests of Christian citizenship as the volume by the same author entitled "A Quaker Experiment in Government" reviewed in the two issues of THE FRIEND for Eighth Month 20th and Ninth Month 1st, 1898: we have here a study of one of the two great constructive forces in the foundation of the republic. This fact, we may add, with the sympathetic treatment accorded the subject, at once lifts it from the common place, giving the volume emphasis and importance. "The historical forces," says Dr. Mulford in his remarkable book (The Nation,) "with which others may be compared, in their influence on the people, have been the Puritan and the Quaker."* We have here a study on the Quaker citizenship, and the two volumes together make a solid contribution, not only to our denominational, but to our national literature.

The volume at the head of this column takes the thread largely where the former work left it—say 1756—and covers the rest of the century, the earlier work beginning with

*The rest of the statement is as follows, viz: "The length of the one was in the confession of an invisible presence, a righteous and eternal Will which could establish righteousness on the earth; and thence arose the notion of a direct personal responsibility which could be accepted by no external splendor, and could be shaken by external agitation, and could not be evaded or transferred;—the strength of the other was the witness in the human spirit to an eternal Word—an inner voice which spoke to each one alone, while yet it spoke to every man; the light which each was to follow, which yet was the light of the world; and all other voices were silent before this, the solitary path whither it led was more sacred than the worn ways of cathedral aisles. There was in this the revelation of the personality of each, and the secret of the power in which they have wrought upon the nation."

1681. We thus have a history of Friends both as regards their political and religious attitudes during the Colonial and Revolutionary periods.

We are unaware that anyone else has undertaken to tell the story of Friends in Pennsylvania during this time of over a hundred years, although somewhat ample material, we judge, has always existed for this purpose. In view of the success of this attempt we wish that similar efforts might be made to illustrate the history of Friends in New York, New England and the South, wherever there were Friendly communities during the same time.

And we wish it because now that the public mind is turning with special interest to the early formative period of American history from the distinctive features attaching to the American Democracy and its unique influence already expanding throughout the world, the character of the work then done by Friends wherever they were on this continent, their contributions to civil and religious liberty and their loyalty to the highest Christian ideals may be more generally known and appreciated. This book is distinctly the Friends' presentation of their side of the subject. President Sharpless has found his sources of authority largely in the records of Bucks, Philadelphia and Chester counties and our own Yearly Meeting, with much contemporary correspondence, public and private, notably that of Dr. Samuel Fothergill and other representative Friends in America and England. These sources are of undoubted authority, and now for the first time appear. Lacking, perhaps, in plan the general unity of the former volume, the present work is made up of ten chapters, the earlier four with the exception of the introduction forming what the author sometimes calls "Episodes," but important, as leading up to its second division, viz: the latter five, some of which constitute the real body of the book, and closing with the tenth chapter on Friends and Slavery.

In the three chapters in which the author narrates and discusses the "Preparing for the Revolution," "The Early Years of the Revolution," and "Quaker Suffering," we find the gist of the volume. These also are the longest chapters.

However isolated and distinct some of these pages may seem from the main topic the author has in hand, they all have logical connection with the subject of the book; are essential to its understanding, and are arranged to show with admirable clearness the part taken by Friends in the American Revolution. They thus illustrate them, and that too not inadequately, in their own words.

We can only, of course, touch briefly in the work upon a few points of special interest to ourselves, trusting they may also be of some interest to others.

(To be concluded.)

THE AGE OF ALUMINUM.—Nikola Tesla, in an article in the Century says: "There can be no doubt that, at a time not very distant, iron, in many of its now uncontested domains, will have to pass the scepter to another; the coming age will be the age of aluminum. The absolutely unavoidable consequence of the advance of the aluminum industry will be the annihilation of the copper industry. They can not exist and prosper together, and the latter is doomed beyond any hope of recovery. Even now it is cheaper to convey an electric current through aluminum wires than through copper wires; aluminum castings cost less, and in many domestic and other uses copper has no chance of successfully competing."

THE SECRET OF HIS PRESENCE.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

In the secret of his presence
From the hurrying world I hide,
In the secret of his presence,
Very safely I abide.
And He gave me a sign
Of his grace and love Divine.

Care and labor are my portion.
Toil and care till evensong,
But the hours, though often weary,
Never drag their load along.
For the blessing of the Master
Makes the heaviest burden light,
In the secret of his presence
When I dwell from morn till night.

In the secret of his presence
Any cross He bids me take,
Garlanded with sweetest flowers,
Wears the legend, "for his sake."
I am happy as I serve Him,
Happy as I walk the road
Which my Master went before me,
Straight unto the throne of God.
For He gives me many a sign
Of his grace and power Divine.

The Fatherhood of God.

To the Editor of THE FRIEND:—

Under this heading, a contribution to THE FRIEND of Seventh Month 28th, commences thus: "A correspondent writing to the (English) Friend of Sixth Month 22nd, on the above subject, asks the question, 'Do the writers (those who in previous letters repudiate the Universalist doctrine), really mean to contend that the thousands of millions of black and brown people who have never heard of Christ, and large numbers who have only heard of Him in connection with the devastation and ruin of their homes at the hands of 'Christian' soldiers—do they really believe that these people are foredoomed by their Creator to everlasting punishment from his presence and favor?'"

The word reprinted "punishment" is "banishment" in the "English," i. e. London Friend.

Parentheses ( ) having been used instead of brackets [ ], makes it appear that the words within them may be part of the letter quoted from—which they are not—and as if the writer was advocating Universalist doctrine, which from his own words I do not understand to be the case.

The contributor to the Philadelphia FRIEND, in his next paragraph, says: "Can it be possible that any disciple of George Fox really believes that Christ is only heard of or from, through the natural ear, or the human voice?"

... The Spirit of Christ taught the prophets beforehand of the sufferings of Christ." This may be intended to have no reference to the writer in the London Friend; but lest it should be so understood, I would point out that his words are, "people who have never heard of Christ"—not "of or from Christ. Friends hold that light is vouchsafed to all men, sufficient for their salvation; but they do not hold that all men are favored with the same degree of knowledge or Divine Revelation. "Are all prophets?" (1 Cor. xiii: 29.) When Jesus taught the two disciples on the way to Emmaus, "their hearts burned," "but their eyes were holden that they should not know Him" (Luke xxiv: 16).

The letter referred to is very short—only twenty lines, and though the writer handles his subject from the negative side, his utterances are not at variance with the doctrine of Friends. He is personally unknown to me; but as he may not see the Philadelphia FRIEND, I have felt it only just to him to write these remarks.

It should be explained that London Yearly Meeting this year agreed to an address on "Christianity and War," for public circulation. The draft contained the expression, "The Fatherhood of God," which was objected to by a few present, partly on the ground that the phrase is used by Universalists, and partly on the ground that only those who have given their hearts to God are his children. They appear to have viewed the subject from the standpoint of men's relation to God, instead of the relation of God to men. For "The Fatherhood of God" means that all derive their existence from Him—and more—that as He is love (1 John iv: 16), his Fatherhood includes a loving regard for all his creatures. It is no wonder, therefore, that a very large proportion of the meeting were reluctant to forego an expression so full of rich significance, merely because they were told that Universalists make use of it. The conclusion reached was a beautiful example of brotherly condescension: the objection of the few, though they are not very leading members, was acceded to, and the paragraph was omitted.

At a subsequent sitting, the clerk said that "he, as clerk, did not consider that action was in any way a denial of the truth, or otherwise, of the passage. . . . The thought of the Fatherhood of God was one that was very precious to us all, and the thought, too, that his love is over all, however far they may have wandered. . . . Not less precious was the thought that it was to God's love that we are indebted for the revelation of Jesus Christ our Lord. The two truths were perfectly complementary of one another. . . ."

A report of the discussion, from which the preceding account is abridged, is given in the London Friend for Sixth Month 8th. Eighteen letters on "The Fatherhood of God,"—twelve pro, including that now under notice, and six con,—were published in the next five numbers, from Sixth Month 15th to Seventh Month 13th, when the editor closed the correspondence. The last letter concluded thus: "The question is not the sonship of man, so much dwelt on in the correspondence, but the Fatherhood of God. The father of the prodigal was still his father when that son was wasting his substance in riotous living. The universal Fatherhood of God is quite distinct from 'Universalism.' To limit the truth for fear of consequences is not the way to promote the truth.*"

ALPHA.

*Justice seems to require our giving place to the above rejoinder; and hereupon we would foreclose future controversy on the subject in these columns. Supposing that in the English periodicals named above the discussion had been about spent, we were not apprehensive of our admission of the first article having the effect of reopening it here; and are now willing to propose that it shall not.—EDITOR.

War and Superfluities.

(Concluded from page 63.)

Greatest of all is the deliverance from waste of feeling which is effected when, and in proportion as, we learn strenuously to "labor for that which endureth;" when life assumes its true character of a race, a pilgrimage, a warfare; when we have learnt to recognize the importance of laying aside every weight, as well as every sin, knowing that our path is ever upwards. Thus in all directions we find that we must be freed from what is superfluous if we are to live with our loins girded and our lamps burning.

And, in the second place, to disentangle ourselves from superfluities is to overcome and to defy in our own persons that spirit of greediness which is (to use John Woolman's profoundly significant language) "the seed of war" and of oppression. If it is too much to say that there is no other cause of quarrelling amongst nations or individuals, we may, at any rate, safely assert that a very large proportion of all disputes can be traced to selfish claims and desires on one side, if not on both. If no one desired either to get or to keep more than his share of the good things of this life, how much occasion of war would be left? How many wars are there which can be shown to be in their origin and course purely disinterested? And can we be doing our part towards extinguishing the greedy spirit which leads to war, while we ourselves are clinging to, and nourishing a love of all manner of expensive luxuries?

Any testimony against war (or, indeed, against any other evil) is apt to be respected just in proportion to its manifest disinterestedness.

In former days, Friends, as we all know, had continually to suffer in person and in purse for their testimonies; and in those sufferings lay the secret of their influence. Most of the battles thus fought have been actually won; and Friends, therefore, have not of late years had much opportunity of giving these striking proofs of their sincerity. They have even been reproached with comfortably enjoying wealth protected by the sword, while refusing to take their share in the defence of their country. I do not say that the reproach has been deserved. But surely it becomes us to live in such a manner as to make it manifestly absurd. Surely those who feel it their duty to hold aloof from the sacrifice of blood and treasure so freely made by others on behalf of our common country, and who have even refused obedience to demands made upon them by the law, are bound to be very clear, not only in their own consciences, but in the sight of all men, as to their motives for such abstinence. That abstinence, to command respect, must be seen to proceed, not from any slothful unwillingness to encounter the hardships or the sufferings of war, but from a determination to risk the sacrifice of whatever can be protected by the sword rather than be accessory to its use against our brethren. Unless we do in very truth rise above the war spirit, we shall assuredly, in the eyes of others, if not in fact, fall below it. And if the salt have lost its savor, wherewith shall it be salted? In our refusal to fight, upon the ground that we are Christians, we are in effect claiming to be in this matter as salt to the national morality, and shall we be content to become fit for nothing but the dunghill? Yet a Quaker who lives in and for such things as can be defended by the sword which he declines to use, is certainly sinking below the soldier's level. It is not by sitting still in comfort, and talking about the "horrors of war," that we shall ever bring about the reign of peace on earth; that can come to pass only as a consequence of the triumph of Christian principle and Christianity is not for those who count their lives dear to themselves. It is the religion of the Cross, or else a mere name. It is as soldiers of Christ in deed and in truth, joyfully enduring hardness, turning undauntedly the left cheek to those who have smitten us on the right, heaping coals of fire on the head of our enemies, and overcoming evil with good that we can alone hope to make an end of war and fighting on earth. To fight under Christ's banner against selfishness means strenuous living and incessant self-discipline. It means that we should rejoice in our growing independence of outward things; and that if we have to wait for opportunities of active and tangible or definite service, the time of waiting should be spent in vigilant training and self-preparation.

*It is, I believe, well known that in our day the panics which tend so much to bring on wars, and to keep up the now universal enormous armaments (which in their wastefulness and in the immorality they lead to, are, perhaps, even greater evils than actual fighting), are largely brought about by those who have a direct pecuniary interest in exciting them, either for stock-jobbing or for newspaper-selling purposes.

The special value of this method of promoting peace through a denial of the spirit which leads to war is that it is practical, though no doubt indirect. It bears the peculiar and well-known Quaker stamp of witness-bearing, "testimony," not in word but in deed, and at one's own cost. We are in these days often tempted to go out into words and doctrine and to transfer to preaching some of the strength which used to be stored up in silence and spent in practice. The old method of witnessing evil was first to clear ourselves from it with scrupulous thoroughness, before attacking it in others. Clean hands and resolute firmness were felt to be of more value than a ready tongue in fighting that battle which is "not ours but God's." And it remains unchangeably true that it is by the purifying of each individual life through individual obedience that the actual kingdom of our Lord can alone be extended. In so deep a sense are we members of one another, that to stand clear of evil is not only the necessary condition of influencing others for good, and itself the most effective of influences,—it is the actual increase of the health of the body. In each one of us either the redeeming spirit, or the spirit which opposes redemption, must find a foothold, a fortress, a power; and no detail of life is too small to bear the impress of the spirit which has the dominion, and to minister to its growth.

This method of witnessing by personal plainness and simplicity against the source of war has, moreover, the advantage of being open to all, at once and continually. Many of us have but little opportunity of speaking in favor of peace where words can be of any avail, and some of us even feel little hope from any means on this subject. For in words there is indeed, but little difference of opinion as to the desirableness of peace. No one seriously denies it. The controversy turns not upon the ideal state of mankind, but upon the practical possibility of maintaining right without bloodshed. To some of us it seems idle to think that bloodshed can ever be prevented, or, indeed, that much good would be gained by its prevention, unless and until the spirit of strife and of self-aggrandizement is cast out by the spirit of beneficence. It is idle to expect that nations will voluntarily forego the objects of life until the gradual working of the spirit of Christianity shall have thoroughly leavened the lump.

But to this working we can all (women perhaps especially) contribute in our own lives and homes. Each one of us can throw some weight into the scale of simplicity and disinterestedness; each one can, in some degree, lessen the pressure of the scramble for outward things, in which the weak are trampled upon, by living for better things than can be bought with money.

And lastly, we cannot separate one "testimony" from another without loss of power. The Christian life is one whole—a spirit which must have the dominion wherever it enters, and which grows by its victories over all that would hinder it. We must go down to the root in this matter before we can be set free. Selfishness will not be cured by lopping at the branches. The strong man armed will keep his goods in peace, till a stronger than he comes and set the captives free. But we can welcome the strongest of all influences; we can open our hearts to the Deliverer, and yield all that is within us to his winnowing power. Where Christ enters, the love of the world is cast out. Soon might we expect a prisoner to cling to his chains, as that one whom Christ hath made free should wrap himself in weakening personal indulgences, or cumber himself with cares on an unnecessary scale, "holding treasures in the self-pleasing spirit," or "stretching beyond his compass."

Was there ever a time when the ancient testimony against cumbering possessions and the love of them was more sorely needed by the state of the world than it is now? Not war, but grinding poverty and its degrading results, call aloud to those who have ears to hear for a fresh revolt against the bondage of self-indulgence, for a fresh uprising of the victory which overcometh the world, even our death. Surely it should be matter of rejoicing to us all, that in the self-denying ordering of our lives and homes we can at once brace and strengthen our own spirits, and hold forth to our comrades the signal of victory, the pledge of the all-subduing power of Christ.

P. S.—[Third Month, 1900]. Since these pages were first published, the whole subject of war has been brought home to us in an awful manner, and the challenge to our Christianity of the day, it may be hoped, lead many to a clearer sense of the true meaning of discipleship.

The testimony borne by Friends against all war, has ever been a personal and practical, not a theoretical, still less a sweepingly condemnatory one. The spirit which has freed many of them from all that leads to war, and which made them steadfastly refuse, at whatever cost of suffering, to take any part in it, is not the spirit which is ready to condemn others, or to acknowledge "any virtue or any praise;" it desires to judge righteous judgment or not to judge at all; it is not discouraged by the slow growth of the Divine harvest; the peace it seeks is not a mere international concord, such as may consist with, or even be based on, injustice, but the peace of God which is the fruit of righteousness; and as regards those under a dispensation differing from its own, it rests in a quiet, often silent, dependence on the universality of the grace of Christ—the light that lighteneth every man that cometh into the world—redeeming and reproving according to what each one has received, not according to that which has not been made possible to him.

To see this light, and to grow up into this blessed spirit, each one in our measure, we need only to be willing and obedient. Our measure may as yet be a very small one, but the Light is a living seed in each heart, and must grow as it is obeyed—its growth no man can measure or limit; the fulness of its glory no eye hath seen.

Efforts to Preserve Some of Our Disappearing Mammals.

It is feared that before long some of the most valuable and interesting mammals formerly plentiful in our territory will have disappeared entirely, and no time is to be lost, if specimens of them are to be secured and preserved alive. This idea was held in view when the National Zoological Park at Washington was first started, and now it is to be carried out. Already the park has a herd of buffalo, and it will soon possess several Rocky Mountain sheep; but this is only a beginning.

It is particularly desired to obtain examples of the wonderful Alaskan fauna, which is so rapidly passing away. An expedition has been sent to Alaska for the purpose, and one or more walrus will be captured and shipped to Washington, notwithstanding the difficulties caused by their huge bulk, as well as specimens of the sea lion and fur seal. Sea lions have been kept in captivity before, but up to date no fur seal has survived imprisonment for any length of time. It is thought worth while to make the experiment, however, and an attempt will also be made to take some sea otter pups, though the natives of the Aleutian Islands say that these animals will invariably starve themselves to death in resentment of being deprived of their liberty.

Dr. Frank Baker, superintendent of the park, says that he expects no trouble in taking care of the walrus. There was once a walrus in the London Zoological Gardens, and it did very well indeed, seeming happy and contented. The walrus, of course, is the largest of all Alaskan mammals. It has been ruthlessly destroyed within the last twenty-five years, the method commonly adopted by hunters being to approach a group of walrus on the ice and, after picking off the most alert bulls from a safe distance with rifles, to slaughter the herd at leisure. The hide is utilized for boots and leather, the tusks for ivory, and the whiskers for opium pipe picks.

Dr. Baker hopes that his agents will be able to secure one or two sea elephants, notwithstanding the fact that these huge creatures are supposed to be entirely extinct on the Pacific coast. He believes that a few of them still survive, and, if so, there would be no special difficulty about taking them, inasmuch as they are the most helpless of animals—a fact which accounts for the quickness with which they were wiped out. They are only valuable for the sake of their oil. In the far South Atlantic, near to the Antarctic circle, is found another species of sea elephants, which, almost exterminated at one time, has again become fairly numerous through having been left alone for a while. The California sea elephant was nearly twenty-five feet long and had a long proboscis.

Already Dr. Baker is making plans for some of the great tanks in which he will place these aquatic mammals if he gets them. He is not less interested, however, in certain land mammals, of which he hopes to obtain specimens. There is in Alaska a species of moose, bigger than any other moose found elsewhere in the world, and in the same country there is a kind of elk, likewise larger than any other existing elk. Of both of these the expedition will doubtless obtain examples. Then there are two kinds of native reindeer in our arctic province, neither of which is represented in any collection of captive wild animals. One of these is the so-called woodland caribou of the upper Yukon, and the other is a smaller species known as the barren-ground caribou, which lives in the open treeless tundras. These wild reindeer have become scarce since the natives acquired breech-loading rifles.

Newspaper reports have already mentioned the fact that an effort is to be made to procure a living specimen of the Kadiak bear, which is much the largest species of bear in the world. Another curiosity badly wanted is the emperor goose, which is a bird peculiar to the marshy region between the mouths of the Yukon and the Kuskokwim. It is the most beautifully dressed of all American geese.

Speaking of wild animals, a very interesting new department is being made just now by the introduction of a course in fish-hatching in the study of the science of forestry. At first glance it would seem as if fishes and trees had very little to do with one another, but it is explained by those interested in this matter that the finny inhabitants of the lakes and streams of the forests are well worth considering in the problem of the conservation of the woods.

With this idea in view, the College of Forestry of the State of New York, which is a part of Cornell University, has newly added to its curriculum a course in fishes and fish propagation, and Professor Barton W. Evermann, of the United States Fish Commission, has been engaged to deliver an annual course of lectures on the subject for the benefit of the students. The college owns thirty thousand acres of land in the Adirondacks, and each spring this immense tract of wild forested land is visited by the juniors and seniors for the purpose of studying forestry. There, in the wildwoods, the lectures are given, and the young men are taught in a practical way how to hatch trout and other fresh-water fishes by artifice, a complete plant for the purpose having been established.

In the course of time these young men will be called upon to take charge of the numerous national forest reservations recently established. They are the men who will be sought after by private owners to manage their large forest properties. For the time has already come when business men are beginning to realize that our forests must receive intelligent management; and the forester must know how to care not only for the trees of the forest, but also for the birds and animals which inhabit it, as well as for the fishes of its streams and lakes. He must realize that forestry operations must not be conducted in such a way as to affect injuriously the denizens of the lakes and streams.

The attractiveness of any forest, it is argued, is greatly increased by the presence within its limits of lakes and streams of pure, unpolluted water, in which game fishes are found in goodly numbers, and by the presence also of game animals and song birds. Besides the economic value of the animals that are sought for sport, well-protected streams and lakes and the animals of a forest have an æsthetic value which appeals strongly to every sportsman and every lover of nature. It is obvious that the influence of men of wealth who are attracted for such reasons to the forest is of great assistance in the encouragement of the development of the forested region, bringing capital to it.

Lumbering and milling regions have been very destructive to fish life in lakes and streams. Professor Evermann says that he saw about three hundred thousand logs being driven down a stream in the Adirondacks, just at the time when the trout were hatching, the inevitable result being that the entire brood was destroyed. Grayling have been practically killed out of the streams in Michigan by logging, the spawning beds being destroyed by the logs scraping over the bottom. It remains for the intelligent forester to show how logging can be done without interfering with the natural propagation of the fishes.

Interest in the preservation of wild game animals, whether fishes, game or mammals, is greater at the present time in this country than it has ever been before. The League of American Sportsmen is making a vigorous fight in behalf of the new crusade, and all over the United States the movement is gaining ground. It is believed that this new departure by Cornell University will have an important influence in the same direction. Professor Evermann's lectures embrace observations on the life histories of the important species of food and game fishes, their artificial propagation and their protection; the relation of the forest to the streams and lakes and their inhabitants, and also to the value and protection of the mammals and birds of the forest.—Rene Bache, in Boston Transcript.

MARIABELLA FARMBOROUGH was convinced of the Truth in the year 1670, at a meeting of Friends which was held in the street, they being kept out of their house. She was remarkable for being early at meeting, saying she loved to be one of the two or three early there. She died in her eighty-third year; a little before her departure, said, her day's work was done, and that she had not overdone, neither left undone, what God had required of her, according to the best of her knowledge. P. H.

A GODLY man was told of the tremendous speed of the heavenly bodies. "I know," said he, "of one thing that is quicker. It is the answer of God to the prayer of faith, for it is written, 'Before they call I will answer, and while they are yet speaking I will hear.' The soul that casts itself on God travels faster than the light."

Doukhobor Notes.

A letter received from Eliza H. Varney, under date of Seventh Month 30th, 1900, informed that she and her cousin, Nellie Baker, arrived at the residence of Robert and Elizabeth Buchanan, Good Spirit Lake, on the twenty-sixth of that month, and found them away from home; but their house was in charge of Constance Lazaroff, (a Doukhobor), and his wife, by whom they were very kindly received, lodged and entertained the following night and day; after which Eliza and her cousin boarded themselves in a tent that had been provided for them at the instance of the Immigration Commissioner. Another tent was also furnished for school purposes. Nine children came the first afternoon, sixteen the next day, and at the time of writing there were thirty-four; about as many girls as boys; their progress was surprising, some of the children speaking English so as to be understood. Robert and Elizabeth Buchanan were greatly encouraged at what they saw upon their return home, and were disposed to do what they could to help in the work. E. H. Varney wrote she had been very sick at Fox Warren, where she stopped over on her way to Yorkton with a relative, but she had regained her strength sufficiently to resume the prosecution of her plans,—starting the school, visiting the homes, ministering to the sick, and meeting with the Doukhoborts, whose tenderness of spirit and gratitude at the prospect of having some instruction given their children, was very marked.

From Yorkton, under date of Eighth Month 15th, E. H. Varney writes that a second school tent had been granted, and there were forty-six scholars. She noted a satisfactory visit of a day or two from May Fitzgibbons who had a Russian woman for interpreter; they were apparently well pleased with the school. They had also had visits from several of the teachers of country schools round about. Quite a disaster overtook them, however, during a severe storm. The tents were blown down and some of the contents destroyed. The heavy rain obliged E. H. Varney and her cousin to retreat into the house of Robert Buchanan, where they were received and cared for while the tents were re-erected by Robert Buchanan and his men. Since the rain they had had fire in the school tent, and the children were quite comfortable.

The rain was reported to have helped the crops, which were better than they had expected; the flax good, wheat fine and ripe enough to cut, and they were very busy harvesting.

Having been favored with the use of a team and a Doukhobor driver, the travelling among the neighboring villages was greatly facilitated.

Letter from A. V. Virigin.

VILLAGE POTERPIEVSHY, August 12, 1900.

Beloved Elders, Joseph Elkinton and the other Elder, whose name is unknown to me:—

I am your sister, Anastasia Vasilievna Virigin, from the bottom of my heart greeting you, and wishing you all the blessings of God in the world.

The same greeting is sent to you by all our brothers and sisters with their best wishes unto you. May God save you in his eternal salvation, for your love toward us, and that you do not forget us. Our dear Elders, we would like to know about your journey, and about your safe arrival home to your relatives. Are you well, and how did God care over your lives. Give our love and affection to all brothers and sisters by Christ.

Dear Elders, when you were here you asked us to send you a copy of the letter received from Peter Vasilievitch Virigin, [In Siberia], and we send it to you accordingly.

VILLAGE OBDORSK.

"God will help you beloved brothers and sisters, and He will lead you into a good life. congratulate you upon your new settlement and from all my soul I wish you all the blessings.

"Your letter of the 25th of December, 1899 I received. I thank you all, brothers and sisters, heartily, for your remembrance and good wishes. I am well and happy, thank God. greet you in return and wish you a Happy Christmas. Now the day of celebrating the entrance of a new spirit in man through the resurrection of Christ, is not far off. I wish I were with you, to suffer and bear with you all the privations of your new life. God merciful, and may He will grant me the privilege of visiting you.

"Pray unto God and He will help you. I am also grateful to all those people whom God sends to you to assist you. Give from me to all your friends in America my sincere and hearty thanks.

"This is my second letter I send to America. One I sent to Nurse, did she get it? If the letter reaches you write to me."

Loving you, your brother by Christ,

PETER.

His address is, Government of Tobolsk, Village Obdorsk, Peter Virigin.

WONDERS OF SANSCRIT.—Only within the last century has the world discovered the priceless treasures of the ancient Sanscrit literature which for centuries was buried in the archives of India. The latest addition to the "Literature of the World" series is "A History of Sanscrit Literature" by Arthur A. McDonaugh, professor of Sanscrit in the University of Oxford (published by the Appletons', New York). The discovery of the Sanscrit literature and language was made by the western world about one hundred years ago, although it can be added that many, if not all, of the ideas contained in it had been transmitted by word of mouth in secret organizations before that. In many years Europe was skeptical about the existence of such a literature, because a book entitled "The Ezour Bedam" which turned out to be but the forgery of a Jesuit, was foisted on Europe as genuine Sanscrit work. So argued that the whole Sanscrit literature was a skillful forgery made by the Brahmans of India on the Greek model after Alexander's conquest. Warren Hastings, the famous English governor-general of Bengal, gave the first impetus to a study of Sanscrit by ordering a number of Brahmans to prepare a digest of the laws of India from the best records. This was in 1776. In 1785 Charles Wilkins' translation of the "Bhadavad Gita" or "The Song of the Adorable One" was published and promptly followed by other Sanscrit classics. Henceforth the greatest compilation of Sanscrit literature has been made by Professor Müller, the famous English philologist.—P. Virinder.

MIZPAH.

Lord watch between thee and me when we are absent one from another (Gen. xxxi: 49.)
 never used this word while thou and I Walked close together in life's working way.
 ere was no need of it while hand and eye might meet content and faithful every day.
 t now with anguish from a stricken heart, Mizpah I cry, the Lord keep watch between
 y life and mine that death hath riven apart.
 Thy life beyond the awful veil unseen
 d my poor orphaned being which must glide
 Through ways familiar to us both till death,
 All of a surety lead me to thy side
 Beyond the changes of our mortal birth.
 pah! Yea, love, in all my bitter pain, trust God keepeth watch betwixt us twain.
 e lips are still, from which I used to hear strong words of counsel, tender words of praise.
 or, I must go my way without the cheer and sunshine of thy presence all my days.
 God keep watch my ways and days upon n all I do, on all I bear for thee.
 work is left me though my mate is gone.
 A solemn trust hast thou bequeathed to me,
 ke the task thy weary hand laid down hat winter evening for my own alway
 l may the Giver of both cross and crown rounounce me faithful at our meeting day.

Christians and War.

War is not an isolated fact, but a link in a well-defined chain of cause and effect. To live selfish, worldly, base, ignoble purposes, and to shrink from war because of its cost and cruelty, is cowardice, not Christianity. The peacable kingdom of Christ is not so impracticable as it appears to many. It is no more reasonable to deride the friends of peace when quarrel has broken out between nations, ask how they would settle it without recourse to war, than it would be to deride a surgeon ordered upon to operate only when mortification already set in and declining to do so. The operation is too late, Christians are merely bidden to fight.
 They are to live in the spirit in which wars and fightings are impossible. They are not to show they would settle a quarrel without fighting: they are not to quarrel.
 The followers of Christ are to be loving, meek, forgiving, bearing wrong rather than exacting it, forestalling injury with service. If anything else will serve, they are patiently to endure the spite of their enemies. This may seem feeble and ignoble; it is, in truth, the most powerful weapon in the world. Nothing can overcome a steady, well-grounded, loving, loving resistance.
 War may kill your enemies; love turns them into friends.
 During the rebellion of 1798 Irish Friends were in constant danger, but they in no way had contact with the soldiery or the United States men; they even incurred grave risk by interference to prevent cruelty, to plead for mercy, and to bring about a spirit of forbearance. In 1801, Dublin Yearly Meeting renewed its sense of thankfulness:
 That, amidst the carnage and destruction which frequently prevailed in some parts, and notwithstanding the jeopardy in which some of us stood every hour, and that they had frequently to pass through violent and enraged mobs, in going to and returning from our religious meetings (which with very few exceptions were constantly kept up), that the lives of the members of our Society were so signally preserved."

 And again, the same Meeting, in an Epistle to Philadelphia, writes:
 "In some places Friends did not know but that every day would be their last, seeing and hearing of so many of their neighbors being put to death," and it was the cause of grateful acknowledgment "that no member of our Society fell a sacrifice in that way but one young man."
 This young man put on a uniform, took refuge with the soldiers, and was killed.
 Did they resist the forces of either side? No. When disturbance was foreseen they took the precaution to destroy their guns or any other weapons, and the Meeting saw that it was done; it was consequently soon known that a Quaker's house contained no arms, and they escaped annoying search. Would they willingly yield their premises for military use? On the contrary, they would fearlessly tell the commander that they had conscientious objection to war and everything that promoted or countenanced it, and when he became angry and ordered his men to afford no protection, reply that they would not trust to, or apply for, military protection.
 Would they yield their faith? Not to escape ill treatment, or even to save their lives. One family received notice from the rebels that unless they gave up meetings and became Roman Catholics they would be killed and their house burned. Again and again they were threatened. Preparations were begun for the execution, but a higher Power restrained the leaders; they were left in peace.
 Another family was threatened in like manner; the rebels went away and returned; there was still no yielding. A rope was placed around the neck of the head of the family, and it was tied to a beam, when alarm was given that the soldiers were coming, and the rebels ran away. Not one jot or one tittle of their principles would they abate; meetings were regularly attended; good and kind deeds were done in pleading for mercy for wives and children of rebels, and for restraint of cruelty on both sides; accusations of hindering justice and meddling were freely made, but quite persistent exercise of the spirit of love and Christian kindness eventually gave influence, and won the confidence of both sides.
 Finally, let us quote the testimony of a Friend who resided at Moate, County Westmeath:
 "I could with wonder, love and praise relate some marvellous deliverances mercifully vouchsafed to me when surrounded by numerous, and at other times by smaller bodies of armed men in open rebellion, and when no other human being was near; yet through Divine aid, and that alone, I was enabled to refuse to take up arms, or take their oaths, or join them, assigning as a reason that I could not fight nor swear for or against them. They threatened, they pondered, they debated, marvelled, and ultimately liberated me, though they said I was in the power of many thousands then assembled."
 To these dear Friends in the midst of tribulation there was no question of "defensive" war, or whether it was "avoidable" or "justifiable" or "necessary;" it was a question of faithful allegiance to principle. They were Christians, and therefore they could not fight; their hands were clean from the blood of men. In time of invasion the citizen has choice of entering Government service or remaining neutral; he cannot "go to war at his own charges." The Christian must decide in his own heart where true service lies—"the kingdom of God is within you."

 The irony of two Christian nations rushing into a fierce struggle almost before the Peace Conference had closed is indeed bitter. But the task of the Christian is not hopeless. All movements profoundly affecting the social conditions of people are slow—that towards peace not slower than others. Wars of extermination have ceased in civilized countries. The fury and cruelty of mediæval wars are inconceivable to us. Armed peace may be bad; the chronic wars, lasting generations, were infinitely worse. There is every hope that international wars are following the feudal and dynastic wars of the past, and that nations will in time seek redress in courts of law and equity as naturally as individuals and corporations do now. Let every follower of Christ steadily set his face towards this end, laboring by voice and prayer to hasten its advent.—T. P. Newman, in Friends' Quarterly Examiner.

THE GROWTH OF HAIR.—Dr. Pohl, a German, has for some years been investigating hair growths. He finds that cutting off hair checks its growth for about a month, after which the normal rate of growth returns. The average growth is about half an inch a month at the age of fifteen years; three-fifths at twenty years and two-fifths at sixty. In insane persons the rate of growth is less than normal. A curious discovery was that each two to four hairs form a distinct group, in which one takes the lead in growth for a time, then the second and so on in continuous rotation, and that the hairs reach a regular life limit and fall out in similar succession in each group. The same singular phenomena were found in the hair on the back of the fingers. The life period of a hair is two to six years, in which time it grows twenty to forty inches, the most rapid growth being in the middle of the period.

THE custom of sin often takes away the sense of it.—S. Crisp.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A hurricane of unusual severity has been raging during the past few days in and near the shores of the Gulf of Mexico. It has wrought great destruction upon the coast of Texas, and for many miles inland, where the ground is but a few feet above sea-level. The city of Galveston, with a population of about 38,000, stands on an island, no part of which is more than six feet above the sea, and accounts state that the inundation of this island and surrounding country has swept away thousands of buildings and caused the loss of thousands of lives. Owing to the destruction of means of communication with this and other places, in the path of the storm, but meagre information respecting the great damage done has yet been obtained.
 The Chinese Minister at Washington has received an imperial edict conferring on Li Hung Chang extraordinary power for the complete settlement of the Chinese trouble. It gives him authority to make any terms according to his own discretion without referring them to the Emperor. It is believed that the authorities in Washington will act upon the questions involved, if not in concert with European nations, then upon its own account.
 A convention met in New York on the 5th instant, and organized under the name of the National party, adopted a platform of principles and nominated as candidates, for President, Donelson Caffrey, Louisiana; for vice-president, Archibald Murray Howe, Cambridge, Mass. Its objects are thus expressed: "Convinced that the extension of the jurisdiction of the United States for the purpose of holding foreign people as colonial dependencies is an innovation dangerous to our liberties and repugnant to the principles upon which our Government is founded, we pledge our efforts through all constitutional means: First—to procure the renunciation of all imperial or colonial pretensions with regard to foreign countries claimed to have been acquired through or in consequence of military or naval operations of the last two years. Second—We further pledge our efforts to secure a single gold standard and a sound banking system. Third—to secure a public system based on merit only. Fourth—to secure the abolition of all corrupting special privileges, whether under the guise of subsidies, bounties, undeserved pensions or trust breeding tariffs."

A decision of a Bradford County (Pa.) Court in a case where the compulsory education law and the act requiring school children to be vaccinated, came in conflict, affirms that the vaccination law is not mandatory, but optional.

The population of the city of Trenton, N. J., as officially announced, is, 1900, 73,307; 1890, 57,458.

Hawaii has closed its last school for teaching the native language. Hereafter young Hawaiians will be taught to talk English.

The Department of Agriculture has issued a report on investigations of the big trees of California. It shows that the dimensions of the big trees are unequalled; that their age make them the oldest living things. They are described by the report as "the grandest, largest, oldest and most majestically graceful of trees" and "the scarcest of known tree species, with the extreme scientific value of being the best living representative of a former geologic age." The report says the bark of the big tree often is two feet thick and almost non-combustible. "The oldest specimens felled," it says, "are still sound at the heart and fungus is an enemy unknown to it. The majority of the big trees of California, certainly the best of them, are owned by people who have every right and in many cases every intention, to cut them into lumber." The only place in the world where the big tree exists is in ten isolated groves on the west slope of the Sierra Nevada Mountains. The southern groves show some reproductions, through which there is hope of perpetuating these groves. In the northern groves the species hardly holds its own.

It is said that there are to-day but three bands of Seminoles left in Florida. So completely have these people been disintegrated that no tribal relations now exist among them. They have no acknowledged chief. They number about 600.

According to the eighty-fourth annual report of the American Bible Society, the total issues of the Bible at home and abroad for the year were 1,406,801 copies. Of these, 832,497 were distributed outside of the United States. In China, 661,200 copies were distributed. In the eighty-four years' work of the society 67,369,306 copies have been issued.

An estimate of the rice acreage in Eastern Texas this year places it at 30,000. President McKinley has made the following statement respecting the policy of the administration in the Philippines: "It is our purpose to establish in the Philippines a government suitable to the wants and conditions of the inhabitants, and to prepare them for self-government, and to give them self-government when they are ready for it and as rapidly as they are ready for it. That I am aiming to do under my constitutional authority, and will continue to do until Congress shall determine the political status of the inhabitants of the archipelago."

The number of United States troops in Cuba has been reduced from 43,000 to less than 6,000.

Ex-President Cleveland has declined the President's appointment as a member of the International Board of Arbitration under the Hague Treaty. Ex-President Harrison has accepted.

Statistics respecting the commerce of the Great Lakes show that not only is the business carried on the lakes greater during the present season than on any other occasion, but for the first time its details are being accurately measured and the facts presented from month to month to those interested in those details.

The census returns from Porto Rico show that the males of voting age number 201,071, and but 3.8 per cent. are of foreign birth. Of the white persons of Porto Rican birth 29.4 per cent. can read or write, while 17.2 per cent. of the colored population are literate. Under the educational qualification the number entitled to vote in the island would be 47,973, or 25 per cent. of native born males of voting age, restricting the suffrage to about one-fourth of the adult males.

The census bureau had tabulated the returns from fifty-four cities. These show a population of 14,644,711. This is an average increase in population per city of 27.90 per cent. The same cities in 1890 had a population of 11,150,045, making a total gain of 3,494,666.

The Vanderbilt system of railways is now the largest in the world, covering 10,410 miles, against 10,392 of the Pennsylvania and 10,018 of the Canadian Pacific.

There were 370 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 43 less than the previous week and 35 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 188 were males and 182 females: 45 died of consumption; 53 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 14 of apoplexy; 11 of diphtheria, and 11 of cancer.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, new, 103 $\frac{3}{4}$  to 104 $\frac{1}{4}$ ; 3's, reg., 109 to 110; 4's, reg., 114 to 115; new 4's, 133 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 134 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; 5's, 112 $\frac{3}{4}$  to 113 $\frac{3}{4}$ .

COTTON closed on a basis of 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.40 to $2.60; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.40 to $3.50; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.60; spring, straight, $3.65 to $3.85; city mills, straight, $3.45 to $3.65. RYE FLOUR—$3.00 to $3.10 per barrel, as to quality.

GRAIN—No. 2 red wheat, 72 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 72 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.

No. 2 mixed corn, 46 to 46 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.

No. 2 white oats, clipped, 27 $\frac{3}{4}$  to 28c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.; good, 5 $\frac{1}{4}$  to 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.; medium, 4 $\frac{3}{4}$  to 5c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.; good, 4 to 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.; common, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.; spring lambs, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.

HOGS.—7 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 8c. for best Western.

FOREIGN—Efforts have been made to induce Russia to change her proposal to withdraw troops from Peking, and it is stated that Russia had agreed to a compromise by leaving a portion of the troops in Peking and sending the main body to Tien-Tsin, which will be made military headquarters. If this is done it is hoped that the Chinese Government will be induced under the strongest guarantee of safety, to return to Peking and resume its functions under the protection of the allied forces. One of the obstacles to the progress of a settlement is the absence of the Chinese Government from the capital. With the presence of the Emperor, the Empress Dowager and other officials of state, steps could be taken for the creation of a commission to negotiate a treaty.

The intense heat in England has caused prostration and death, not only among men and animals but also among birds. A Buckinghamshire farmer had fifty strong, healthy turkeys, and only ten are left. Of 200 pheasants on another farm 188 had died in two weeks.

At a late session of the Physical Science Section of the British Association for the advancement of Science, William Henry Preece, Consulting Engineer to the British Postoffice, made the interesting announcement that, as a result of his experiments with wireless telegraphy, he had found it quite possible to convey audible speech six to eight miles across the sea without wires. He added that it was a practical commercial system, and might be extended to communication between ships and between ships and the shore.

A telegram from Tromsø, Norway, in reporting the return of the Stella Polare with the Duke of Abruzzi's Arctic expedition on board, says the Stella Polare reached a point in latitude 86.33 north, thus penetrating further north than Dr. Nansen's record. The leader of this expedition is a nephew of the late King Humbert, of Italy, and sailed from Christiania Sixth Month 21, 1899. Dr. Nansen reached a point north of the new Siberian Island in latitude 86° 14' north; four degrees further north than any previous explorer had reached.

A despatch from the Hague of the 4th says: The ratifications of the agreements and treaties resulting from the Peace Conference were formally placed in the Foreign Office archives to-day. The Minister of Foreign affairs, Dr. W. II. DeBeaufort, in a brief speech expressed the hope that the future historian will be able to declare that the work of the conference was of lasting benefit to humanity, and proposed that an expression of this hope be conveyed to the Czar. A telegram in this sense was subsequently despatched to St. Petersburg.

Lord Roberts has issued a proclamation annexing the South African Republic to the Queen's dominions.

Official returns from Bombay show that there were 7969 deaths from cholera in the native and British States during the week ending Eighth Month 25th. The numbers of relief works are decreasing and the numbers receiving gratuitous relief increasing.

The weather in India is promising for crops. Excellent rain has fallen in all the famine tracts and the winter sowings are practically assured.

Competent authorities assert that South America has greater undeveloped resources than any other portion of the world. Any crop grown elsewhere can be duplicated there, and the country abounds in mines of coal, silver and gold, most of which has been only slightly developed.

RECEIPTS.

Unless otherwise specified, two dollars have been received from each person, paying for vol. 74.

Parvin Masters, Phila.; Wesley Haldeman, Pa. Mary Anna Jones, G't'n, $4 for Chas. Jones and Job Barclay Jones; Samuel P. Leeds, N. J., $8 for Sara W. Leeds, Henry W. Leeds, Edward C. Leeds and Samuel P. Leeds, Jr.; Wm. Robinson, agent, Ind., $ for himself, Susanna Cox and Seyrena Hinshaw, $1 L. O. Stanley, agent, Ind., $4.00 for Wm. C. Stanley Mary M. Frazier, and 30 cents each for John A. Bode hamer and M. T. Stanley; Susan B. Smith, Pa.; Hen W. Forsythe, Pa.; Margaret S. Ward, N. C.; Benjamin F. Starbuck, agent, O., $12 for Asenath H. Bond Edmund Bundy, Oliver S. Negus, Lewis C. Steer, Isra Sidwell and John Starbuck; Woolston Comfort, Mich Charity Baldwin, Pa.; Amelia Bedell, Cal.; Solom E. Barker, Del. and for Anderson M. Barker, N. C. Lindley H. Bedell, Phila.; Anna Spencer, G't' Charles Lippincott, G't'n; Emma Jones, Phila.; A. Holloway, agent, O., for Geo. W. Stratton; Just Robeson, Canada; Israel Hall and for Isaac Hall, Pa. Henry B. Leeds, agent, N. J., $4 for I. Powell Lee and Louisa Lippincott; Edward G. Smedley, Pa.; Ru K. Smedley, F'kf'd; Rachel E. Bell, N. J.; Mary Bacon, N. J.; Elizabeth B. Taylor, Phila.; Wm. Cook, Ia.; John M. Sager, Pa.; Benjamin H. Coppel agent, Ia., $4 for Edward G. Val and David Hollows Thomas H. Whitson, Pa., $6 for Anna T. Griffith Elizabeth Taylor and Philip P. Sharples; Phebe Gawthrop, Pa.; Thomas Waring, N. J.; R. Nichols for Hannah J. Prickett, N. J.; Phebe E. Hall, agent O., $1 for Jephtha W. Hall to No. 39, vol. 74.

Remittances received after Third-day noon will appear in the Receipts until the following week.

NOTICES.

WANTED.—Situation as companion or helper to elderly woman, by a young woman Friend, a graduate Westtown. Address "C" at this office

WANTED.—Opportunity to teach young children primary studies, by a young woman Friend, a graduate kindergarten training school. Address "M" at this office

A YOUNG woman Friend of experience wishes a situation as companion to an elderly lady.

Care B. Cope. Address, S. C. G., Kennett Square, Pa.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL will re-open Ninth Month 1, 1900.

J. HENRY BARTLETT, Sup't

In Haverford College grounds the undersigned furnish a home and tutoring for eight boys. They attend Haverford College Grammar School, opening Ninth Month 26, 1900. Special attention to preparation of daily lessons. Two vacancies. At home after Ninth Month 1, 1900.

Apply to

HENRY N. HOXIE, A. M., ALMA B. HOXIE.

Haverford P. O.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage will leave trains leaving Philadelphia 7.17 and 8.19 A. M., and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when required. Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., twenty cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, Westtown Station or West Chester, Phone 85.

EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Sup't

DIED, at his residence in Woodbury, N. J., Ninth Mo. 2, 1900, THOMAS S. PIKE, aged nearly seventy-six years, a member of Woodbury Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, on the twentieth of Seventh Month, 1900, E. T. HARVEY, infant son of Adolphus E. and Lyra T. Harvey, of 1822 Sargeant Ave., Joplin, Mo.

—, near Downingtown, Penna., on the thirteenth of Seventh Month, 1900, DEBORAH BALDWIN, aged seventy-three years. A member, elder and overseer of Downingtown Particular and Uwchlan Monthly Meeting of Friends. This dear Friend was firmly attached to the Christian principles and testimonies of our beloved religious Society, and often expressed her concern for the support of her original foundation. Her end came suddenly, yet we believe she had long been making preparation for the solemn change, and that her redeemed spirit is ever at rest.

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, NINTH MONTH 22, 1900.

No. 10.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,

South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth,
PHILADELPHIA.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

A Government Appointment.

We were recently in one of the States of this country where rejoicing was manifested at one of its citizens had received a high diplomatic appointment from the President.

We were led to reflect on that highest of appointments offered to each of us from the throne, and under which we should be serving namely, "God hath appointed us to obtain salvation." This is an appointment for life, to work it out with God working in us is fe-work. "How shall we escape if we neglect great salvation?" It is our one business to obtain it, and unto this we have been appointed. Whereas we have earned wrath. He "hath appointed us to wrath; but to obtain salvation," which we have not earned and cannot earn. The provided way for obtaining it is through our Lord Jesus Christ," and its condition is "repentance towards God and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ," who tasted the earnings of sin for every man, that being reconciled to God by his death we might "much more be saved by his life." "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Repentance is a sign of that life already working in us. Obedience to this witness of the Spirit is the one thing that we can do for the obtainment of repentance towards God; faithfulness under this same convicting power prepares us to receive the faith in the gift of God who loved us and gave himself for us, that the life which we henceforth live in the flesh we may live by the faith of Him; and abiding in Him who hath bought us with his blood, is not to be our own, so long as we live as we are progressively "much more saved by his life," even saved not in sin but from sin by the hope of glory, as indwelling in Him who are eradicated by the Spirit of Him who came to destroy in us the works of the devil. Unto the obtainment of this salvation were we appointed. Who will accept the appointment? Who will be faithful to it? It is a government appointment from the Throne of grace, and it means our government by Christ's holy light and Spirit from the first beginnings of repentance throughout sanctification in glory. In the faithful who so run that they may obtain, it is appointed that "of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end."

But as this appointment to obtain salvation is conditioned upon our obedience to the grace of God which brings it, so we cannot deny that other appointment for those who are disobedient to the Word. To stumble at the inspeaking word is a law of disobedience, and so an appointment; and when He says, "whereunto they were appointed," He does not say that they were appointed unto disobedience, but unto stumbling and falling in consequence of disobedience. "He hath not appointed us to wrath," but it is possible for us to choose the course which has that appointed end. "He willeth not the death of the sinner, but that all should return, repent and live." Let us lift up our heads in hope as sons and daughters appointed "to obtain salvation," and for that purpose called unto the fellowship of his Son.

OUR RELATION TO THE CAMPAIGN.—The very name of this paper makes it unnecessary to say that it stands for Peace and opposed to all carnal wars, fightings, and militarism; also for Temperance and abstinence from all that can intoxicate.

But we must leave it to each individual reader to decide, and cannot presume to dictate to him, which political party best represents his own conscience on these important causes, and what his individual method of work should be under the witness of the Spirit. Doubtless every ticket to be voted at the close of the present political campaign, has its adherents among our subscribers. We cannot consent, through any article offered to our columns, to be drawn into politics as such, or to appear in the role of biasing votes. But since, beginning with our first editorial sentence ever written, we have announced our concern as principles rather than men; so now our contention is for principles of righteousness irrespective of parties. If war is the issue, they are all in principle involved in that. And our religious Society having at the outset by every form of public protest open to it, done what it could to prevent the war, stands now clear of the responsibility; and can only at present, while still holding up its standard for Peace on earth, in sadness "let the potsherd strive with the potsherd of the earth," and embroil themselves in their forewarned calamity. We see no part to take, especially in a non-political sheet, either in arraiging or in preferring any of the political parties in respect to war and its baneful work, where they all embrace war in principle, and, once embarking, might have to be swept on in its vortex deeper than any President could wish.

NOTE.—Our friend Henry N. Hoxie having kindly prepared for our columns a review which began in our last number and is concluded in this, entitled "Some Thoughts on 'Quaker Government in Pennsylvania.' By Isaac Sharpless." We feared on seeing it in print that the title of the article made it appear that it was written by Isaac Sharpless, who is also the author of the book reviewed. Readers may now observe that the review is signed by its own author, Henry N. Hoxie. We are glad of his thoughtful testimony to the merit of Isaac Sharpless's historical researches, as given to the world in these works of permanent value: "A Quaker Experiment in Government," and "The Quakers in the Revolution."

Everyday Goodness.

The stout man had jostled and fought his way through the crowd at the entrance to the Brooklyn Bridge, and he was scowling fiercely as he pushed out a big dent in his hat. Seated next to him in the bridge car was a man who had an office in the same building.

The stout man pointed to the battered hat and said: "I believe men—and women, too, for that matter—are no better than savages. It's everyone for himself. There isn't a day passes but that I see something which convinces me civilization is only skin-deep."

"I'm afraid you only see one side of it," replied his neighbor. "There are lots of good things to be seen everyday, too. Now here is something that gives me a great deal of happiness during the year. He pulled a small note-book from an inside pocket. Then he went on; "I used to feel as you do—that people were very selfish, but when I began to study them more closely I saw so many pleasant things that I got in the habit of making notes of them, and so I carry this little book. Here's what I've jotted down to-day, for instance:

"On my way to the bridge this morning my hat blew off. I chased it, but before I reached it three other men were after it, and one of them caught it for me. Now, there was an entirely unselfish act on the part of men who were strangers to me; and you may see the same thing any windy day.

"As I was crossing the City Hall Park a woman in front of me dropped a glove without knowing it. Two boys made a dive for it and shouted: 'Lady, lady, you've dropped your glove.' Another act of kindness.

"Just as I reached Broadway a truckman's horse fell. The driver had hardly left his seat before the drivers of three other trucks stopped, got down, and began to help raise the horse. They did it because they saw a fellow-workman in trouble, and knew that they might need the same help at any time.

"On my way back to the office I passed a heavy, two-horse load of flour stuck on the car track. I stopped a minute to look, and saw several men put their hands to the muddy wheels and push till the dray started. They had no selfish interest in that load of flour; they only wanted to help.

"These are little things, but I think they show something very different from savagery. Some days I see even more, and some things I see every day. The reason we don't notice them more is because they are so common. You watch when we get off the car now, and you'll see half a dozen of these men give the papers they have just glanced through to the newsboys at the foot of the stairs. They might easily throw them away, but they know the boys sell them again and thereby make a few extra pennies."

And the stout man himself, when he reached the foot of the stairs, dropped a pace behind his neighbor, and hastily slipped his paper into the hands of a ragged newsboy.—Exchange.

FOR HIS MOTHER'S SAKE.—The florist had just swept some broken and withered flowers into the gutter, when a ragged urchin darted across the street. He stooped over the pile of mangled flowers, and, looking them carefully through, came at last upon a rose seemingly in better condition than the rest. But as he tenderly picked it up the petals fluttered to the ground, leaving only the bare stalk in his hand.

He stood quite still and his lips quivered perceptibly. The florist's boy, who had been looking at him severely, felt that his face was softening. "What's the matter with you, anyway?" he asked.

The ragged little fellow choked as he answered: "It's for my mother. She's sick, an' can't eat nothin', an' I thought if she'd a flower to smell it might make her feel better."

"Just you wait a minute," said the florist's boy, as he disappeared. When he came out upon the sidewalk he held in his hand a beautiful half-opened rose, which he carefully wrapped in tissue paper. "There," he said, "take that to your mother."

He had meant to put that rosebud on his mother's grave, and yet he knew he had done the better thing. "She'll understand," he said to himself, "and I know this will please her most."—Selected.

GREAT thoughts belong only and truly to him whose mind can hold them. No matter who first put them in words, if they come to a soul and fill it, they belong to it, whether they floated on the voice of others, or on the wings of silence and the night.—Dream Life.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Report from Travellers in the Philippines, 1898.

(Extracted from a Statement sent to a Correspondent.)

Lately I have been reading Senate Document Number 66, an official report prepared by two naval cadets commissioned by Admiral Dewey to travel in the Philippines in October, 1898, and ascertain their condition in the interior, the intelligence of the people, their tendencies, desires, and general surroundings. I am sure there is a widespread misunderstanding as to the character and ability of the Filipinos. Hitherto I have based my opinions upon newspaper reports such as I could secure, and had formed an impression that these people were a semi-savage race, practitioners of wierd dances, wearers of scanty clothing—largely cannibals—ugly, ignorant, dishonest, treacherous and uncouth class of people. My entire ignorance was only exceeded by my surprise upon learning how dense that ignorance really was. As a matter of fact they are far advanced upon the scale of civilization. On page 44 of this Senate document Brigadier-general Charles King says: "The capacity of the Filipinos for self-government cannot be doubted. Such men as Arellano, Aguinaldo, and many others whom I might name are highly educated; nine-tenths of the people read and write; all are skilled artisans in one way or another; they are industrious, frugal, temperate, and given a fair start could look out for themselves infinitely better than our people imagine."

The two cadets describe minutely their customs and habits, and I was greatly concerned to learn of their refinement and culture. There are many statements similar to the following: "In our journey we first travelled across the province of Neuva Icija, by far the poorest and least interesting of all the provinces we visited. And yet here we were surprised at the intelligence and refinement of the inhabitants. While our entertainment was at first meagre—for want of the wherewithal to provide a more generous one—we could nevertheless detect the same spirit of hospitality that found vent in elaborate manifestations in the richer towns which we visited later. We were particularly struck by the dignified demeanor of our hosts and by the graceful manner in which they extended to us their welcome."

These cadets penetrated to the very heart of the country generally supposed to be inhabited by savages and cannibals, all living wild and uncontrolled, a terror to mankind. Speaking of their arrival at one of the inland towns, one of the cadets reports that on the evening following our arrival they met a company given in their honor, which was attended by all the elite of the town. "There were present about fifty young women, and about twice that number of men. All were dressed in European fashion. The girls were pleasant and intelligent; the men comported themselves in all respects like gentlemen. It was very hard to realize that we were in the heart of a country generally supposed to be given up to semi-savages."

What a misfortune it is that we Americans have been so ignorant of the real character of the Filipinos. The source of this misinformation is largely explained by another extract from this report, under the heading of the "Backwoods Filipino": "Some years ago, at an exposition held in Barcelona, Spain, a man and woman were exhibited as representative types of the inhabitants of Luzon. The man wore a loin cloth and the woman a scanty skirt. It was evident they belonged to the lowest plane of savagery. I think no deeper wound was ever inflicted upon the pride of the real Filipino population than that caused by this exhibition, the knowledge of which seems to have spread throughout the island. The man and woman, while actually natives of Luzon, were captives from a tribe of wild Igorrotes of the hills; a tribe as hostile to the Filipinos as to the Spaniards, and equally alier to both. It is doubtful to what extent such islanders are responsible for the low esteem in which the native is held; his achievements certainly have never been well advertised while his shortcomings have been heralded abroad." Of these Igorrotes they say they are not numerous, and "are not powerful enough to attack a town of any size." I think it is the popular opinion here that there are few well educated people, and a large mass of very uncivilized ones, while the facts show just the reverse. Murat Halstead, sent to the Philippines by the administration, says that five sixths of the people there are Christians, and there are but very few heathens, and that the heathen have had no part in the Filipino uprising, and that nine-tenths of the people read and write.

The cadets speak in highest terms of the efficiency of Aguinaldo's government, and also state there was a universal sentiment in favor of independence of the island. That was in 1898, after the war with Spain was ended, and before the Filipino-American war had begun.

The Aguinaldian military government was merely temporary, and a complete civil government was in existence, with officers elected by the people. At that time, the Hong Kong papers brought the news that the Peace Commissioners of the United States at Paris were favorable to independence of the Filipinos and Colonel Tirona considered the information sufficient reliability to justify him in regarding the necessity for military authority past and the Philippine independence as assured whereupon he proceeded to relinquish his military command, and to place government power in the hands of a civil officer elected by the people. This was done in the presence of witnesses, who tell the story of the establishment of civil government, saying that the civil officer in assuming his office knelt, placed his hand on the Holy Bible and took the oath of office and then "made a speech in which thanked the disciplined military forces of the province, and assured them that the work that they had begun would be perpetuated by the people of the province where every man, woman and child stood ready to take up arms and defend their newly won liberty and to assist with the last drop of their blood the tempt of any nation to bring them back to their former state of dependence."

They further say: "At the time of our departure, Colonel Tirona planned to go with a few days to Ilagan, and from there to B. ombong, repeating this ceremony in the capity of each province." Thus it appears that mere assurance that these people were to be granted their liberty would have been sufficient to have caused absolute peace throughout the lands and further warfare unnecessary.

This report was sent to the Navy Department by Admiral Dewey on Twelfth Month 1st, 1898, who approved it, and said that it "contains the most complete and reliable information obtainable in regard to the present state of the northern part of Luzon Island." The hostilities between the Filipinos and Americans could have been avoided by acting upon that report.

An Exchange of Coats.

A correspondent of the Life of Faith relates the following interesting incident:

"The story of a waistcoat in your last number reminds me of a similar incident, in which I bore a part, thirty years ago. I was staying with a married sister. One morning she asked me if I knew of one among those with whom she was working who would like a warm great-coat, as her husband had had one made, but she disliked the color, and wished to give it away. Reflecting a while—for the coat was too good to give to a poor man—I remembered a missionary I knew, and said, 'Yes, I could dispose of it.' Bringing it she added, 'And here are some new trousers to give with the coat.' When I got home I managed to get the parcel taken by a stranger to the missionary. She asked, 'Who sent it?' The reply was, 'Most likely there are particulars inside.' It happened that I was prevented from going to the evening prayer-meeting. A young lady came to inquire the reason of my absence, and said, 'It is a pity you were not there, for you would have enjoyed something which took place. After the meeting was over Mr. B— said: "I should like to tell our friends of the goodness of the Lord. I was visiting a poor body at the hospital on Saturday who was recovering from a chest attack. He told me he intended going out in his cab on Monday, as was well enough. On inquiring if he had warm clothing I found his coat was thin. When I went home I told my wife about it, and said I had a great mind to give him my overcoat. She exclaimed against this, reminding me how easily I caught cold. However, in the end I prevailed, and this morning my body set off to his work in my old but warm and comfortable great-coat. In the course of the day my wife heard a knock at the door; a girl put a parcel into my wife's arms, and saying there was no answer, went away. When I opened the parcel there was a splendid new great-coat and another new and useful article of clothing!" To this day Mr. B— has no idea from whence his new garments came. My sister, a worldly lady, was quite overcome when I related the result of her kindness."

It is true still that "there is that scattereth and yet increaseth." This is by no means the chief reason for communicating of our substance to relieve want, but it is well to remember, when prompted to some act of benevolence and deterred by the thought of our present or possible future need, that it is written, "God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labor of love which ye have showed toward his name, in that ye have ministered to the saints and do minister" (Heb. vi: 10).

Some Thoughts on President Sharpless's Second Volume "The Quakers in the Revolution."

(Concluded from page 67)

First, however, a few words in regard to the introductory chapter which should be thoroughly mastered before proceeding further, and is a map and a picture in itself. Within about forty pages, and at a bound, the reader is placed in the commonwealth of William Penn,—in the heart of its busy movement, and in the atmosphere and trend of the one hundred years under consideration.

Another world it is from ours,—another day,—with other work to do and men to do it; an age long gone as it would seem with picturesque customs and conceptions; with ways and habits of thought now indeed changed; the echo somewhat of a mediæval church bell in the distance, but a time of heroic personalities stalking with veritable majesty through these pages, and a robust religious loyalty which we may all envy;—a note, too, on most of the important questions of life even yet resounding among men.

This chapter is vivid in its geographical distribution of the element making up its population. Three counties especially are here Bucks, Philadelphia and Chester, the original and oldest in the colony, with adjacent territory stretching westerly and northerly from the Delaware out and beyond. Here and there we find the Friends in their comfortable avocations and on their farms with constantly growing accretions of Presbyterians proper and their co-religionists from the Church of England. The scene has been painted by various local historians, by some poets and occasional story-tellers not unpleasantly.

Flanking them westward from the Schuylkill are the partially concentric layers of people recruited from Europe; the Welsh not far from the city; Germans from the Rhine and Palatinate; Mennonites—Moravians, Dunkards, and a long step further North and West, Presbyterians of a second type, "proselytes of the gate" as it were, from the north of Ireland,—rabidly aggressive, chronic in turmoil, and initiating a policy at once destructive ab initio of the old charter of William Penn. We thus in the early half of the eighteenth century have the motley elements of attraction and repulsion, the mosaic population of the colony. The picture, however, is brilliant with color because of these race differences, and the imagination readily reproduces the old-time primitive settlements, Penn's Manor, Chester, Germantown, Paxton, Bethlehem, Lancaster, etc., around which subsequent events of historic importance cluster.

President Sharpless estimates the maximum number of Friends at any time in the colony as forty thousand, and the maximum year as 1760. With the elements already mentioned, political parties quickly crystallize for legislation, and although crippled by the events of 1756, we have our author's statement that that of the Friends with which as a rule, the Germans usually were in accord, had undoubted ascendancy from 1681 to 1776, and then forever disappeared.

Throughout the book, too, as would be expected, we have the succession of governors of the Province, Thomas, Richard, and John

Penn, and the prominent individuals more or less associated with them; the Logans and Pembertons, Norris and Deny and the Hamiltons. Two beautiful portraits are also presented, one of Thomas Penn and that of John Dickinson. Public questions affecting the progress and policy of the country during these years—control of the public expenses, agitations against the Penns as proprietors, taxation of their estates, the Indians and the defence of the frontiers, of course, come to the front with consequent internal discord. We have the picture of Benjamin Franklin flitting alternately from America to England in diplomatic venture; that, too, of Dr. John Fothergill not infrequently in close touch with the English Government on the affairs of American Friends, a man evidently of large and statesmanlike mould, whose correspondence here appears, we believe, for the first time. Here, too, never before seen in print, we have the deliberate and stately papers of our own Meeting for Sufferings covering a multitude of subjects throughout the book, the beautiful sympathy also and advice of the English Friends with their brethren here in their trials of colonization and war as the crisis comes on, while behind them ever, but somewhat to the North, as a sombre background, looms the dark struggle so nobly painted in recent years by Parkman—between France and England for the mastery of the continent—looms again, still darker and with disruption and suffering especially for Friends, the growing shadow of the Revolution.

From these facts, and such as this volume additionally gives us, we have in the experiment of William Penn here recorded, an imperfectly human no doubt, but sincerely noble attempt to realize on earth a more perfect society or state than any as yet attained. It went beyond the Utopia of Sir Thomas Moore and Plato's ideal Republic, because in a very real way it actually existed while their's did not.

We think that from its history certain very notable impressions or influences occur timely for Friends at the present day, and especially important for us all to remember. We summarize but two of the many easily noticeable.

The first one is the Quaker idea of the State—what was it, or is it, rather? Of course, this idea is stated with greater fulness in the earlier volume than in this, but it here pervades every page by implication. Evidently Penn's ideal was so radical and far in advance of his own and the present time that it disappeared in the long train of light it cast before it. And yet, as an object-lesson, as something tentative however premature, what worthier model can become the subject matter of investigation in our schools and colleges, or in popular thought for guidance along great and general lines of practical politics to-day, than this same Quaker ideal of William Penn? Many of the old economic problems, and the spirit of all of them,—rights, taxes, franchises, protection to life and property, distribution of commodities, immigration, finance and general legislation here occur as they always occur, and are squared to the Christian standard, a realization however partial, of a divine society on the earth;—the kingdom tentatively which the Master promised withal to give to his disciples.

Again, no greater lesson, we think, is taught in this book to our own membership and the Christian world at large than that the life of the Christian disciple is one of suffering;—suffering for conscience' sake, or, as Dr. Fothergill says in one of his letters of advice, suffering "for the good of the immortal part." We can but think that a thorough reading of this book by our young Friends everywhere, especially under the lead of a teacher familiar with the history of the modern state in Europe and the great European and American charters of freedom, any great Christian teacher so equipped and tendered by the Holy Spirit of liberty, we can but think that such a study would awaken an enthusiasm of love and thoughtful admiration for Christian truth as interpreted by the Society of Friends as does not now always exist without some such example and illustration as are here given. All through this book the Friends suffer. The very titles in the index chapter are so named or imply it to the full. Separation, schism, riot, violence, persecution, exile, death,—these in very truth in the time covered by it, are the badges of membership. Its two longest chapters, that on "Preparing for the Revolution" and "Quaker Suffering" illustrate it best, while the last one, that on "Friends and Slavery," shows clearly the power of a quickened conscience to make sacrifices and the will and genius prior to all attempts in the same direction to rise to the illuminating level of a great reformation.

Without competency to discuss the volume on open historical points, we believe its sources of authority are authentic because they are our very own as a religious Society, and that through them President Sharpless has given us a very noble interpretation.

We believe, too, that turning back now and then, as we here do to early Puritan and Quaker history and its spirit—to a period when the Christian faith was a very real thing in human life because of strenuous work in the settlement of a new world—turning back to the Pilgrim at Plymouth and the Quaker with Penn is a healthy tonic for us all. For from their days so different from ours in outward circumstances, aside from theology which renews itself from age to age, there is with them a simplicity of faith—a hunger for the Unseen—a trust in the Omnipotent One, purifying and refreshing in themselves, and well supplementing the sure faith of our own time. And in the words of a great orator long gone, "We understand to-day also that in the scanty records of those early times we may read the prologue of the great world drama whose final acts are yet to come."

H. N. HOXIE.

THE ALBATROSS.—It is said to be a very difficult task to capture an albatross, as they never light on land or on board ship. Their feet and legs are not strong enough to support them, hence they either stay in the air or light in water. An albatross sleeps on the wing and rarely ever flaps its wings. When it wishes to rise from the water, if there is a breeze, it faces the wind, raises its wings, and making a circular motion to the right, gets wind enough under its wings to get under headway. In calm weather it gets on its wings by running on the surface of the water until it gets sufficient wind underneath it to lift it into the air. This peculiar bird, Captain Paulson says, is perfectly at home in a storm: the rougher the gale, the more the albatross appears to enjoy itself. It seldom lights on the water when a storm rages, preferring the rough winds that toss it about and carry it along.—Morning Oregonian.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

ENOCH WALKED WITH GOD.

No written word brought cheer to lonely heart,
Nor gave response with comfort or command;
No sweeping censer curved its scattered cloud,
Nor bread nor wine, nor pure baptismal bath,
Nor priestly function passed from man to man,
Nor saints replying in communion sweet.
And yet the holy commerce of the skies
Was fresh, direct and constant in its flow.
The utmost seat of mental life was touched,
Pure garments made in heaven the man adorned,
And friend with friend conversed in heavenly place.
Ceasing from man, what liberty we reach,
Walking with God, what honor we attain,
A deathless life! Great type of beaming joy.

H. T. MILLER.

BEAMSVILLE, Ontario.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Christ's Fulness.

In the State of Nebraska are vast fertile plains, on which the early settlers raised abundance of corn, and kept much stock. The greatest drawback to the country was the lack of water during the heat of summer, when cattle had often to be driven several miles to the streams, and sometimes even these became dry, and many cattle perished. In these times of drought not a few men made a lucrative business, carting and selling water. But ere long the people found that even in the driest period there was always an abundance of clear, cool sparkling water lying from sixteen to sixty feet below the surface.

They began to sink wells, and now almost every man has a well and a windmill to pump the water which flows generally into a tank, either at the house or barn, giving an abundance for all, and some use it, too, for irrigating the land.

What a simile have we here, to spiritual blessings in Christ! He was "full of grace and truth," and, says the Apostle John, "We have all received of his fulness." It is by this grace of our Lord Jesus Christ by the which any are saved, who are saved. It is the gospel of Christ, God's power to salvation to every one who believeth in Christ. Now God's grace was upon Jesus as a child, that is God's spirit. And we receive the gift of life from God, through Christ Jesus, his well-beloved Son, appointed the Mediator between God and man.

Jesus weary with his journey, sitting at Samaria's well, told the woman who came thither to draw water, "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into eternal life."

As these Nebraskans lived on their land, so is it said of God, "In Him we live and move, and have our being," and like as the water they sorely needed, so does Paul go on to say, "If haply men might feel after Him and find Him," as the settlers found the water, which, after all, was near. Now each one found a well of water and an abundance of it. Just what we find when we find Christ; "He is in us a well of water springing up into eternal life." Before they found this hidden treasure, their cattle died; now they lived and were daily refreshed. So is the believer in Christ Jesus.

Again John records that on the last day of one of the Jewish feasts, "Jesus stood and cried, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink. He that believeth in me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his heart, shall flow rivers of living water," and the evangelist adds, "This he spake of the Spirit, which they that believe in Him should receive: for the Holy Ghost was not yet given because that Jesus was not yet glorified."

When Jesus ascended on high, being glorified, He sent that promise of the Holy Spirit and on the day of Pentecost three thousand who believed with joy of heart received the word and were baptized by Christ. And a Peter then in substance said, that this promised outpouring of the Spirit of Christ, was not to be only to them then present, but to continue throughout time, to each succeeding generation forever.

Now Christ says it is through believing in Him, we receive the spirit. Paul says the same, calling this spirit grace; "By grace are ye saved through faith, and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God."

Now mark! The Nebraskans all lacked water to give life and sustain it. They all needed water, and sorely felt their need. They paid others to bring it, but, after all, had little. A times these failed and they had none. Death then walked through the land—and yet, after all, water was near easy of access, and in abundance, only they did not know it. They sought they found, a great treasure, no more than lacked, their every want was filled.

God, our Creator, hath implanted a desire a thirst, in every soul for this life beyond the grave. We sorely need—preachers may profess to sell. These, like broken cisterns, which most needed, fail. Doth God withhold the needed water for the soul for which He himself has caused a thirst? Some may say, I do. "You can't get any, only through the minister," they say. Is that true? The Nebraskans would have thought so, too, if they had believed those who made a trade of bringing water. But Christ speaks of a well in each and every man who believes, that he may draw therefrom living water, Christ's Spirit, and live forever; nor are the flowings of this well subject to any other man, any more than each man's well, is to his neighbor on these plains. Christ by his Spirit in Isaiah cries, "Ho! every man that thirsteth, come ye to the waters; and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat, yea, come; buy wine and milk, without money and without price" (Is. lv: 1).

Now suppose one Nebraskan found this water and plenty of it, and it cost no more than the labor of lifting it up, and God's wind was powerful enough to do this; and suppose he told his neighbor all this? Would he doubt his word even if he saw the effects of the water, and that the man had no more occasion to give money to those who sold water. But they would not do that. They saw, and believed, and the same, and prospered.

And why cannot we do in spiritual things what they did; and be as wise in heavenly things as they were in temporals? Should God pour out of his heavenly grace upon all men, which he does, and one man should come to the knowledge of this, as Paul did, and immediately the effects of this free teaching of God's grace and power to keep the man from evil were plain sible to others, like as Saul the persecutor, became Paul the meek, would they be wise men neglect such a means, so freely bestowed on an, so easy of access through faith, so powerful to save from evil, so life-giving in its effects, full of God's promises to all who receive and obey? I am sure the witness for truth in every part, to whom God has given reason, and who meditates thereon, must answer, "No! theirs could be the height of folly."

This Divine grace is more. It is the Angel God's presence, to lead men through the trials and temptations of life, to give him the knowledge of God's will, to give him power to do this will and to overcome sin.

It is God's light to make plain the way wherein man should walk to please him, and like the God-sent star which led the wise men of the East to Jesus the Saviour, so it leads to God from whom it comes. As obeyed it purifies the soul from the pollutions of sin, and God is said to dwell in it; and as man comes to walk in this light, he is brought by it into communion with God, such as Adam, ere he fell through sin, enjoyed.

Christ Jesus is full of grace, Christ, the Lord, is near; this word of grace, coming in the name and power of Jesus, God's free gift every man is able to save, able to give an inheritance in God's kingdom. All who truly seek, do find Him, and he who finds, finds life. O reader, are these things true? I know they are, and thou wilt, too, if thou comest to that grace of God in thee, for "He hath appeared to every man;" it is He who reproveth the sin and evil in thy heart that alone hideth God's face from thee; obey this grace, this Angel of mercy, forsake the evil, do the good He teaches thee.

The fulness of God's law is to love the Lord God with all our heart and to love our fellow-man. This is what He teaches, and He gives power to fulfill this law, and thus keep God's command, come to be called like Abraham, "the friend of God."

W. W. B.

Doukhobor Notes.

The information contained in the following extracts from a letter of Eliza H. Varney, is perhaps the most encouraging that has come to us since the Exiles have been in their Canadian homes.

We do not know over how wide a district the ten days' drive extended, but, as she makes exception for any village which came under her observation, we can but hope, that the favorable condition of the harvests she describes, may apply to every settlement. The careful selection of garden seeds made by W. B. Harvey, after correspondence with J. F. Saunders of the Experimental Farm, seems to promise success. It may be remembered that about four hundred dollars were expended for these seeds, grown in Canada, and that explicit directions were printed, in Russian language, for the preparation of the ground and spacing of the rows, depth of soil, etc.

YORKTON, Assiniboia, Ninth Month 6th, 1900.

MY DEAR FRIEND:—We reached Yorkton in the evening after a ten days' trip among the Doukhobor Colonies. While we found the trails in much worse condition than last year, the heavy rains of last month have been a great blessing, not only to the Doukhobors, but to everybody. Crops of all kinds are turning out well. I visited most of their gardens and saw beautiful, solid heads of cabbage, as large as they ever are, as a rule; also some cauliflower and very fine celery, very large white turnips, winter radishes, carrots, and very fine onions. Their crops everywhere are good; so much better than they expected, that smiling faces and thankful hearts are their portion.

Frederick Leonhardt, our interpreter, told me this morning that when we left Yorkton, ten days ago, his potatoes were so small, not as large as a hen's egg. Having been frozen down twice, he thought they were no good, and that he would have to buy; but, to his astonishment, this morning, he found the plants in full bloom, and the potatoes the size of a common tea cup. They were certainly fine ones, and, he says, now he will have plenty. He says he is always astonished how fast things grow here. They had very fine cucumbers; they gave us some to have on the road, as we mostly care for ourselves by taking our own provisions, but we fell short this time, and wondered what we were going to do for supper; when a Doukhobor woman came running after us with large radishes, turnips, some carrots and onions. In the course of the afternoon our driver shot three prairie chickens, and when we reached our destination for the night, my cousin and the driver prepared the chickens, and had a fire out of doors, and cooked them and the vegetables in a stew, (as they had but one kettle to cook in), and with a cup of tea and Doukhobor bread we were greatly refreshed. While the chickens were cooking for our evening meal, our driver and interpreter went away and shot three more, so that we have lived on very fine prairie chickens, either fried or stewed. We can truly say we have lacked nothing, either temporally or spiritually. We held a meeting that evening, to the relief of my own mind, and to their comfort and encouragement; for it did seem as though the windows of heaven were opened and spiritual blessings poured out on us, from place to place.

If thou couldst let Joseph S. Elkinton know what a great change has taken place in all the different crops of grain as well as vegetables, I am sure he would be greatly comforted. For of a truth we can, like Joshua of old, bring back a good report of the land; the people are greatly encouraged.

AN ESTIMATE OF WHITTIER.—Whittier belongs with those few who arise in all parts of the Christian world and out of the bosom of all sects, who are lovers of the spirit. They illustrate the purest teachings of Christ, they express the simplest aspirations of man; and this is their religious life. . . . Wherever Whittier touches upon the problems of the spiritual life he evinces the qualities of a great and liberal nature; indeed, the traits which are most deeply impressed upon us, in his character, are those which are seen most clearly in his religious verse. . . . In the crush for wealth and notoriety, men have been pleased to remember him, the plain citizen, uncheapered by riches and unsolicited for fame, ending his life with the same habits with which he began it, in the same spirit in which he led it, without any compromise with the world.—George E. Woodberry.

The Advantages and Disadvantages of the Marriage State.

(AN ALLEGORY.)

I fancied myself travelling in the eastern parts of the world; and, at last, coming to the city of Old Babylon, where I was much amused in viewing the curiosities of the place, the tower, the wall, the gates, the streets, the palace, the river, the images in the plain of Dura, &c. I observed the city, and it appeared in different views. In one part, the people were entirely taken up in revellings, feasting, diversions, splendid appearances, enjoying themselves. In the other part they were more reserved, and were much taken up in a demure dress and behaviour; in the decency of their houses and streets, and in the regularity of their towers, fortifications, etc. But, without any appearance of dangers, alarms, or molestations, they seemed all entirely at ease.

When I had almost satiated myself with gazing at the particular shows, I thought to take a prospect of the whole city together. So I walked to a rising ground belonging to it, but a little retired from the crowd; where I saw a booth, which I took to be built on purpose for the convenience of taking prospects, and I went directly to it; at the door I saw an old man, of whom I enquired if he had a prospect glass, whereby I might be favored with a full view of that royal city, which I supposed to be the metropolis of the world. He told me if I pleased to take a deliberate observation, I might perhaps have different apprehensions of that splendid city, from those I had at present. For he assured me it was so full of intestine perplexity, caused by envy, malice, excess and corruption, that the inhabitants had no real satisfaction in themselves; and it was only by those extravagances and amusements which I had seen, they kept themselves from perpetual distraction.

He then brought out his prospect glass, and told me if I pleased he would show me the situation of the place, whereby I might be convinced that its condition was not so happy, nor its glory so majestic as I imagined. So I took a distinct view on the south side; and the foundation of the place appeared to be built upon nothing but bogs and quicksands, which could not possibly sustain the buildings; but ere long they must inevitably sink.

I again took a view on the north side; and I found the foundation was all bituminous and sulphureous matter, interspersed with subterranean fire, which appeared ready in a moment to burst forth into flames.

He then bade me look to the east, and I saw a very formidable army approaching the city, with full power and commission to destroy it; and they spread themselves around with fury, like the roaring of the sea. And there was trembling upon all the hills, the rivers, the trees, and the fields round about; but all the inhabitants of the city continued in a stupefaction.

When I had beheld and deliberated on these things, it filled me with such astonishment as almost caused my bowels to turn within me. Such was my disappointment, and the horror that seized me, that I thought I was neither able to bear the sight, nor fly from it, nor stand my ground. And I asked the old man if I might lodge all night in that booth. But he told me it was not a place for lodging, nor would any person in his right mind think it safe to sleep so near the city; but if I pleased, I might come in and rest myself a little.

And when I entered, I found four young men very carefully perusing a map, seeming to make very particular remarks and diligent observations, and would sometimes earnestly enquire the old man's judgment, to inform them of the meaning of some things. Whereupon I enquired what piece it was that so much attracted their attention. They told me it was the map of Babylon and Canaan, with all the roads between the two places. And they having had a full prospect of the same things which I had just now beheld; and being determined to leave their native country, and travel to the latter place, was the reason of their present enquiries. And the old man being a native of Canaan, and acquainted with both countries, as well as the roads from one to the other, they frequently applied to him for instruction in things difficult.

These four young men appeared so like each other in their apparel, their speech, and behaviour, as well as some of their features, that I verily took them all to have been own brothers; and knew not anything to the contrary, until I became acquainted with a certain person who had some knowledge of the places where they were born, and of the register books. He informed me that two of them were sons of the bond-woman, but the other two were sons of the free-woman.

So I observed them, and they all made preparation with seeming vigorous resolution for their proposed journey. And amongst other consultations with the old man, their instructor, they earnestly craved his advice, whether it were expedient for each of them to take along with him a female companion? Which he very carefully encouraged them to do, provided they were such as were disposed to go the same way, and had their hearts engaged to seek the same country along with them. But otherwise he admonished them, by all means, to avoid such companions as had no knowledge of, nor delight in, the way they designed to travel.

He pointed out to them many difficulties in the way where the company of strangers would be of very dangerous consequence; told them the need they would find of strengthening and encouraging in the way, rather than hindering and discouraging, and reasoned much upon the evil that would attend, in many respects, such companions as took no delight in the way; and compared it with the advantages they might expect in the company of such as took pleasure, and would endeavor to animate them therein. He further informed them what bad effects, in many instances, travellers, who had formerly gone that way, had found from disagreeable companions; and that, to prevent the like inconveniences, the king of the country had made a law that none of his subjects should join with strangers to be companions in that journey. And therefore he earnestly cautioned, whatever they did, to be exceeding careful in their choice.

I waited to see what influence this advice would have upon the minds of these young men. But I observed that, at the first, none of them seemed to relish his counsel; for they had all either contracted some acquaintance with, or placed their fancy upon maids who were natives of Babylon, to whom their hearts were very inclinable. But the more they appeared engaged in their affections, the more their instructor insisted on the dangers and pernicious consequences which were most certain to attend their having such companions. And withal told them the king had appointed one to attend them in their journey, whose name was Self Denial, without whose company it would be impossible ever to reach the borders of Canaan. And that to choose a stranger for a companion, would be such an insult to him, at the first setting out, as might cause misunderstanding all the way.

For his part, he told them, that to pretend to travel to Canaan, and to choose a Babylonian for a companion, was such a contradiction, that he could not but very much doubt the sincerity of their hearts. For if it was possible for a sincere traveller to choose such a companion (as he would not be too bold in his assertions), yet he was very certain it could not be, so long as they continued in the right use of their reason. And he must discharge his conscience in giving them timely admonition, etc.

I observed the event of these consultations; and I found the eldest son of the bond-woman could not be moved by all these arguments; but resolutely chose one who was an utter stranger to the paths, nor had any delight or desire thereto. And when he had covenanted with her, she proved so averse to going along with him, and so reluctant to his pursuing his intended journey, that she prevailed upon him to desist from his purpose. So he settled with her in Babylon; and they were both there when the city was destroyed, and perished together in the ruins.

But the younger brother, son of the bond-woman, paid a little more regard to the counsel given him, and seemed more heedful in his choice; and in a slight manner sought to get a companion that would be willing to go along with him. So at last he met with one who appeared compliant to his desire, though she had no knowledge of the way, nor any desire to it, only it seemed a matter indifferent; and therefore as he was inclined to undertake the journey, she would condescend to compliment him with her company. This pleased the young man very well, as he thought he should both gratify himself in the choice of a companion, and also act conformably to his directions. But he did not consider, that while her mind was possessed with such indifference, her company must needs be very unprofitable: however, they joined hands. And she, as good as her word, complimented him with her company; and they set out both together, as if they would proceed on the journey. But her indifferent mind soon prevailed so as to cool his warm affections, and caused their advances to be very slow. They would frequently sit down in the shade, and sometimes divert themselves with trifles, and often turn aside out of the way, which made their progress very slow. And this manner of loitering prevailed more and more, until at last they came to a low valley by the brink of the river Euphrates, where they turned aside and fell asleep: and while they slept, there arose a swell in the river, and the flood swept them both away.

As for the younger son of the free-woman, when he had heard the admonitions, they made some deep impressions on his mind, and filled him with some awful apprehensions. For I was convinced of the pernicious consequences which would attend such company, and appeared very solicitous to avoid them. But how it was, I have now forgotten, whether before these considerations he had contracted a correspondence, and had not resolution to deny himself; or whether afterwards by chance, and giving latitude to his fancy, he got himself: some way or other, however, proved to be entangled with a daughter of the Chaldees; which, between the instructions I had received, and his own unguarded affections, caused some strugglings in his mind. For though the person was of a complacent disposition, and did not seem at all reluctant to the things he had in view; yet he plainly perceived she had no real taste to them, and that her innate disposition was more to Babylon than Canaan. She had never been convinced of the misery and ruin approaching her native country; nor had she ever been acquainted with the pleasures and delights that land which he was seeking after; nor had she any desire to the way.

But his strong inclination stimulated him to reason upon everything in the most advantageous and promising light; and to put the most favorable construction upon every circumstance, as thus; "That her complacency was such that she would not be any hindered by molestation to him. That by his example he might engage her mind to that which she had no inclination to at present. That the engagements which he should enter into with her were of another nature; and might be performed without interfering immediately with the concerns of his journey. That it was very hard to be prohibited from the society of one who in all respects appeared so desirable; and that probably he might never find a companion complete in every point," etc.

In short the young man persisted in the kinds of reasoning, until he had almost stupefied his senses. But still could not free himself from convincing and dreadful apprehensions of the evil of taking so indirect a step, and the inconveniences which were certain to attend it. Until at length a resolute passion prevailed so far that his eyes were darker, and he scarce perceived the day from night. And during this obstruction of senses, he went one evening, after both sun and moon were gone down, and joined hands with this Babylonian.

But when the sun arose in the morning, he was a little come to himself, he then came sensible of the rashness of his advent but it was too late to recall it. He was aware into what snares he had brought himself; in what difficulties he was involved; what inconveniences must attend his journey; and that now he had no way left, but to do the best he could of the matter; and to gratify with it as well as it should please God to enable him.

So, after some anxious thoughts and bitter reflections, he endeavored to smooth his journey as well as he could, and betook himself to his journey; exerting his utmost skill and power to take his companion along with him. But alas, when he attempted to lead her into the way, he found she had no feet; she could ve a step further than he must carry her a heavy burden she proved.

So I observed some of his travel. And when met with dangers, distresses, or disappoint-nts, he would begin to express his grief,
I to unbosom his mind to his companion;
t she had no ears, no understanding, no heart sympathize with him, nor was she capable being made to know the nature of his comints. If he was beset with robbers, wild sts, serpents, or any annoyance, he would ometimes make his complaint to her, but she ld neither assist nor comfort him. If he nted direction in any part of his way, she ld not give him any counsel. If he was k, or wounded, and wanted cordials or oil his wounds, she had no hands to administer relief.

And as she never was capable of yielding any succor, or comfort in his sufferings, ther was she ever capable of partaking of of his enjoyments. If he met with any dens of spices, or refreshing springs by the y, he would invite her to eat or drink with
; but she had no taste. If he found sweet ers he would pluck and give them to her;
she had no smell, nor could have any deat in them. If he had any delightful pros-ts by the way, he would endeavor to show
m to his companion; but she had no eyes.
ne met with any fellow-travellers by the y, he would invite her to enjoy their comy, but she was never sociable with himself any other person who spoke the language Canaan, for it was a language she could learn. Thus, whatever grief befell him, or tever enjoyments he was favored with in his journey, he never found any sympathy ongratulation from her, nor was she of the t use to him all the way, nor were her afions ever moved, any otherwise, than, some-es to suppose, and sometimes to show a disor disturbance of mind.

ut as she had no life, capacity, sense, nor vity in the chosen path, she had so much more vivacity in things pertaining to her element. So that when she could draw aside out of the way, she would discover a sprightliness in all her senses, be so sant and diverting, and all parts of her versation so engaging, that it often preed upon him to turn aside with her, and ed a very great hindrance to him in his
ney. For though it was not in his power nd anything in his way that would divert affluence her mind, yet she frequently found something in her own path which did di-and sensibly draw away his heart, by which as many times entangled and laden with ck clay.

(To be continued.)

SEEK THE BEAUTIFUL AT HOME.—A man
resolved to seek and find the beautiful.
Thought of the mountains of Switzerland, the beautiful plains of Italy, and the sts of America, and other wonders of the od; but before his plans were settled a seemed to say to him, "Begin at home."
The beautiful is always with us. You can the place where God has put you beauti-
If it be but an attic in a poor house, or beside, or a bench in a workshop, or a seat hool, or a place in your mother's heart—e it beautiful. And the sadder and the darker the place is, be the more eager to make it beautiful. Love which loves others unselfishly is the great beautifier.—Selected.

For the Sake of Honor.

John Randall stood for a moment looking over the pasture bars, looking in the direction of the hills that rose between him and the Delaware.

It was in the troublous times of the War of Independence, and John and his mother and sister Betty remained on the little New Jersey farm. The boys and girls who have studied history know that New Jersey was marched across more than any other State. John had seen the flying patriots hurrying along the highway more than once; and, too, he had seen the triumphant red-coats marching by.

It had not been an easy matter to make the family living during this time; and John, as the head of the family in his father's absence, felt the full responsibility of this. They gave freely from their stores for the patriots, and frequently what remained was taken by the red-coats without even so much as a "Thank you!"

John had kept one precious treasure through it all—his horse Beauty. If ever any horse deserved the name of Beauty, it was John's. Her black coat was carefully cared for, as if she had belonged to a king. She loved her master, and followed him about as a petted dog would.
You may wonder how she escaped being captured by the red-coats. Well, there was a little hollow down in the woodland, where John concealed her at the first alarm. The soldiers were always in a hurry, and took anything they saw; but so far they had never searched nor asked questions.

"Mother," said John one day, "if the soldiers ever ask if I have a horse, it would be all right to say no, would it not? I couldn't let Beauty go. She is used to being petted so;
and the soldiers would be cruel to her, I'm afraid."

"My son, I know that many people call it right and lawful to tell a falsehood to those thieving soldiers. But, John, your father would scorn to tell a lie to save his life; and I think he would like to know that his son loved truth above all else. However, use your own judgment, my son. It would indeed be a sore trial to lose Beauty, and I pray the good God not to put you to the test."

John thought for a moment, and then said:
"If they ask me I will tell the truth, because of my father and because it is right. But, nevertheless, I shall hide Beauty, so that they shall not find her unless they search long and well."

On this morning, as he stood looking toward the hills, he caught sight of a gleam of red passing through one of the defiles. He ran to the house as fast as he could.

"The red-coats, mother!" he shouted. Then he turned to the pasture bars adjoining the yard, and called: "Come, Beauty! Come, Beauty!" Beauty came out of a clump of bushes, and raced across the pasture. She came up to her master, with arched neck and dainty, prancing steps, expecting a frolic, no doubt.

"No time to play to-day, my beauty," said John, scrambling on her back. "Now away with you to the hollow!"

Beauty had never known the touch of a whip, and she scampered away down the lane at John's command.

When the soldiers rode up, they went straight to the barn. There were no horses there.
They had been taken away long before. One of the men came to the door where John was standing.

"Boy, is there a horse any place about?"

John's heart was as heavy as lead at this question. He heard Betty give a sob in the kitchen back of him, for Betty loved Beauty as John did.

"Yes, sir," said John, bravely, at last.

"Oh, there is, is there?" said the soldier, surveying him with an incredulous air. "Perhaps you will tell us where it is, or even get it for us."

"No, sir, I will not," said John.

His mother held her breath for fear at the boldness of the answer, but the soldier turned away, laughing as if it were a huge joke.

"Major," he said, turning to the commanding officer, "will you send a couple of men to search the place, and bring that mythical horse out to the light of day?"

"Nonsense, lieutenant!" came the gruff answer. "We have no time to waste. There are no horses here, for they would not have had time to conceal them since we came in sight."

How glad was John that he had seen that little gleam of red through the defile of the hills.

"As for that boy's story," the commander went on, "nothing would please him better than to have us spend our time on a wild-goose chase until the Yankees come up. Do you suppose he would have told us if he really had a horse?
Let us ride on."

He turned to the soldiers, and shouted, "Fall in!" and, in a few minutes, the men were out of sight.

John stood in the doorway, dazed with surprise, while Betty danced around him, fairly shrieking with joy.

"Oh, they didn't take Beauty! They didn't believe you, John, because you told the truth!"

Betty entreated John to go at once and bring her pet up, but John said no, for more soldiers might be following that first battalion. So Betty put on her bonnet, and took a piece of bread, and went to visit beauty in her exile.

More soldiers did follow that day, and, after a time, the patriots rode by. Then the tumult ceased, and Beauty was brought back to her own pasture and her bed in the barn.

"Are you sorry for telling the truth?" said Mother Randall.

"No, indeed, mother!" cried John. "I suppose, even if Beauty had been taken, I would be comforted, because I did right, but she wasn't taken, and it seems too good to be true."

It was not very long after that that the horsemen rode through, crying, "Cornwallis is taken!"
and so the soldiers ceased to march, and Beauty lived in safety and peace to the end of her days.
—Christian Standard.

A SKEPTIC on one occasion said to a young Quaker Christian: "My young friend, it is all moonshine." "I thank thee for the compliment," said the young man; "that is just it exactly; the moon borrows its light from the sun, and we borrow our light from Christ.—
Exchange.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—The loss of life in Galveston in consequence of the great storm is estimated at from five thousand to eight thousand. Shortly after the waters subsided a dispatch says: The city presents the appearance of widespread wreck and ruin. Little has been done to clear the streets of the terrible tangle of wires and the masses of wreck, mortar, slate, stone and glass that bestrew them. Many of the sidewalks are impassable. Some of them are littered with debris. Very few, if any, buildings escaped injury. Reports from various points along the Gulf coast indicate that there has been great property damage done for several hundred miles.

The Governor of Texas has placed Galveston city and island under martial law. Appeals for help have been generously responded to, and a dispatch of the 14th says: Supplies for the relief of Galveston's sufferers are coming in from every quarter as rapidly as the limited means of transportation will admit.

The storm, after leaving Texas, passed north and north-eastward, and telegraphic reports have told of great damage done throughout its course in Illinois, Indiana and Ohio.

A dispatch from Chicago of the 11th says, that the storm reached there on that day attended by a wind with a velocity of seventy-two miles an hour, doing much damage to property and raising tremendous waves on the lake. Accounts from Newfoundland mention that widespread destruction has followed its course in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and its shores, and to vessels upon the banks of Newfoundland.

A strike of coal miners in the anthracite coal regions of Pennsylvania, ordered by a central organization meeting recently held in Indianapolis, has taken place. The number of men affected is upwards of one hundred and forty thousand. These men include Americans, Austrians, English, Germans, Hungarians, Irish, Italians, Polish, Russians, Scotch, Swedes, Slavish, Welsh and Greeks. In a number of mines a considerable portion of the men are opposed to striking. Business men in some towns are canceling orders for goods, and some merchants who cannot afford to give credit to strikers announce that they will close their stores. The strike has already been followed by an advance in the price of coal.

Acting Secretary of State Hill announces that the French Government has expressed its deep sympathy on account of the great calamity caused by floods in Texas, and that the appreciation of this Government of the kind sentiments expressed by the Government of France has been communicated to it. Similar sentiments have been expressed by the Emperor of Germany, and have been responded to by the President.

A dispatch of the 13th from Washington says: "Chinese Minister Wu took to the State Department this morning a dispatch from Li Hung Chang, pledging his earnest efforts to restore order in China and protect Americans from slaughter and loss of property. It is no secret that the President is very anxious to secure the withdrawal of the United States troops at the earliest possible time."

The population of Reading, Pa., is 78,961, an increase of 20,300 in ten years.

The population of the city of Harrisburg, Pa., as officially announced, is: In 1900, 50,167; in 1890, 39,385.

The population of the city of Camden, N. J., is: In 1900, 75,935; in 1890, 58,313. The census returns thus far announced show that the movement of the population from the farms to the cities and towns is increasing. In many of the purely agricultural townships the census returns revealed a decided falling off of population since 1890. The counties as a whole may show an increase, but the gain for the most part has taken place in the cities and boroughs within their borders.

In 1898 the regular army of the United States consisted of 25,000 men. It now consists of 65,000, and there are 35,000 volunteers besides, making 100,000 in all. The army used to cost about $23,000,000 a year. It is now costing $135,000,000.

The New York State Federation of Working Men, at Utica, adopted resolutions protesting against "large standing armies as being a menace to the liberties of organized wage-earners and a heavy burden upon them."

The forthcoming report of the Bureau of Industrial Statistics for 1899 will contain some remarkable figures. Last year there were 16,137 more persons employed than during the year previous in the first series of industries covered by this report. The average yearly earnings of the 154,422 persons employed in the various industries presented in this series, skilled and unskilled, men, women and children, was $506.27, as against $154.52 for the 137,985 persons employed by the same establishments the year previous. The report shows the advance in wages for each industry by a comparative table, the percentage of increase being from five to thirty per cent.

A compilation of returns to the State Bureau of Industrial Statistics shows that in 1899 Pennsylvania produced 6,542,998 gross tons of pig iron, the value of which was nearly $100,000,000, and 6,446,159 gross tons of steel, or over sixty per cent. of the production of the United States.

The importations of rubber have doubled within the last few years, and now amount to $30,000,000 annually.

There were 420 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 50 more than the previous week and 56 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 229 were males and 191 females: 44 died of consumption; 28 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 16 of cancer; 15 of diphtheria and 8 of apoplexy.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, new, 104½ to 105½; 3's, reg., 109½ to 110½; 4's, reg., 114½ to 115½; new 4's, 134 to 135; 5's, 113½ to 114½.

COTTON closed on a basis of 11½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR—Winter, super., $2.40 to $2.60; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.40 to $3.50; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.65; spring, straight, $3.60 to $3.90; city mills, straight, $3.45 to $3.65. RYE FLOUR—$3.00 to $3.10 per barrel, as to quality.

GRAIN—No. 2 red wheat, 74½ to 74½c.
No. 2 mixed corn, 46½ to 46½c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 28½c.

BEEF CATTLE—Extra, 5½ to 5½c.; good, 5¼ to 5¼c.; medium, 4¾ to 5c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS—Extra, 4½ to 4½c.; good, 4 to 4c.; common, 1½ to 2½c.; spring lambs, 4½ to 6½c.

HOGS—8 to 8½c. for best Western.

FOREIGN—It is asserted that all the Powers have accepted Li Hung Chang, and will probably accept Prince Ching as negotiators. Also that the Powers have agreed to insist that a central Government, satisfactory to the Powers, shall be established in China, and that full retribution shall be exacted for the attacks upon the legations.

A special dispatch from Berlin says that Great Britain and Germany have agreed not to evacuate Pekin until full satisfaction for the recent outrages has been obtained.

A despatch from London says: All the correspondents in China are sending terrible stories of the wholesale massacre of missionaries and native Christians. It is asserted that between fifteen and twenty thousand converts were massacred in the northern provinces. Native reports are subjected to the most careful scrutiny, with the result that, although there may be some exaggeration, it is impossible to doubt that in the main they are correct.

A despatch from Pekin of the 5th says: "Proclamations dated in the Sixth Month from princes and the highest Government authorities, military and civil, have been found posted about, praising the Boxers and ordering the people to contribute to their support. One from the chief of police announced that the foreigners were being exterminated, and must be killed wherever discovered, and that rewards will be paid by him if they are captured alive."

Another despatch says: "The allied generals had conferred how best to encourage the Chinese to return to work. It was agreed that looting should cease and that foraging parties should hereafter be accompanied by an officer, who should give receipts for all supplies taken."

Some fighting has taken place in several districts between European troops and Chinese.

In Manchuria, which became virtually a Russian province before the outbreak of the troubles in China, it is reported that there has been much fighting; many Russians have been killed, and 200 miles of Russian railway have been destroyed.

The Boer delegates at the Hague have addressed an appeal to all nations for intervention in South Africa. They assert that the South African Republics have shown themselves to be worthy of liberty, and that they will continue to struggle to the last breath against Great Britain's attempt to annihilate their existence as a free people. The appeal concludes as follows: "In the name of justice and humanity we appeal to all peoples to come to our aid in this supreme moment and save our country. We commit ourselves to God, trusting that our prayers will be heard."

The late President Kruger, with Reitz and the archives of the South African Republic, has crossed the Portuguese frontier, and arrived at Lorenzo Marquez, with the view of sailing for Europe at an early date. Kruger has formally resigned the position which he held as President of the South African Republic, thus severing his official connection with the Transvaal.

The Government of the Netherlands offers the use of a warship to transport Kruger from Lorenzo Marquez to Europe.

The plague is again increasing in India. Over 1,000 deaths from the disease are reported to have occurred in India last week.

The number of Mohammedans in the world is about 196,500,000. Of these 18,000,000 are under the rule of the Turkish Government, 23,000,000 are ruled by other Mussulman sovereigns 36,500,000 are subject to African princes, 20,000,000 live in China and 99,000,000 are under Christian rulers. Of these last, about 58,000,000 are under British rule.

New Brunswick possesses immense forests of hardwoods, the principal woods being the beech, birch, maple, elm, ash and butternut, all suitable for making furniture. These great sources of wealth have been but little drawn upon, but now they are beginning to attract attention and a large trade in these woods manufactured or partially manufactured may be expected.

Experiments have been conducted at Honolulu with the extract of the Venezuelan shrub, Tua Tua, which is said to be a cure for leprosy. The experts report partial, favorable results.

RECEIPTS.

Unless otherwise specified, two dollars have been received from each person, paying for vol. 74.

Adolphus E. Harvey, Mo., $1, to No. 39, vol. 74
Rebecca E. Buzby, N. J.; E. H. Richie, N. J.; Guliema Neill and Sarah T. Cope, O.; A. W. Leeds for J. Borton Hayes, N. J.; Richard Wistar, N. J., per Jessie Wister; Mary E. Ogden, Pa.; Albertus L. Hoyt, N. J.; Wm. B. Hokett, agent, N. C., for Jesse I. Hokett, vol. 72; Robert R. Hulme, Gtn.; Samuel Trimble, M. D., Pa.; Philena Y. Smedley and Florence W. Smedley, Pa.; D. Thompson Mitchell, Del. Sarah B. DeCou, N. J.; John W. Hilyard, N. J.; Robert H. Smith, O.

Remittances received after Third-day noon will not appear in the Receipts until the following week.

NOTICES.

WANTED.—Situation as companion or helper to elderly woman, by a young woman Friend, a graduate of Westtown. Address "C" at this office.

WANTED.—Opportunity to teach young children primary studies, by a young woman Friend, a graduate of kindergarten training school.

Address "M" at this office.

A YOUNG woman Friend of experience wishes a situation as companion to an elderly lady.

Address, S. C. G.,

Care B. Cope. Keunett Square, Pa.

In Haverford College grounds the undersigned furnish a home and tutoring for eight boys. They attend the Haverford College Grammar School, opening Ninth Month 26, 1900. Special attention to preparation of daily lessons. Two vacancies. At home after Ninth Month 1900.

Apply to

HENRY N. HOXIE, A. M.,

ALMA B. HOXIE.

Haverford P. O.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage will run trains leaving Philadelphia 7.17 and 8.19 A. M., and 2 and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when request Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., twenty cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, Westtown Station or West Chester, Phone 85.

EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Supt.

DIED, at the residence of their son-in-law, Elwell Heald, near Coal Creek, Keokuk County, Iowa, on eighteenth of Sixth Month, 1900, LYDIA B. HOGE, wife John Hoge, in the seventy-eighth year of her age, valued member and elder of Coal Creek Monthly Particular Meeting of Friends, Iowa. She had long been a regular attender of all our religious meetings, both worship and Discipline, until deprived thereof by declining health, which took place several months previous to close. During this time she felt a lively interest in welfare of her beloved Society, of which she had been a life-long member. Although her strength was evidently giving way, the close was more sudden than many of her friends expected. Yet we have a comfortable trust through redeeming love and mercy she has been permitted to enter the pearl gate where anything unclean never enter.

On ninth of Eighth Month, 1900, SAMUEL HULL, Jr., aged forty-two years, son of Rachel S. and the Samuel Hulme; a member of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting of Friends for the Northern District.

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, NINTH MONTH 29, 1900.

No. 11.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,

South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth,

PHILADELPHIA.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

all We Gain Time to Lose it or to Save it?

The town clock has struck eight in the middle of our evening hour for public worship, and its ringing tones are forever blended with the past. It is at once become the text for an unbroken meditation. How accurately it is given to this generation to measure its time! Instantly all men at once may know the moment an hour's beginning and its ending. But the lack of time-pieces in past ages this knowledge was indefinite. The writers of the New Testament Scriptures could but vaguely say, "about the sixth hour," or "about the seventh hour," for the beginning of an event; and much time must have been lost in gathering to public appointments, while waiting for the time "about" a certain hour of commencement to transpire. Now our watches and pocket-clocks as time-savers make punctuality possible, and banish the excuse of ignorance when we waste our own time or that of others. And then the many more time-gainers that are invented,—means of travel to distant points in as many hours as it once took days to reach them; modes of communicating messages within seconds of time where once weeks or months were required; shorter modes of writing;—a thousand modern conveniences abbreviate our time for accomplishing desired things.

But the serious question is, what are we disposed to do with the time thus gained,—is it added to our lives? Is the time gained to be saved, or lost? No time is saved, except as it is employed in saving us. All other time gained, we lose. And if modern machinery gains us time which we employ only in processes of forgetting God and our own souls' good, it heaps upon us a woeful weight of responsibility. If we shorten processes of business only to make more time to crowd in ever absorbing business, and leave ourselves no moment for waiting upon God, we certainly are living blindly "without hope and without God in the world," only to hear at the last, "What hast thou done with thy Lord's money?"

We have no doubt Divine Providence would let men find means of gaining time much faster, if the time gained would also be saved;—if it would be employed in improving and elevating ways. But the human race cannot be trusted with time of which it is unworthy, and must for a while longer be drudging and toiling as a safe means of discipline and keeping it from mischief. It would be a calamity to shorten hours of labor in order to give hours for degradation. But it is to our mind an evidence that the world is growing better, in that it is allowed to shorten processes of industry to the extent that we now see; as if men could be trusted with more leisure for improvement and for enjoying the works and thoughts of the Creator.

And if men would co-operate with the Divine Providence of a Christian civilization enough to help Him give them more time, by abandoning their own superfluities of social life and vanity, and abstaining from taxing themselves, their husbands, wives, fathers and brothers with unnecessary things of time and sense, how much more time could be saved for the enjoyment of our Heavenly Father and Saviour, of each other's society, of improving literature or study, of helpfulness to mankind, and of the power of an endless life! If we will not, by plainer living and higher thinking, give ourselves more of the time He gives us, how can we expect Him to give us more of that which we have so often proved we will use unworthily?

But there are many spending lives of sacrifice in toil whom the Master well knows would be faithful to duty in time saved. If He accepts the will for the deed, and entrusts them with work instead of leisure they are equally honored. And may the joy of the Lord at times be their strength in a foretaste of this blessing when He saith: "Thou hast been faithful in a few things,—enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

PHILADELPHIA'S contribution for the Galveston sufferers which two weeks ago overwhelmed the governor of Texas with wonder has now reached the sum of $80,000. That of the comparative handful of English Friends for starving India has exceeded that amount by $45,000, with a prospect of $25,000 more to be added.

The Wincing Fan.

Persecution has ever winnowed the church. Through much tribulation men have ever entered the kingdom of God. Prosperity tempts the lovers of ease and luxury, adversity scatters the fair-weather friends, and tests the courage of those who remain. If we had more persecution, we should doubtless have a purer church and a more effective ministry. Preaching for a salary of forty stripes save one, ministers would not devote their time to the discussion of the "artistic and æsthetic," or "the objective and the subjective;" they would preach Christ Jesus in a language which the common people could understand. Bonds and afflictions, stripes and imprisonments, would clear the church of time-servers and place-seekers, and many men would either stop preaching, or preach much better than they preach now. They would wait till they had a message from on high, and instead of listening to a human call would go on under a Divine commission. "How shall they preach except they be sent?" The quickening power of persecution and reproach would arouse the manhood which lies dormant in many a soul, and many a preacher who drones his message to a drowsy congregation, if quickened by the spur of persecution [and, above all, by the quickening Spirit], would become a voice crying in the wilderness, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord."
—H. L. Hastings.

Nine Definitions of Duty.

Duty—that which man owes to God and man.—William H. Cord.

Duty is the fulfilment of all known law.—John Semones.

Duty is doing the right thing at the right time.—W. C. Armstrong.

Duty is God's will done—moral obligation revered by work.—C. Poling.

Duty is the full measure of man's obligation gauged by the Golden Rule.—C. G. Steinhart.

Duty is that the doing of which at any given moment is the only course that will put us in right relation to self, to man and God.—T. F. Murphy.

Duty is our obligation, or what we ought to do in view of all law, written or unwritten, natural or spiritual.—Wharton.

A debt we owe; the debt of love,
To man below; to God above:
One we should pay to young and old
Each passing day in deeds of gold.

—Stapley.

Duty is that one thing which an enlightened conscience tells us we ought to do or say at a certain time; a debt we owe humanity, including ourselves. Duties often come in numbers, but each has its own order of time and place, and never conflict when these are rightly assigned.—D. W. Morrison.

"Upon His Shoulder."

And the government shall be upon his shoulder." Isa. ix. 6.

In the early part of our work in India, we were so situated that if one of us left the work for a change the other had to tarry "by the stuff," so that in six years my husband and I never had an outing together. Traveling in India is not always what it is in America. In addition to this, when I traveled I always had the care of the children and their comfort, beside all the luggage to look after.

But there came a time of weariness and prostration after an illness, when toothache set in and I was racked with pain and sleeplessness. I needed a change of air and to go to the dentist's, but was too weak to make the journey alone to Bombay with three little children, so my husband accompanied us. I can never tell any one the luxury of that journey—to have no care or responsibility, nothing to do but to let everything go into my husband's hands and rest! If little Margaret fretted or was hungry, he soothed her. If the other children were restless he restrained them. When we changed cars in the evening, I did not have to think anything about the parcels to see if they were all taken out or have a care about anything. I just did what he told me to do, and he took all the responsibility. How delicious the sense of abandonment was! I had utterly no care. I can never forget it. Afterward a voice said: "If thou would let all your life and work go into My hands, I would take all the care and responsibility of everything, and thou might rest and be free." Yes, I understood it afresh. I could let go the strain and push and care, and let the government be "upon his shoulders." I knew then what it meant by "Casting all your care upon Him; for He careth for you."

God often has to repeat our lessons. After I had known rest of heart for a long time, and I had proclaimed it to many, I came to circumstances where I had to make an important decision wherein the welfare of others depended upon what I chose. All unconsciously I began bearing the burden of the responsibility. I grew troubled. I took up the old habit of sighing as I went about my work. It was at a time when summer was merging into autumn and the air was often very chill. I noticed as I took baby Jean out that her cap was thin, and I would resolve to put a lining in it. But the resolve would soon be forgotten as other perplexities pressed in upon me.

At last God spoke to my heart. One morning I awoke as usual troubled and under a cloud. I went down to the breakfast table, saying, "Oh, if I only knew what God wanted!" and hoping that the morning mail would bring me some token of his will. The mail came, but there was nothing for me but a newspaper. With a feeling of disappointment I opened it carelessly, when, lo, from the inside of the newspaper fell two soft, wadded China-silk baby cap linings! What a halt there was in my soul! I stood still like one whom God had rebuked. The rebuke was very real. God seemed to say: "Why art thou so troubled? If I with the government of worlds upon my shoulder can remember that thy baby's cap needs a lining and can provide for it, can thou not trust me with thy affairs?" How quickly I rolled the government upon his shoulder, and He did decide most wonderfully for us.

Wearily, troubled hearts, can you not let the government of all your life, your work and of those about you, rest upon his shoulder? He declares that "the government shall be upon his shoulder," and He only wants your faith to assent to it, so that He can make it a blessed reality.—Texts Illuminated.

The Advantages and Disadvantages of the Marriage State.

(Continued from page 79.)

Another thing I observed, that after he had begun his journey, the king of Israel (whose subject he was) sent him some young lambs to feed; with a strict charge to teach them diligently in the way, and bring them up in his nurture and admonition. But the performance of this command was rendered impracticable; for as he instructed them to go right, she induced them to wander; as he endeavored to gather them, she scattered them; and as he fed them with wholesome food, she would surfeit them with poisonous herbs. So, which way the king disposed of them afterwards I never knew; but they never prospered under his care.

Thus her company never yielded him the least benefit or assistance, through his whole journey; but was an alloy to all his joys, and an aggravation to all his sorrows. And it frequently caused him very much regret of mind, to think of his own unadvised engagement; and of the much neglect in duty, wandering, and lost time, which it had been the occasion of to him; as well as to observe the wretched stupefaction of her mind, which was incapable of sharing in any of his blessed enjoyments, or of being affected with any of his calamities. Inasmuch as it turned his pleasant journey into a wearisome travel through a lonely wilderness.

But at last, through many dull hours, fatigues and tiresome steps, he arrived near the borders of the land, upon the bank of the river Jordan, where in the midst of the stream, he beheld a man in a rich priestly vesture, standing to stop the current, till he passed over, which made him approach the river, exceedingly transported with joy. Yet, even here he could not refrain from sighing, when he found it was not possible for his companion to go with him one step further. But the glory of his Prince, now in view, and the joy of approaching the promised land, soon revived his spirits, and made him with readiness leave her to pass the river. Here his burdens dropped off, and all his clogs were left behind him; he went on with fresh vigor, and cheerfulness in his countenance, as if all things were forgotten but the joy that was before him. But as he was taking some of his last steps, just ready to set his feet on Canaan's shore, he looked behind him and saw her sitting upon the sand; and beheld the river returning with such an overflow as carried her along the rapid stream into the Dead Sea.

As for the elder brother, son of the free-woman, when he heard the instructions and admonitions, it wrought some serious reflections in his mind; and made him very deliberate. Notwithstanding he was a person of bright genius, great vivacity and a fine taste, he determined to deny himself; so when he saw the beauty and graceful mien, and heard the courteous conversation of the Babylonish maids, he would withdraw from them, and turn away his eyes, lest his heart should be ensnared.

However, it sometimes fell in his way to have conversation with some who appeared very agreeable and engaging, and might have some influence on his affections. Especial one, whose person, birth, circumstances, virtues and accomplishments rendered her extremely agreeable, and made her appear very promising, to make a valuable companion. It is so much that many of his acquaintance greatly encouraged him to pursue that opportunity and not neglect so valuable a prize. This made him a little stagger; for indeed she wanted no accomplishment but the language of Canaan to make her just such an one as his heart could wish, and caused him to reason on his own mind, with such interrogations and replies as these:

Q. Can I expect to find a person more desirable, or one more likely to be a happy companion and a helpmeet?

A. She may prove so to a person who can be conformable to stay with her in Babylon; but as I am bound to another country, I might find bitterness in that which would appear happiness to another person.

Q. But have I not reason to hope that person of her refined qualities may be endued with such blessings as to make her a suitable companion for me in my journey.

A. A person may be accomplished, with the refinements, improvements and excellencies of Babylon, so as to appear superior to many of her citizens; but if these be only accommodations of their own country, they can only make a gradual difference between them and the most abject peasants; whereas there is necessarily a specific difference between a Babylonian and an Israelite.

Q. But is it not very censorious to look upon such a becoming, worthy person as no better than a mere Babylonian?

A. Inasmuch as the difference is so great that a Babylonian cannot become a subject of the king of Israel, unless he be formed aright, we cannot esteem them any other, so long as there do not appear the specific features of the select nation; neither the idiom of their language, nor the mein of their behavior, or yet an earnest inquiry after the desired land. For we are not to form our conceptions of them different from the descriptions given by the king's scribes.

Q. Is it not exceeding hard that I must deny myself an object so agreeable?

A. The King of Glory denies nothing that is good, therefore if it were really good it would not be denied me; He only denies those things which He knows would be detrimental to me, and it is a real kindness to us to be denied them. But suppose I thought it a real good, is it hard that He should deny me one for whom He has given himself to me, with all blessings in heaven and earth?

Q. What if I never find one so agreeable who travels the happy road?

A. If I had the object now before me, must entirely depend on the blessing of God, whether I should have any enjoyment or not, and have I not more reason to expect a blessing in the right way than in the wrong? Besides, as no good thing is withheld, nor anything denied but because it is evil; what God is pleased to bestow in his own way, must be most agreeable.

Q. May not the valuable qualifications attending this person, be so blessed as to be a means to make me happy and useful in the way, though she walk not in it herself?

A. Have I any reason to expect to be made happy by a person who is an utter stranger to those things wherein my happiness consists? Or can I expect to find usefulness in this way, from that which cannot be enjoyed or obtained without going out of the way? Beside, whatever qualifications she is endowed with, or however valuable accommodations she is possessed of, it never will be her inclination to employ those excellences to assist others in a way which she herself hath no delight in.

Q. But seeing her disposition is so agreeably complaisant, and her mind so well qualified with natural virtues, and decorated with so many acquired ornaments; is there any reason to doubt that a person thus prepared will have taste for learning and embracing the best thing? And may I not therefore expect to be an instrument to engage her mind to walk the blessed way?

A. All the accomplishments that a person can possibly receive from Babylon, can never qualify or dispose them from travelling to Canaan; nor will it by any means induce or induce any person to receive the real knowledge of love of that country. Therefore those who are not powerfully called by the King's commandment, and inwardly attracted by a vital influence, can never be engaged by any other motive or persuasion whatsoever. For there is nothing in the nature of a Babylonian, without the inchoation of new principles, that is capable of attraction. But the more excellent her accomplishments are, the more strongly her mind will be cemented to that climate from whence she received them. And on the other hand, as I formerly was a Babylonian, though now blessed with new principles, the old tincture still remains in my nature, which, like so much tinder, is ready to kindle with every spark of Babylonish fire. Wherefore the greater excellences she is embellished with, the greater influence she will have to draw me aside into her paths, and so put me in perpetual danger. Of this I am infallibly assured, that they will draw away one's heart.

When he had thus reasoned with himself, he made a full pause; and appeared in a strong agitation of mind; and a paleness arose in his face, and I heard him sigh and say to himself, "Whither has my mind been roving!" and trembling, he lifted up his eyes to heaven and earnestly cried, "O God of all grace, deliver me from temptation!" And from that time he never would regard any of the damsels of the city, but said he would wait till he should find true companion; and till then he would walk alone.

So he went on his way, rejoicing that he had escaped the snare, and carrying along with him this motto, "The Lord is my portion," finding great satisfaction in his own mind, saying to himself, If my King sees it good for me to walk alone, I know He will bless that state to me; but if it be for my good to enjoy a companion, I know his goodness will provide one for me, without my going out of the way to find one.

(To be concluded.)

Kindness Among Animals.

When a baby brother does such provoking things that it is hard to keep your temper, and when a little sister "tags" after you, till you think half the pleasure in life is gone, just think a little of the courtesy which even the animals show to those younger and weaker than themselves. Dr. Woods Hutchinson has written an article for the Contemporary Review in which he speaks of this remarkable trait as shown by four-footed creatures. He says:

There is, I think, little question that in the main there runs a sort of unwritten law through the animal kingdom, that infancy, and even childhood, are entitled to certain rights of immunity which must be respected. . . . The attitude of animals toward the young of their own species is, we think, almost uniform, most of us having probably seen instances of it. I was once the proud possessor of a fine English setter, a dog of handsome presence and a most Hibernian delight in fighting. He would face any dog, and, indeed, had thrashed and been recognized as the master of most in the neighborhood, but if a young puppy or kitten were suddenly presented to him he would turn tail and flee in apparent terror. Upon several occasions I tried the experiment of holding him with one hand by the collar, and presenting the sprawling and whining object with the other, and it was really comical to see how he would shrink and shut his eyes, turn his face aside and whimper. It is, of course, possible that the feelings of the big dog were merely comparable to those of the average bachelor when suddenly brought into the presence of a wee infant and asked to "hold the baby."

There are few prettier sights in the world than to see a great, dignified, battle-scarred wolfhound lying in the sun, with an impudent, little doll's-door-mat-on-four-legs of a tarrier puppy yapping in his face, tugging at his ears, and tumbling all over his back. If you can come upon him unawares, so that he does not know that you are watching, you will see that he is not merely submitting with passive toleration to these indignities, but is actually entering into the sport of the thing, taking the puppy's head, and even half his body, into his great mouth, flattening him down gently with a stroke of his huge paw, and I have actually seen him get up and follow the little chap as he toddled about the yard, as if loth to relinquish the sport.

The flag of truce is extended even to their natural enemy, the cat, while in the kitten stage. I have never had the slightest difficulty in bringing up kittens to cathood on terms of intimacy, even of warm friendship, with from two to a dozen dogs (any one of whom would have instantly flown at a strange cat) merely by introducing them as very young kittens.

But in my association of dogs I have found that it is only a very morose and ill-tempered dog who will seriously attack young kittens, and usually even he requires to be urged on by the "higher" (?) animal, man. . . . It might be mentioned in this connection that, as a rule, no dog of size or courage will condescend to attack a smaller or obviously weaker dog, unless the remarks and the actions of the latter become insulting beyond endurance.

The sense of obligation to interfere actively on behalf of the younger or weaker members of their species is widely spread through the animal kingdom. In attempting to capture young pigs, which have escaped their pen, and are running at large among the herd of perhaps fifty or sixty full-grown hogs, it is necessary to be most circumspect in your method of picking up a youngster, for if once his shrill little squeal of distress is raised you will have the entire herd down on you at once, bristles up and fierce war-cry ringing. It would be most unwise to await the onset, for a half-wild pig, when his blood is up and that danger-cry is ringing in his ears, is one of the most reckless and ferocious fighters that can be met with. . . . Cattle have the same curious susceptibility to the cry of a frightened calf, especially in their half-wild condition, upon the ranges. To startle suddenly a young calf from its nest in the long grass or the sage-bush upon the plains is one of the riskiest experiences that can fall to your lot, if on foot and at any distance from your horse or wagon. The little goose is almost sure to do one of two things: either to trot confidently towards you and shamble along after you as though he were your dog, which means that he does you the compliment of mistaking you for his mother; or with head and tail erect, and rigid with terror, he will give voice to an appalling succession of barking "blarts," totally unlike the ordinary dinner-cry to his mother; and every horned creature within three-quarters of a mile will go fighting-mad at once and come charging and bellowing down upon you. And woe betide you unless you can reach your horse or wagon before they arrive on the scene.

Animals, I am thankful to say, have never yet succeeded in absolutely steeling their hearts against the cry of infantile distress. Man alone has reached this pinnacle of virtue. And it is not the only elevation of the same sort of which he has a monopoly.

The courtesy with which the privileges of the sex are respected is a most creditable feature of canine conduct. I do not, of course, refer merely to the elaborate display of politeness and fine manners seen everywhere during the period of courtship. Courtesy to and respect for the weaker sex goes far beyond this. No self-respecting dog will bite a female, except in the extremest need of self-defense.

. . . So strong is this unwillingness to "strike a female," that it really becomes a most annoying obstacle in attempting to clear a neighborhood of wolves, as few male dogs are willing to attack a female wolf.

COMPOSURE of soul is the gift of the Holy Spirit. We do not achieve it, we receive it. It is a life of rest. It consists in the denial of self and the infling of the Spirit. We cannot earn it by effort, but we may seek it as a bestowment from God, under our dedication to his will. We have something to do in the way of abandoning sin, renouncing idolatries, and preparing the way of the Lord; but Christ revealed the secret of it when He said to his disciples, "Receive ye the Holy Spirit."

"THE idea that needs to be constantly pressed upon men is that the gospel is a source and not a sequence—the one originating cause of all that any where is good in human life and society."—N. Y. Observer.

THE AGED MINISTER'S PRAYER.

"Cast me not off in the time of old age; forsake me not when my strength faileth.

"Now also when I am old and grayheaded, O God, forsake me not" (Psalm lxxi: 9, 18).

Forsake me not when I am old,
When evening's shadow comes apace;
When life is drawing to its close,
When nearing the eventful race.

Long years have passed since thou didst call,
And gladly I Thy call obeyed;
I took the task Thou didst assign,
Thy message, Lord, was not delayed.

To humankind, both far and near,
I took the light Thou gavest me;
Within the quiet vale at home,
And far across the distant sea.

The stalwart frame once mine is gone,
My sight is dim, my locks are gray,
My step enfeebled has become:
No shelter find I by the way.

Dear Lord, I took thee at thy word,
Thou didst provide through all these years,
Forsake me not when I am old,
Stretch forth thy hand and dry these tears.

Forsake me not, O Lord my God,
In time of age, when strength doth fail,
Forsake me not; forsake me not;
With Thee, O Lord, I would prevail.

The Church at length has heard the cry;
It hastens to perform his will;
It bears the burden of his saints,
In doing, doth Christ's law fulfil.

—Episcopal Recorder.

THE DEAD LINE.—Around the guarded camp occupied by prisoners of war, a line is drawn called the "dead line," marking off a space over which prisoners may not come. They are not allowed to come to the outer edge, or to the extreme limits of their enclosure. They are to keep at a distance from the boundary, and the space marked by the dead line tells them how far they can come with safety. Crossing that line, they are liable to be shot at sight; remaining within it, they are safe from harm.

God guards men from sin, and He does it by commanding them to halt at a distance from it; by drawing a dead line around it; by restraining men, not only from evil acts but from evil thoughts and evil desires. He not only forbids men to do the prohibited thing, but he forbids them to wish to do it, or to think of doing it. He marks the beginning of evil in the secret thoughts of the heart, and warns people away from every form of evil, nipping it in the bud and bidding men beware of the very thought which leads to sin.

Many unwary souls have been lost by crossing the dead line, dallying with temptation, going too near the presence of evil, until finally they have been drawn in and swept downward into the abyss. The Christian's safety is not in seeing how firmly he can stand in the midst of temptation, but how far he can flee from its very presence, so that in thought, and purpose, and heart, as well as in life, he may be like the great exemplar, "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners."—H. L. H.

"It requires an average of more than twenty million pins per day to sustain the falling skirts, replace the missing suspender buttons and meet other needs of the American people."

How to Understand China.

It would be a great mistake to despise China, or to underrate her prodigious capacities, either to enhance the prosperity of the nations, or to give them a long period of perturbation. This is a third of the whole human race which seems to be going mad against civilization. And he who imagines they have not the fighting gift in their blood should read the chronicles of the thirteenth century, and see how the Mongols under Jenghiz Kahn subdued Tibet, Afghanistan, Bokhara and the khanates; pushed on to Persia and the Caspian; and under Sabutai, "the soldier," burned Moscow and Kieff, razed to the ground the city of Lublin and caused the burning of Cracow, and at the Battle of Liegnitz, in 1241, broke and routed the Christian army under Duke Henry of Silesia. In about a year these Mongols of the middle ages overran Central Europe, and Englishmen and Americans might to-day be wearing pigtailed, be obeying mandarins and have Confucius for their moral and spiritual guide, if Ogdai, the son of the great Mongol khan, had not suddenly died, necessitating the recall of the terrible Sabutai. That did much to save Europe from the "yellow peril" six hundred years ago, as the Battle of Lepanto preserved it from becoming Mohammedan.

Do you think the world is quite safe to-day from the swarming descendants of Ogdai and Sabutai? Not so! Even commercially and industrially they could swamp our labor markets if a single passage of Confucius might but receive a new and freer interpretation. As it now stands, a good Chinaman must be buried in Chinese soil, and the bodies of emigrating Celestials are embalmed for this purpose, and brought back to China at huge expense. A Chinese servant of mine, questioned about this, said to me in pigeon English: "Master plenty savee, but no savee this! Sposity me bury Frisco, me go bottom-sick place. Sposity me bury Canton, Nankin, Pekin, me go top-side place!"

When I spoke to a mandarin on the subject, and inquired whether Confucius's spirit would not rest content with the throwing of a handful of veritable Chinese earth into the Chinaman's grave in an alien soil, he laid his hand on my lips and said: "Hush, elder brother! It is as you say; but were this known the world would be deluged with Chinese, seeking foreign employment."

* CONFUCIUS, THE KEY TO CHINA.

You will never understand China until you study Confucius, or at least learn enough about that extraordinary personage to get some notion of the way in which, and of the reasons because of which he, and he alone, has crystallized the Middle Kingdom into that changeless mass of custom and impenetrable convention which gives it its practical invulnerability.

China cannot and will not be altered. No spread of commerce, no impulse of education, no influence of scientific inventions, it seems to me, will for many generations to come transform the minds and lives of the "Flowery Land." And the reason is ever Confucius! The Chinese, one and all, it may be roundly stated, have allowed their souls and bodies, their homes and business, their social, civil and political condition to be forever regulated by "Kong-fu-tse." In every city, town and village of China you will see the vermilion colored temple of the great teacher. Every where are painted and gilded tablets inscribed with his precepts. The emperor and the chief magnates of the empire must, at stated intervals, do homage to his immortal and most sacred memory, and his writings or oral instructions constitute the classics and the holy writ of Chinese youth. All that need be known to estimate the nature of the famous philosopher and the character of his teachings may easily be gathered from the last two volumes mentioned on the list of Sir John Lubbock's (now Lord Asbury) "Best Hundred Books." These are a "Life of Confucius" and an anthology of passages from the Chinese scriptures, both from the erudite pen of W. Jennings, M. A.

The first of these admirable works, written without prejudice, nay, indeed, with all the catholic largeness of an educated scholar and a liberal churchman, shows clearly enough that Confucius was an opportunist—the most unprincipled of moralists, the most unspiritual of theologians, an advocate of expediency above principle, of propriety above rectitude, of custom above convenience, of this life rather than of what he deemed the doubtful future. One of the gloomy and paralyzing sayings he bequeathed to his country is this: "Heaven ever spoken?" And nevertheless, he was a religious and a superstitious man, as were his compatriots.

CHINESE AND MISSIONARIES.

Nobody can doubt the "other-worldliness" of the Chinese who has seen them, as I have, scattering silver joss-paper in a tempestuous sea, to appease the spirit of the storm; piously sticking dollars in a pile of sugar pay for the embalming and correct burial of a comrade; or reverentially burning their incense sticks and making costly offerings at the tombs of their parents, relations and ancestors. It is that profound principle of reverence for ancestors and for the past, given them by Confucius, which helps to make China so strong, united and formidable. It is alone the Jews who honor father and mother in the faith that their days will be long in the land. It is a law of nature which in Japan and China gives extraordinary stability to national life, and of which the Western world has seen and fatally lost hold.

Confucius gave his China this and many other noble gifts, ethical and social. But he gave her also his opportunism; his moralism based upon etiquette, not love and goodness; his patriotism, founded on exclusiveness; his duty and self-sacrifice; his religion, which is an agnosticism, guarded by ceremonies, never touched into tenderness by universal love of humanity, nor lifted into loftiness by faith in the Divine government; and a deplorably low estimate of woman and woman's role in the household and the world. Also, he, too, by his dead influence, has chiefly contributed to stultify Chinese education; to make his descendants blind votaries constantly content with their old-fashioned and very limited "classical" and to impose on pupils and the literati an absurd, cumbrous, eye-torturing alphabet which makes us more than ever grateful to Cadmus.

Consequently, I am by no means one of those who have been inclined to lay any part of me for recent troubles in China upon the ads of the missionaries. On the contrary, I mire and reverence those devoted men and men,—many of whom I know are Amerins,—and I regard them as taking to China ecisely the commodities of which she stands ost in need, namely, a spiritual religion and morality based on the fear of God and the ve of man. That their zeal and self-abnegan have sometimes been the source of incon-nience to diplomatists, and of trouble to taos, is unfortunately too well known to be put; and in China, above all, it is necessary that the most ardent evangelism should be tempered with wisdom and prudence.

But what right could the civilized world int upon with more justification than the clear plain right for her representatives to eak the truth as they see it and know it, acefully and sincerely, in the ears of such as e willing to listen to it? . . .

It will be seen now why I have recalled at-tion to those old stupendous victories of the diæval Chinese in Central Asia and Eastern rope. Let it be realized how, with bows d arrows, and against the chivalry of Chrisdom, the Mongol fighting-man came victo-usly as far as Budapest in Hungary on his ad of conquest, and almost accomplished the jugation of Europe, not by numbers, but by diership and nobility. An enlightened iter, speaking of Sabutai's wonderful triphs, has truly remarked:

"The curious fact is that these victories re not accomplished, as represented by the nks of the time, by mere pressure of num-s, nor like some of our own conquests, by erior equipment. The Mongol leader was ebted for success throughout to nothing but e discipline of his troops and his own won-ful strategy. The Tartar forces were all unted, and were divided into small independ-nt commands of some fifty men each, drawn in five ranks. Of these, the last three re armed with bows and javelins, in the use which they were very expert. The two nt ranks wore armor consisting of iron tes sewn on leather coats, after the fashion d to be seen in Japanese curio-shops, and re in the habit of charging with sword and ce when the enemy was sufficiently shaken the missiles of their followers. But although h their equipment and formation made m more mobile than the mail-clad knights h which they were mostly confronted in rope, this would have been of little service hout the wonderful discipline which enabled ir general perfectly to time their movents.

"The Tartar force that fought at Liegnitz vanced as usual in three divisions, one cross-the Lower Vistula, while another was comdown the Oder to Breslau. Yet they ted with perfect punctuality before the bat-and thus forced Duke Henry to fight with m just one day before the king of Bohe-
 's army could arrive and perhaps turn the le against them.

"Equally masterly was the leading of Sabu-himself at Miskolcz, where he compelled a erior host to follow him from a position ere they were impregnable to one of his own osing where he could defeat them in detail.
 t should the perfection of Sabutai's intellice department be lost sight of. Thanks to a well-organized band of spies, among whom the Jews and the Venetians are said to have played a principal part, he was always able to put his hand on the weak point of the enemy's defences, and then to strike at it with all his force."

AGGRESSIVENESS IMPROBABLE.

Now, as we have seen only too fatally at the Taku forts, at Tientsin and elsewhere, this marvelous and populous Chinese Empire has acquired modern weapons; can and does make its own gunpowder and artillery, and has learned—partly from the Japanese war and partly from European instructors—the secrets of scientific belligerence. Who could measure the danger, if the old spirit of the Mongol and Tartar should be revived by blunders or defeats of civilization, and such a vast portion of the human family abandon trade and industry for an aggressive and revengeful policy abroad and at home?

The thing is possible, although I believe it most improbable. For the Chinaman, speaking broadly, is a pacific person, little concerned about his rulers, so long as they keep the peace for him, and let him and his pockets alone; a member of a community too enormous and really various to feel deeply patriotic. A Hongkong native professor confessed to me that he did not know a perfect word for "patriotism."

A curious feature of the present situation has been the spectacle of the stepping forward of Japan to be the protagonist of the great powers, and by far the most effective agent in the taking of Tientsin and the first measures for the re-establishment of order. This is not the first time such a thing has happened. Few know the spirited and romantic story of how the renowned Kublai Khan invaded the Empire of Dai-Nippon with an immense fleet and stupendous army, and how he was ignominiously defeated and driven home to China by the Emperor of Japan and his fearless fishermen and soldiers.

If, however, the Chinese are naturally and nationally peaceful, with many civic and personal qualities which should render them as useful and agreeable a portion of the human family as they are undoubtedly important, what accounts for this deplorable temper of intolerance, this savage cruelty, this mad hatred of the "foreign devil," lately so apparent and so widespread? The correct answer does not lie, I believe, wholly or even largely in the social or commercial or civil spheres of the flowery land.

We must allow something, but by no means everything in the dismal and crimson problem, to the conservative prejudices of the peasant and citizen, who certainly does not want our missionaries, or our ships, or our ambassadors, or our habits and customs, or anything European except our silver, our oil and our calicoes.
 But this very widespread feeling would,
 and does, everywhere disappear or become diminished, if it were not secretly utilized, fomented and diverted to the purpose of political intrigue and conspiracy in China.

THE ROOT OF THE TROUBLE.

The main cause of the perpetually seething unrest there is due, I myself consider, to the rooted and implacable desire of the true Chinese element in the empire to be quit forever of the detested Manchu Dynasty. My friend,

 W. Jennings, who knows China well by long residence, assured me that the secret societies with which the land is honeycombed—the "Triads," the "Red Lilies," the "Harmonious Righteous Fists," or "Boxers," and the rest of such—almost all have one hidden common watchword, which is, "Down with the Tsing and bring back the Ming!"

Here, then, is the keystone of the situation
 —the occult difficulty which renders all European policy futile, and makes the future of China so dubious. There is this eternal struggle proceeding beneath the surface of political and civil life, between the Chinese and Tartar elements, and both make cunning and evil use of the national prejudices against the foreigners. The Tsing and the Ming are always, like our lion and unicorn, "fighting for the crown," and the Boxers became strong because the palace people, beaten by the Japanese, were seen to be allowing the Europeans more and more to gain foothold in China.

Thus the Manchus, represented by the dowager-empress—perhaps also by Li Hung Chang and his like,—were almost obliged, at the beginning of trouble, to temporize with the rebels, which naturally led them too far; for the Mings are a deadlier danger to the Tsings than ever the "foreign devil" could be. The empress and Prince Tuan were perhaps thus all but constrained to favor the Boxers, albeit they knew that if the foreigners could be wholly expelled from China, the Manchu Dynasty would soon have to disappear along with them.

To state these subtler and more secret points of the momentous situation does not render it easier to foresee, or to suggest, any enduring solution. But it may help opinion in America, by the light of subsequent events, to form itself correctly, and above all to appreciate the obstacles which threaten to checkmate diplomacy as seriously as they do to paralyze armed force.

The tortuous, insincere, timid and selfish intriguers at the Pekin palace have doubtless found themselves, during these dark and bloody days, literally "between Scylla and Charyb-dis," but they must take the consequences of their crimes and chicaneries.

To save their power and place they played the black game of the Boxers. To save their lives and gold they will perhaps employ the game of the "friend and protectors of the foreigner," albeit in doing this, they and the powers will have to reckon with a deeper and fiercer fury on the part of the Mings to get rid of Manchu and missionary, and Europe itself, including Japan, in one vast tumultuary convulsion.—Edwin Arnold in the Youth's Companton.

THE great point by which glory, honor and peace, both here and forever, would certainly be gained, is for each of us to stand in our own lot, resigned to the will of God in all the varied dispensations of his providence: seeking no more, either of prosperity or adversity, of poverty or riches, of suffering or rejoicing, in things spiritual or temporal, than He knows to be best for us.—John Thorp.

It may seem to be a paradox to say that one of the most successful methods of propagating error is to tell a part of the truth, but such is the fact.—Atlanta Constitution.

For "THE FRIEND."

WHEREFORE DIDST THOU DOUBT.

Oh, heed thee, trembler; press thou on,
The Helper waits to save;
Look upward, onward—dare to press
Thy foot upon the wave.

With firmness step—He bids thee come
Naught is too hard for Him;
Thou canst not cross o'er Jordan's flood
If thou refuse its brim.

The early rain may not fulfil
All that thy spirit hopes,
Wait for the latter rain, and still
Trust for the promised crops.

Plume up again thy folded wing,
No latent hope destroy,
For faithful trusting labors bring
An aftermath of joy.

P. H.

For "THE FRIEND."

Charles Shieldstream.

In a recent number of this Journal there appeared a short article on Music from the pen of Charles Shieldstream, of Palmer, Nebraska. His death, which took place at his home on the twenty-seventh of Eighth Month, at the age of seventy-six years, seems to make it now appropriate to recall some events of his history, which are especially interesting to Friends. He was born in Sweden in 1822, and there became so fully convinced of the spiritual nature of true religion, and that outward ordinances form no part of the Christian dispensation, that he was unwilling to have his children baptized as required by the laws of Sweden, and he removed to America, where he could enjoy a larger measure of religious liberty. This removal was in 1861, and before he knew much, if anything, of the Society of Friends. Having afterwards met with George Fox's Journal and some others of our standard books, he found that the principles advocated in them corresponded very closely with what he had already been convinced of by the operation of the Spirit of Christ in his own mind; especially the doctrine of the light and life of Christ revealed in the heart of man; which, as writes William Penn, "we profess and direct all men to as the great instrument and agent of man's conversion to God." Thus he was drawn towards Friends as fellow-believers in the Light of Christ, which he had found to be a lamp to his feet, leading him in the way of safety and peace.

His views in regard to war, a man made and paid ministry, water baptism, oaths, and the absolute necessity of regeneration and purity of heart in him who would be a disciple of Christ were clearly set forth in a communication published in this Journal, Vol. IV, p. 397; parts of which were afterwards published in pamphlet form, entitled "An open letter to all lovers of the Light and Truth." A few extracts from the above, it is thought, may be now republished as a clear testimony to the truth of the principles and doctrines professed by Friends, by one who, though not a member among them, was favored to see their accordance with the gospel of Christ. His daughter in writing of his close, mentions that after a period of mental unrest, "he passed off so peacefully, and a calm settled over his face." The extracts referred to are as follows:

"1. When the Church, so-called, believes that professors of Christ can take up carnal weapons and permit war, a thing so against the doctrine of Christ as Belial is against Christ. Is that not Babylon or confusion?

"2. When the Light of Christ is slighted, and waiting on the Lord ridiculed; when a ministry according to carnal knowledge, and made by men, is set up, to tell men what it has learned from men as the right way for man's salvation, or, in other words, the ministry of the Spirit is rejected and the ministry of man is exalted. Is there not Babylon—confusion?

"3. When Priestcraft is permitted to preach in its own will, and administer what are called means of grace, or sacraments; or these types and shadows are used for the substance; or where such things have been retained from Judaism, or have been invented, which are in every carnal man's power to practise when he likes. Is not there Babylon—confusion?

"4. Most denominations say that water baptism is a saving ordinance; or else say that it is still binding on Christians, and not to be omitted, because it is commanded by the Lord. The truth is, there is only one Christian Baptism, which is by the Holy Spirit, of which water baptism was a type, and was a Jewish ceremony, being practised (as circumcision was) by the first preachers of the gospel, till Paul thanked God that he only baptized a few, and preached up the true spiritual baptism. Our Saviour told his disciples to baptize into the name of Father, Son, and the Holy Ghost, which was the spiritual baptism; and He had given them the glory which He got from his Father, that they should be able to do the works that He did, and greater also. Besides, when Christ's first apostles did use water, they did never baptize in the name of Father, Son and Holy Spirit; but when practised, it was in Jesus' name. Now where there is a carnal, outward, water dispensation, along with the Gospel dispensation, which is entirely spiritual, is there not Babylon—confusion?

"5. Our Lord Jesus Christ has said to the people, 'Swear not at all, but let all your communication be yea, yea, or nay, nay.' But nearly all religious professors do swear—and in some churches, so-called, those that are to be ministers have to swear that they will preach certain doctrines prescribed by men, before they are allowed to begin their performances. Is here not Babylon—confusion?

"Much more could be said as to this confusion; but it is sickening, and we have no fellowship with the deeds of darkness, but seek to reprove them.

"I will dwell in the Light!"

G. J. S.

PHILADELPHIA, Ninth Month 21st, 1900.

I NEVER find "blessed be the rich" or "blessed be the noble," but, "blessed be the meek," and "blessed be the poor," and "blessed be the mourners, for they shall be comforted"—and yet many carry themselves so, as if they not only not desired, but even feared to be blessed.—George Herbert.

THE spiritual life belongs to every day in the week, every pursuit in which we engage, every transaction and every department of activity. This inner life will never rise to a high stage until we learn to carry our religious convictions and principles into all things.—Christian Advocate.

Each Day Its Verse.

In an old German village in the heart of Bavaria, is a queer old house that looked as if it had never been built, but sprouted and grew and had never been pruned, one day sat by her sunny, deep window an old frau, who herself looked as if she had not only grown, but ripened, and then been preserved, like a prune cut a fig, into something sweet and good, and would keep forever.

She was knitting now, and had been knitting, and it seemed she might continue to knit, and on. I dare say she had covered miles of hands and feet in her life-time, and made the warm. How much of her had gone into need and yarn, who can tell?

But other things are knitting and are knitted by day. Heads and hearts and souls are knitting all the time.

So as the needles flashed in the light, old Mathilde said, "No day without its verse."

Before her sat a young girl as fair of face as apple-bloom; white and pink and red blended from cheek to brow, and yellow strands of hair lay down to her waist. A great Bible lay in her lap, from which she was about to read. Now she paused and listened, and lifted her clear, blue, untaught eyes.

"They are Master Luther's words," said Mathilde; "and good words they are, my Mathilde, true as the sun.

"Stitch by stitch,
Minute by minute,
Verse by verse."

that is the way all good work comes.

"'No day without its verse' turned the Gospel of our Lord into the German, for every soul to feed upon and be made strong."

The woman paused. The young girl went on reading the wonderful words of inspiration that have thrilled millions of hearts down through all the centuries to this day.

She read, "Let not your heart be troubled, ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also. And whither I go ye know, and the way ye know."

At every added sentence the old frau swayed back and forth, and muttered, "Yes, yes, yes. That is enough, my Madehen, for to-day is enough and enough, and enough. To-day ye will have, 'Let not your heart be troubled, and our hearts will not be troubled. They shall be quiet as the warm sunlight falling in the window, untroubled as the birds fitting their wings and thither through the vines. We children of the Christ may not be afraid, or dismayed, or discouraged when He saith, 'Let not your heart be troubled.' Ay, 'tis a precious verse, for He stands on the other side, beyond our seeing, and sees the things we may not see, and knows the things we may not know; and so He whispers all the day, 'Let not your heart be troubled,' for He knows the worst that can come to any one is not fatal; no, not if the old body is tied to the stake and the flames consume it;" and she dropped her knitting and uplifted her two hard old hands—"not for so long as this is secure;" and she laid her hand on her heart, and her aged face as ighted with a strange radiance. "For, as Mas-Luther learned, 'The just shall live by ith,' why, therefore, be troubled? Why?

nd when he had learned that lesson, he goes and on, with every day its verse, its blessed rse, until all are in our hands, too. To-orrow, child, we will think about the many ansions, and after that about the Comforter, en the Spirit of truth, which in troubled nes brings to the remembrance the precious ords a poor old head cannot always bold en other things crowd in."

"So, so, so! little by little, stitch by stitch, rse by verse, does everything go on, and ith is the same forever, as the trembling ives and the bursting flowers, and the waters,
th the breeze across it."

Little Madchen turned her blue eyes out of e casement and wondered what good Mathilde uld mean; and wondered too, why she liked be beside the old frau and read the good ok to her. And she wondered, too, if she uld know all about it from first to last, and en she thought, "May be I shall, if I go tch by stitch in patience and in love."—Re-ious Herald.

A Book by William Penn.

"Some Fruits of Solitude," by Wm. Penn, th an introduction by Edmund Gosse, is as aint and dainty a little volume as its make-up ggests. These reflections and maxims conn the essence of Penn's observations of blic and private matters, and it is impossible read them without being impressed with a ise of his great astuteness and integrity.
His reflections on "A Publick Life" seem rticularly appropriate to our own times. He s:

"Yet the Publick must and will be served;
d they that do it well, deserve publick Marks Honour and Profit.

"To do so, men must have publick Minds, as ll as salaries; or they will serve private Ends
the Publick Cost.

"Governments can never be well adminis-ed, but where those entrusted make Con-ence of well discharging their Place.

"Five Things are requisite to a good Officer;
Ability, Clean Hands, Dispatch, Patience and partiality.

CAPACITY.

"He that understands not his Employment,
atever else he knows, must be unfit for it,
d the publick suffers by his Inexpertness.

"They that are able, should be just too; or overnment may be the worse for their Ca-acity.

CLEAN HANDS.

"COVETOUSNESS in such men prompts them prostitute the Publick for Gain. The taking a Bribe or Gratuity should be punished with severe Penalties as the defrauding of the tate.

"Let Men have sufficient Salaries and ex-d them at their Peril.

"It is a dishonour to Government that its cers should live of Benevolence; as it ought be Infamous for Officers to dishonour the blick, by being paid twice for the same usiness.

"But to be paid, and not do Business is k Oppression."

In speaking of Dispatch, he says:

"Our Law says well, to delay Justice is Injustice; Refuse or Dispatch is the Duty and Wisdom of a good Officer."

In speaking of the "Fruits of Solitude," Robert Louis Stevenson said, in giving his own copy of the book to a friend:

"If ever in all my 'human conduct' I have done a better thing to any fellow creature than handing on to you this sweet, dignified and wholesome book, I know I shall hear of it on the last day. To write a book like this, were impossible; at least one can hand it on, with a wrench, one to another. My wife cries out, and my own heart misgives me, but still—here
it is."

The present edition is published by Truelove, Hanson & Comba, New York.—City and State.

Christianity Without Christ.

It has been reserved for our century to witness an attempt to spread a Christianity without a Christ. We have a new dogma supported by a new school, which maintains that Christianity is a system of truths to be taught without reference to their originator, a code of principles which may be completely dissevered from the person of their author and presented to men as a series of abstractions. Modern thought has labored hard to emancipate itself from the hands of personal obligations to Christ. It has labored hard to invent a new Christianity made up of the tendencies of first century thought, Jewish superstition and heathen philosophy, Paul's fancies and Philo's philosophy, the quarrels of factions and the ignorance of devotees. And so it has reduced the figure of the Christ to the dimensions of a Jewish reformer, a dreamer of spiritual dreams, a gentle but misguided person, who did not know his own place in the economy of spiritual powers. We have witnessed in this age a spectacle truly novel in the history of Christianity, of pretended followers of Christ turned critics of his commands; disciples whose business it has been to dispute their teacher; Christians with the most mechanical affection for the Christ. The spectacle is anomalous in Christian history, and its lesson is instructive. For wherever that view has obtained it has stifled religious zeal, and struck Christian enterprise with a slow paralysis. It has checked the work of conversion. It has weakened the missionary spirit, or has changed its aim from the conversion of souls to the proselyting of intellects, till at last, in its extreme form, this nineteenth century schism finds itself in closer sympathy with the agnostic, the unbeliever and the enemy of religion than it is with the church from which it has sprung.

Nor can we wonder that the disloyalty which begins with a cooling of affection for Jesus Christ should end in an indifference to the works which have grown out of his life. The soldier who begins with a coolness toward his commander, will end by an indifferent appreciation of his purposes. When the soldiers doubt the capacity of the power of their general the campaign is lost. The battles of our civil war are a terrible commentary on the dangers of a half-way loyalty toward a commander.
For when camps became schools of criticism, and the gossip of the bivouac and march was of doubt and distrust, the army was as good as defeated. And when men who still hold lin-geringly to the name of Christ have changed their attitude from belief to criticism, from love to a feeble tolerance of authority, they have ceased to be "good soldiers of Jesus Christ." They may make a good record of their valor under other banners. They can never serve with credit under the white emblem of the cross. The heart is gone out of their service.

J. COLEMAN ADAMS.

HINTS ABOUT CONVERSATION.—One has said,
"Of ten things which I know, I have learned nine from conversation."

1. Avoid satire and sarcasm.
2. Never repeat a word that was not intended for repetition.
3. Often cultivate "flashes of silence."
4. It is the longer half of the conversation to listen well.
5. Sharp sayings are an evidence of low-breeding.
6. Shun fault-finding and fault-finders.—
Selected.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Hymn of Praise.

O thou, holy, eternal God, who hast declared thyself to be a Spirit, omniscient, omnipotent Almighty; filling all things which yet fill not thy fulness. Without beginning and without end, dwelling in eternity. The vast universe of suns and worlds, whose nearest outskirts we but dimly see, are the work of thy fingers, made for thy pleasure, thou Creator of all things; for by thy Word, thou speakest and it is done. These all, in language unheard by mortal ear, yet loudly do proclaim, "The hand that made us is divine." To each one of this vast host thou givest a law, and it obeys thy mandate, "Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty, just and true art thou in all thy ways. Who shall not fear thee, thou king of saints? Thy name, full of majesty and glory, if thou reveal, who shall not bow in deepest reverence? Angels and archangels, moving more swiftly than lightning, wait thy behests to do. Themselves, great in power, at thy feet, they cast their crowns and acknowledge, "all power is of thee, Lord God Almighty."

And what are we to thee, O Lord, but worms of the dust; a speck in infinity, a meteor that vanisheth and where is its place? What is the son of man, that thou dost visit him? That thou opens his ear to hear thy still voice, that brings life and light to him; that opens his eye to behold a glimpse of thy greatness and thy glory. What meaneth this? It is all the work of thy goodness and thy mercy. Thou makest his heart tender by a touch of thy love divine.
Thou openest his heart to understand the purpose of thy will, Thou givest him wisdom and knowledge. Thou leadest him in paths which vultures' eye have not seen. When enemies arise to mar thy work and raise a tumult, when the powers of darkness would seem about to extinguish hope, thou bowest the heavens and comest down, and by thy light and power scat-tereth them. Thou, O Lord, thou holy one of Israel, doth fill our hearts with gratitude, and mouths with praise to thee, our Redeemer and our God. Let thy love inflame our hearts to seek thy face; and beam brightly by thy grace, O thou Son of Righteousness, and come with healing in thy wings, that we may ever walk in thee and in thy light and love, and be permitted, when this brief life is done, to join the angelic throng, who before thy throne in heaven, sing thy praises and thy power.

W. W. B.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The mayor of Galveston says that at least $5,000,000 will be required to put the people in a proper condition to begin to help themselves effectively. Not only are supplies, doctors, nurses and money pouring in, but the work of receiving the supplies, directing the work and distributing supplies has been reduced to system, and relief is given in an orderly and efficient manner. It is estimated that it will take 2000 men ninety days to clear away the debris and get all of the bodies out, and that this will cost half a million dollars.

Formal manifestations of sympathy with the people of Galveston in their great affliction continue to come from all parts of the world. In addition to those already received, such expressions have come from the President of Chile, the Spanish Minister, the Belgian Minister, the Mexican Minister, the Peruvian Minister, the Haytian Minister and the British Ambassador.

Governor Sayres estimates the loss of life along the Texas coast at 12,000 and the property loss at $20,000,000.

In consequence of apprehended dangers from riots in the anthracite coal regions of Pennsylvania, three regiments of infantry and a troop of cavalry have been sent to the Schuylkill region by direction of the Governor of the State.

Fearful that the strike will result in riot and bloodshed, a number of foreigners, who were employed in the mines at Hazleton, have left for their former homes.

The President of the United Mine Workers arraigns nine railroads, engaged in carrying coal, as their enemies.

Roman Catholic clergymen in several places in the coal regions have espoused the cause of the strikers.

The National party, composed of men who feel that they cannot conscientiously vote for either McKialey or Bryan, at a conference held in Boston abandoned the idea of keeping a Presidential ticket in the field. This action is virtually made necessary by Senator Caffery's declination to be a Presidential candidate, and the failure to find any one willing to stand in his stead, and by the impracticability of perfecting an organization throughout the country at this late period in the campaign.

The Philadelphia Record says: "It may well be doubted if, in the whole history of America, seventy days of such heat have been known as in the period from Seventh Month 1st to the present date. The records show nothing like it during the present century."

The reduction of freight rates made possible by improvements in railroad construction and operation has greatly benefited the farmer. Rates on grain to tide-water are not one-half what they were a few years ago. In some cases rates are less than one-third what they were a dozen years ago.

A telephone company in Tennessee has prohibited the smoking of cigarettes by its employes.

This year's apple crop in North America is expected to be the largest ever known. The horticultural statisticians predict from 80,000,000 to 100,000,000 barrels, which will be a supply of more than one barrel for every inhabitant of the United States.

Pearls are being found in great quantities in the Black and St. Francis Rivers, in Southwest Missouri, in the shells of the ordinary mussel. Hundreds of people have flocked to the rivers to engage in pearl fishing. Many valuable gems have been found.

A recent fire in the Dismal Swamp has destroyed valuable pine and juniper trees over an area of about 15,000 acres. The peaty soil is burned in many places four and five feet deep, it is said. The animals have either been driven to the highlands or have been driven farther into the fastnesses of the swamp. Bears, deer, wild cats and a peculiar species of the wolf are known to inhabit the swamp. It is believed that the wolves, which killed hundreds of hogs, sheep and cows in Southern Virginia and adjoining North Carolina counties, were driven from the swamp by the fires.

A decision in regard to wages has been reached by which 60,000 men engaged in iron and steel mills are to resume work, after having been idle three months. This decision is the result of an agreement of manufacturers and committees of a labor organization representing the working men.

The most densely populated spot in the United States is said to be the block of tenement houses in New York bounded by Sixty-first and Sixty-second Streets and Tenth and Eleventh Avenues. In this block, the census showed, lived three thousand nine hundred and eighty-seven persons, most of them negroes.

The population of Chester, Pa., is 33,988, as against 20,226 in 1890. This is an increase of 13,762, or 68.04 per cent.

By a recent declaration of the policy to be pursued by the United States in dealing with China it appears that the American Government proposes to hold those responsible for the outrages to strict accountability, but deems it proper that China should first be given the opportunity to punish them. For this reason the German programme is not approved. The American Government also proposes to authorize its Minister at Peking to enter into negotiations at once with the authorized representatives of China, with a view of bringing about a preliminary agreement whereby the full exercise of the Imperial power for the preservation of order and the protection of foreign life and property throughout China, pending final negotiations with the Powers, shall be assured.

In a reply to Russia it has been declared by the United States Government that it has not any present intention to withdraw its Legation from Peking.

It is said the refusal of the United States to accede to Germany's proposition regarding the Chinese settlement is sharply criticised by the German press, and in spite of previous intimations through Washington cablegrams, the refusal has come as a great surprise to Berlin.

A dispatch from Washington says it is now understood that General Chaffee's military force will be reduced to about one thousand five hundred men. This contingent, being specially known as a Legation guard, will not be subject to the orders of any one save the United States Minister resident, and will not be under the command of the German Field Marshal, Count von Waldersee.

San Francisco revenue officers have seized the treasures looted during the sack of Tien-Tsin, and consigned by the American soldiers to their friends and relatives in the United States. It consisted of one hundred and fifty-four cases of rare Oriental wares of the costliest and most valuable kinds, taken, it is believed, from the houses and shops of non-combatants.

There were 256 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 164 less than the previous week and 115 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 186 were males and 170 females; 39 died of consumption; 20 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 12 of cancer; 15 of diphtheria and 9 of apoplexy.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, new, 104½ to 105½; 3's, reg., 109½ to 111; 4's, reg., 115 to 116; new 4's, 134 to 135; 5's, 113½ to 114½.

COTTON is quoted on a basis of 10½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.50 to $2.70; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.45 to $3.65; Western winter, straight, $3.60 to $3.75; spring, straight, $3.75 to $4.00; city mills, straight, $3.65 to $3.80. RYE FLOUR—$3.00 to $3.10 per barrel, as to quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 76½ to 76¾c.
No. 2 mixed corn, 45½ to 46c.
No. 2 white oats, 28 to 28½c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5½ to 5¾c.; good, 5¼ to 5½c.; medium, 4½ to 4¾c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4½ to 4¾c.; good, 4 to 4¼c.; common, 2 to 2½c.; spring lambs, 4½ to 6½c.

HOGS.—8 to 8¼c. for best Western.

FOREIGN.—Russia, England and Germany have now stated their demands in reference to China. The first asks that the Chinese Emperor resume the government of the Empire, have Prince Tuan and the other Boxer leaders caught and punished and the Empress Dowager excluded from any share in the Government.

England insists upon the return of the Emperor to Peking as a preliminary condition to peace negotiations, and also gives distinct notice that those who are responsible for the outrages upon the foreign Ministers must be punished.

Germany declines to enter upon diplomatic relations with the Chinese Government until the instigators of the attacks on the legations have been given up for punishment.

Whether the harmony of the Powers shall be preserved will depend, it is said, to a large extent upon Great Britain's answer to Germany's proposal that the punishment of the Chinese responsible for the anti-foreign outrages be made a condition precedent to negotiations.

The promotion of anti-foreign officials to posts of great influence by the Empress of China is regarded as an act of defiance to the Powers, and has aroused much indignation.

Russian, German and other foreign troops numbering several thousand have captured the Pei-Tang forts, with a heavy loss of life on both sides.

Tales of terrible barbarity and indiscriminate slaughter perpetrated by the allied troops in China are published in which the Russian troops are especially prominent. A recent newspaper states the object of the allies in entering China was to rescue the imperiled, to exact reparation and to establish order. They were to punish the guilty, or to see that they were punished. The expedition was a protest against China's barbarity in murdering foreign Ministers and missionaries; but if a small part of the reports of Russian cruelty and general plundering are true, it will soon be a difficult matter to determine who are the real barbarians in the field—the Chinese or Europeans.

In the late election in Cuba of delegates to the Constitutional Convention a majority was elected of those who represent anti-American sentiments, and it is believed they will demand the immediate withdrawal of American troops and independence without a protectorate.

China is one of the most important coal countries of the world. Everyone of her eighteen provinces contains large deposits. Eastern Shan-Si has an anthracite area of 13,500 miles in extent.

The amnesty proclaimed in the Philippine Islands expired Ninth Month 21, and the conditions that exist previously have been resumed. An insurgent proclamation, signed last month by Aguinaldo, directing the American prisoners be set at liberty, that good treatment be accorded to captives, and that $40 be paid to each American surrendering, has reached Manila. Aguinaldo has declined to consider the peace proposals.

RECEIPTS.

Unless otherwise specified, two dollars have been received from each person, paying for vol. 74.

Charles Grimshaw, Pa.; Wm. F. Michener, Cal; Joshua Brantingham, agent, O., $12, for James Bailey, Mary H. Brown, Alice G. Cope, Griffith wees, Isaac H. Satterthwait and Wm. D. Satterthwaite, E. S. Fowler, agent, O., for Benj. J. Hobson; Mary Branson, per Dr. Wm. C. Stokes, Phila.; Gulie Smith for James Smith, Pa.; Chas. Wright, N. Mary P. Worth, Colo., to No. 14 vol. 75; Stacy Haines, N. J.; Samuel Williams, N. J.; Elha Zook and for R. M. Zook, Pa.; Martha G. Cook, Caroline Cope, Calif.; John G. Hoyle, Kans., 3 vols, 73, 74 and 75; Mary R. Deacon, Pa.; Will Test, Ia.; Thomas H. Whitson for Anna M. Thorpe, Pa.; George Blackburn, agent, O., $6, for Edw. Bonsall, Miriam French and Thomas F. Fawcett; T. W. Newby, Ind.; $6, for himself, Nathan Little, Joseph Little; Mary S. Bettle for William Bettle, J.; Rachel S. Hulme, Phila.; Nathaniel Barton, J.; Joseph E. Barton, N. J.

Remittances received after Third-day noon will appear in the Receipts until the following week.

NOTICES.

WANTED.—Situation as companion or helper to elderly woman, by a young woman Friend, a graduate of Westtown. Address "C" at this office.

WANTED.—Opportunity to teach young children primary studies, by a young woman Friend, a graduate of kindergarten training school.

Address "M" at this office.

A YOUNG woman Friend of experience wishes a situation as companion to an elderly lady.

Address, S. C. G.,

Care B. Cope. Kennett Square, Pa.

In Haverford College grounds the undersigned furnish a home and tutoring for eight boys. They attend Haverford College Grammar School, opening Ninth Month 26, 1900. Special attention to preparation of daily lessons. Two vacancies. At home after Ninth Month 1900.

Apply to

HENRY N. HOXIE, A. M.,

ANNA B. HOXIE.

Haverford P. O.

THE CORPORATION OF HAVERFORD COLLEGE.—The annual Meeting will be held in the Committee Room of the Street Meeting House, Philadelphia, on Third-day, Tenth Month 9th, 1900, at 3 o'clock, P. M.

GEORGE VAUX, JR., Secretary,

404 Girard Building, Philadelphia.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage will leave trains leaving Philadelphia 7.17 and 8.19 A. M., and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when required. Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., twenty cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, Westtown Station or West Chester, Phone 85.

EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Su-

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TENTH MONTH 6, 1900.

No. 12.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,
No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,
PHILADELPHIA.

South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth,)

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

Soldiers of the Cross as Viewed by the War Spirit.

A few weeks since an extract was sent to me taken from Theodore Roosevelt's "Life of Thomas H. Benton" (p. 37), published in 1887. Whatever party candidate to-day its writer may be, is none of our business; but the principle of Peace is a standing engagement for

The other candidates would probably have written the same in substance, inasmuch as they all espouse the principle of carnal warfare. Accordingly it is not one man, but the spirit of the natural man in all ages and nations that we quote, as responsible for the following language:

"After all, this ruffianism was really not a whit worse in its effects on the national character than the case with certain of the 'universal peace' or 'non-resistance' developments in the northeastern States; in fact, it was more healthy. A class of professional non-combatants is as hurtful to the healthy growth of a nation as is a class of fire-eaters; for a weakness or folly is nationally as bad as a vice or worse; and in the long run a Quaker may be quite as undesirable a citizen as is a duelist. No man who is not willing to bear arms and fight for his rights can give a good reason why he should be entitled to the privilege of living in a free community."

But we have not so learned Christ, nor his spirit. And the same spirit in man that crucified Him as "king of the Jews," still crucified Him as king of our nation, and of every other; though his rightful place is as "Prince of the kings of the earth," and "the kingdom of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ."

As Christians, we know of no governmental or human relation in which we are excused from the law of the Spirit of Christ. "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ," in any department of life, we believe with the Apostle

NOTE.—Since this was put in type we have found that the same extract received attention last week in the other periodicals published under the name of Friends in this city.

"he is none of his," and has no right to the name of "Christian." As Christians, "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal." Our writer speaks from the standpoint of the kingdom and spirit of this world, and apparently (within the language cited) ignores the standpoint of the kingdom of our Lord and Christ. But why may not this superior kingdom with equal right use his concluding words, so as to say; "No man who is willing to bear carnal arms and kill other men for his own rights can give a good reason why he should be entitled to citizenship in that kingdom whose Lord said, 'My kingdom is not of this world, else would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered,'" etc. How radically the whole policy of retaliation and reprisals is cut down by a few sweeping words of his Sermon on the Mount.

"Ruffianism more healthy than universal peace and non-resistance developments," says the spirit of the world kingdom. "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God," says the Prince of Peace. "Professional non-combatants as hurtful to the healthy growth of a nation as is a class of fire-eaters;"—in other words, men of principle as pernicious to a nation as so many unprincipled! We must still believe that it is righteousness and scrupulous conscientiousness which "exalts a nation," and it is sin that is "a reproach to any people." No nation can afford to spare one representative of righteous principle and conscience in comparison with a hundred men of regardless dash or brilliancy. But "whence come wars and fightings among you?" Says an apostle, "Come they not hence even from your lusts that war in your members?" That which comes from the baser part of man can never be the seed of a nation's healthy growth. "Vice itself not so bad, or is better nationally," we are told, than the "weakness" which makes men martyrs for Christ's sake, or than the "folly" of such as are willing to be as "fools for Christ's sake," that they may be made wise. Such wisdom is "not of this world, nor of the princes of this world which come to naught." True it is that "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto Him." And "in the long run," we are told, "a Quaker may be quite as undesirable as is a duelist." This must be expected. "The world will love its own." And which will a duelling nation love better or regard as the more undesirable, the Spirit of Christ or a duelist? The single duelist is morally of a piece with wholesale dueling, and to international duellism the spirit of the gospel is very inconvenient,—always in its way,—and "in the long run" is so to prevail against carnal warfare that "nations shall learn war no more." It is just because the Quaker is so "undesirable" to the war-spirit that he is, "in the long run," on the winning side of the War against war.

Replace now all the steadfast Quakers in the land by as many duelists,—or even by as many men who know no conscience but the popular current with which they drift,—and would the notion be the stronger or the weaker in virtue and true character?

Again, after these cruel wars are over, and some thousands of soldiers are merged as individuals amongst the general population, who are to give the police the less trouble,—who are to be the cleaner leaven of purity, self-restraint, and sterling righteousness amidst our nation,—the returning characters that warfare has to show for itself, or the class who conscientiously espouse the cause of peace—the class that has been stigmatized "nationally as bad as a vice or worse?" We leave the aftermath of war to show its character in moral health or corruption. But its great harvest of material for judgment is in store beyond the grave, and there the actors must meet it.

We are asked what reason men of peace can give for a right to live in a free country. Our first answer is, Christ; and secondly, that they were born with that right, and those who keep the peace and do not disturb that of others have the first right to keep their birth-right. But we are finding that the more a nation goes to war the more its people lose their freedom. The military nations are far from being free communities. But what of the unmilitary nations, those who would not fight,—would not they be ruthlessly overrun and oppressed by those who will know no right but might? Naturally they would. We do not advocate Peace as an escape from suffering wrong, but as an escape from doing wrong. No example of a consistently Christian nation has yet been seen, to show how much of disaster would be inflicted with the violence all on one side. But the conquests of the early Christians and of the consistent Quakers by that braver resistance which consists in overcoming evil with good, indicate that a vanquishing horde could not take a consistently Christian people into its population without itself being progressively vanquished, from within outward, unto the freedom of those whom the Truth makes free.

The New Quakerism.

We have received a copy of a pamphlet entitled "The New Quakerism," written by Jesse Edgerton, of Columbiana, Ohio. It is a temperate, yet decided presentation of the contrast between the Quakerism of Fox, Penn and Barclay, and the modes in vogue to-day in most quarters under the name of Friends. Hoping hereafter to make further use of the pamphlet, we may for the present show its general purport by quoting these words; "That the Friends' Church, as it styles itself, has abandoned the original foundation seems susceptible of proof. One by one innovations of greater or less moment have crept into the Society, until in many places the whole system of faith and practice seems changed, and doctrines held by the Society from its rise are set aside."

This position seems clearly maintained by many instances given, and indeed has been frequently acknowledged by innovators themselves, as well as publicly rejoiced in as a consummation for which they had been devoutly laboring.

We did not have to travel far in an eastern Yearly Meeting lately to find evidences of hidden or hiding Friends coming forward, as it were, from their secret places for the sympathy of any supposed representative of the good old principles. Such Friends in many places have learned to retire into obscurity or to sit solitary and non-committal as regards fellowship with the drift of the present current. Some of them say they "must be Quakers or nothing," and have found it convenient to retire too closely to the latter condition. Most, for the sake of peace, will "let others have things their own way," and subside into a silent disunity. And some are saying, "Since there is no Quakerism to have fellowship with in our meeting, we prefer either no meeting at all, or to join with a church where these borrowed expedients belong. These practices which under the name of Friends I must abominate, in the other churches I can respect. If I must support other Societies' principles in public worship, I will do it as one of them."

We cannot justify such surrender of principle apart from the Society on the ground that others do the same within it, and must deplore the withdrawal and large loss of convinced membership which the modern expedients practically enforce. Here and there over the land the true remnants of the Society of Friends seem largely driven into a hermitage more or less disguised; and the loss of a thoughtful and a discerning element from the Society is hardly to be compensated by the gain of a new and raw membership, made in such a way as to crowd out the former well-concerned Friends. This process of eliminating the convinced for more of the unconvinced has cost the general Society much of its old time weight and influence. True, the Society,—its own weight and its own standing in the world,—is not rightly an end to itself. These things are added as it seeks first the kingdom of Christ. But inasmuch as all gains to his kingdom must be in and by his Spirit, we believe more gains could have been made by a living steadfastness in the principles under which the Society was first gathered and enlarged, than by any other policies. Only let our steadfastness be living, and not itself also an imitation, and such a gathering to the standard can yet appear. There are many signs of a weariness of the creaturely labor which satisfies not, and of a yearning to return to a hearkening diligently unto Him and eating that which is good, by following the true and holy Witness only.

And we unite with the writer of the pamphlet before us in his belief that "the only 'New Quakerism' which will meet the needs of to-day, is one born of loyalty to the OLD; one renewed and revitalized by recurrence to the basic principles of the Christian religion, as held by the early church, and revived and promulgated by George Fox and his Friends."

The Trappings of Woe.

Someone has sent us the following extract and comment:

A federation of churches in Pittsburg and vicinity has taken up the subject of funeral reform, and makes a number of valuable recommendations to that end. Among other things, the federation advises that display of all kinds should be avoided, and that floral offerings, if used at all, should be simple and inexpensive. Personal references to the deceased at the funeral should be omitted. Services at the grave are declared to be unnecessary, and in no case should the persons who attend them be expected to stand with uncovered heads. The admission of curious people to view the dead before the funeral is specially deprecated. Finally, a discontinuance of the custom of wearing mourning is strongly recommended as being "scarcely in harmony with the hope of the Gospel." These suggested reforms are clearly in the interest of good sense and refined feeling. Some of our funeral customs are relics of a superstitious and barbarous age, and are without excuse in an enlightened community. Chief among these is the senseless and extravagant outlay for flowers, coaches, funereal trappings and other things often indulged in over people whose whole lives have been a struggle with poverty and pain. Lavish expenditure over the sepulture of any person, rich or poor, high or low, has nothing to commend it in reason or religion. Respect for the dead does not demand these things, while a proper regard for the living calls for their abolition.—Frank Leslie's Weekly.

All this is catching up pretty closely to the Quaker idea and practice from long ago unto this day. It has taken the world a long time, however, to begin to see in it a mark "of good sense and refined feeling."

The editor of the Galveston Tribune tenders to the Galveston Relief Committee the profits on the sales of a handsome publication entitled "Picturesque Galveston," which was nearly ready before the great storm. The book will be sold to the general public at two dollars a volume. As a record of what the city was, it is likely to be interesting to purchasers who may wish, by sending for it, thus to administer relief.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Misplacement.

It is the privilege of man to make void. It is not pleasant or profitable, yet it is done. This did not escape the Master's eye. He saw a decided tendency in man to misplacement. Now they strain and lift up far above nature's fitness, the convenience and pleasure of washing hands; now they let down the important duty of care for one's own, and exalt the handing over to ecclesiastical purposes, what should be administered to the poor. They retired to rest with a rubber conscience, and they call it Corban.

How easy to bring a practice too far, and make it mean too much. We have been concerned for years about this power of misplacement, of reading the Old into the New. We kingcraft, legalism, ritualism, have been re-into the New. Our hearts complain that the early fathers did not sufficiently guard the pass in that great mountain range which separates forever the Old from the New.

This brings us to the position of John. He performed a Jewish ceremony in setting apart a Jewish teacher, surely his own word of definition ought to be a sufficient guide. "He must increase, but I must decrease." He was a part and the last part, of the "ministration of death" (2 Cor. iii: 7) "which glory was to be done away," what enormous damage has been done, by making the last of the Old into the first of the New!

How easy and becoming for the messenger to retire after introducing the Master! What need is there to search the heavens for the sun which was the forerunner of the sun? A what a glorious transition was that which exalted the messenger to the highest pitch of excellency, and then declared that he "at least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he" (Matt. xi: 12).

Men who make void, are never far from difficulties. By their misplacement they have brought a glorious and unique character into an unnatural relationship. They come about that grand utterance, "One Lord, one faith, one baptism;" and they make room for prayer, "It is time for thee, Lord, to work for they have made void thy law."

H. T. MILLEN

Zion's Herald has the following: "It would be well worth while in this age of rush and din to devote a quiet hour each day to sitting and listening for some message that God might have for the receptive soul. Reverential silence is full of celestial whisperings."

ERNEST L. WAITT says in the Universal Leader: "It is every day more and more apparent that creeds are waning, while faith is strengthening. Creeds become worn out and are swept away, and Christ increases in stature and power. He is the only creed that never need revision."

The Advantages and Disadvantages of the Marriage State.

(Concluded from page 83.)

But as he was thus going on his way, he observed a young virgin, who was walking the same road: and he began to desire to be favored with her company; but thought it advisable to be very deliberate; because many seem to walk the same road, who only go part of the way, and then turn off into some other path. Therefore he diligently observed whether she closely attended to the right way.

So he perceived her to take something out of her bosom, and diligently peruse it for a while, and then put it into her bosom again, and pursue the straight path; whereupon he went up to her, and enquired where she was bound. She told him she was setting her face towards Zion. He asked her what it was she had been perusing? And she showed him, that was the map of the road: which she took along with her, for her guide.

He then began to enquire further who she was, and whence she came; she told him, she was by birth a Chaldean; by education and consanguinity a Babylonian; but the King of Israel had sent for her, to go forth to seek a better country.

He also asked, what expectations, or encouragement she had, in taking such a journey? She told him, she had the King's word, to make her an inhabitant in his royal palace, when she arrived at the upper Bethel, and to grant her sufficient defence, and sustenance, all the way thither.

He asked, if she could be fully satisfied in the King's veracity?

She told him the frauds and jealousies of Babylon had made such impressions upon her mind, that she had found it very difficult to believe Him that could not lie; but his majesty had condescended to give her the strongest demonstrations of his fidelity; so that now she was convinced, and had no reason to doubt his goodness, for He had confirmed his promise with an oath, and had given her to see that, in his own records, it was sealed with blood; and that the counterpart He had written upon her breast and sealed it in characters of life; and that hitherto, she had found his word verified to her; in strongly defending and abundantly supplying her: so that she could set to her seal, that He was true.

Then she also asked him divers questions, relating to his travels and enjoyments; and he likewise answered her, in a free and satisfactory manner. So that their affections began to grow warm towards one another. It was a very comfortable interview; and their minds were refreshed by each other's conversation. And they appeared so agreeable one to another, that he began to think they might be pleasant and profitable companions all the way. At first, he retired for a while, to deliberate upon the conversation that had passed already. When the more he thought of her diligence, and the pursuit of her journey, and her fixed satisfaction concerning the end of it; her understanding in those things laid down in the map, and her guiding her in the way, and the delight she appeared to take in meditating on, and conversing about the joys of the city of habitation, etc., the more he was satisfied that she was a prince's daughter travelling to the royal palace.

And when he had lifted up his eyes to heaven and earnestly besought the most high God for directions and a blessing upon further conversation, he came again into her company. And after some further discourse; he asked the reason for her walking on her journey alone? She told him she found but few travelling the same road; and she did not think it expedient to turn aside or neglect her way for any company in the world. If she met with company, such as delighted in the ways of wisdom, she took pleasure therein: for by such company her heart was refreshed, and she thought herself strengthened in her journey thereby.

But otherwise she chose rather to be alone at leisure to divert herself in examining her map; viewing the springs by the way, with the fruit trees and sweet flowers; hearing the singing of birds; and meditating on the glories of her Prince, and the joys she should have in his presence, etc., so that as company was pleasant when she could enjoy it, the delights in the way supplied the want of company when alone. And upon the whole, she neither was anxious to have company, nor had any aversion against it; her desire being to enjoy that only which might be most conducive to forward her in the right way.

Then he proposed, that since they had found each other's conversation comfortable and useful, that for their mutual advantage they should join together, and engage to keep company all the way. She told him it was not for persons of their profession to do anything rashly; she would deliberate on it.

So she retired and prostrated herself before the King, her Father, telling Him the matter, imploring wisdom to direct, declaring herself willing to enjoy or be denied of anything, so it were according to his will, and might be for his honor. He told her she had already been informed, and well knew what manner of persons they must be with whom it would be expedient for kings' daughters to keep company; therefore if she found the person to be one of the blood-royal, and endued with princely qualities, she was at her full liberty, and moreover by Him it should be esteemed honorable.

So when these two lovers met again and had deliberately consulted between themselves all such things as they conceived necessary relating to such an engagement; and had duly considered the King's statutes thereupon; and jointly petitioned his Majesty's presence with them, and his blessing on their undertaking, they joined hands with great satisfaction and serenity of mind; rejoicing to see themselves preserved from so many snares, and thus happily joined together by a Divine hand.

I then observed these two happy companions pursuing their journey; and here I saw verified an ancient counsel; [a help-meet.] For they were sincere friends, pleasant companions, faithful partners, and useful assistants to each other. If they met with difficulties they would take each other by the hand to support them.

In dangers, they would counsel, and stand by one another. In sorrows, they would sympathize, and comfort one another. If beset with enemies, one would watch while the other slept. If one were sick, the other would comfort with cordials. If one were indisposed in mind the other would divert with some sweet song, or discourse concerning the pleasant land. If one were ready to turn aside, the other would caution, and admonish of the danger. If one were employed in any service, the other would be ready to assist therein. And if one was blessed with any special favors, the other would congratulate, and rejoice on the occasion.

Then I was convinced, that two are better than one; and yet it was very manifest, that they were no more twain. For I knew not whether to call them two souls dwelling in one body, or one soul inhabiting two bodies: but it appeared very conspicuous that two were better than one.

So I continued observing this united pair, advancing in their way; for they greatly contributed to help each other forward; many difficulties they surmounted, and many rich blessings they enjoyed as they traveled in the way. At last they arrived at a pleasant hill in view of the land of promise, full of delights, refreshing fruits, pure streams and rich entertainments.

Here they first sat down and rested in a delightful arbor, blessing God and congratulating one another in consideration of their enjoyments, and afterwards they ascended to a tower where was a large prospect glass, from whence they looked upon Babylon, and saw it all in flames, and the country turned to burning pitch.

Then they gave praise and glory to God, for their wonderful deliverance, as well as for all the deliverances they had in the way. Then they took a prospect of the land before them, and saw Jerusalem, the royal palace, the goodly mountain of Lebanon, the clusters of Eshcol, and all the rivers flowing with milk; and all the hills dropping down sweet wine. Then they looked below to the streams of Jordan, and beheld the great High Priest in his shining robes, waiting to carry them over. They also heard the inhabitants on the other side triumphing, singing, and shouting for joy. Then they also with emulation lifted up their voices in songs of praise, and transports of joy, to Him that is, and that was, and that is to come.—Reprinted from The Friend, Vol. x, No. 19, by request.

TASTE FOR GOOD LITERATURE.—Improper publications are a result and not a cause. They are the result of mental starvation, which may exist even in the presence of otherwise good home and educational influences. For example, the mental equilibrium is often destroyed by permitting too much of the emotional to enter into education.

The mental processes may be compared to the making of a composite photograph, wherein each exposure of a plate will probably determine some feature of the result. The trouble is that parents are not living close enough to their children. When we live with them as we should, they will go to the right shelves in the library. In the home is the place to develop good taste. School and college can do little unless they can build on this. All the literature that children can read should not be a reaching down to them. They need and they enjoy some thoughts to which they must reach up, and some that they cannot, at time, comprehend at all. It is important to consider the character of the guests who enter the home. In the American life of to-day there are too many acquaintances and too few friends. It is these, with the parents, who are the most influential teachers, and they shape the children's ideals.—J. S. Walton.

For "THE FRIEND."

Who is to Blame?

There are sins of individuals and national sins. It is freedom from sin, or righteousness which exalteth a nation, and maketh it truly great and happy. Sensuality, Idolatry, Intemperance, and War, are a few of the most marked national sins. The practice of these debases a people, defiles the conscience, and each one opens the door to its fellows. All Christian nations (so-called) deplore the miseries inevitably brought on by these things, and yet strange to say, by judicial enactments some are found countenancing, aiding and abetting most of them. Several European powers license houses used for immoral purposes, as the Anglo-Saxon race do for the sale of strong drink, not to speak of gambling dens, immoral theatrical exhibitions, and like things. The victims of these number many thousand times those the Druids offered in cages at Stonehenge, or that Africa's pagan kings slew in their fetish rites, or that blind devotees of Juggernaut, who to gain heaven were willing victims crushed to death under the wheels of their ponderous idol; and yet not a finger is raised to stay the stream of writhing victims to what we know to be not death alone to the body, but death to the soul throughout eternity.

Christ Jesus is the light of the world. Wherever his gospel is preached, does this light not shine? How is it, then, Christian countries with open Bibles and many preachers, exceed the heathen in these national sins? Is it not, they have a form, but are themselves dead to the life and power, of Christ, who came to save his people from their sins? not that they might continue in sin and escape the just punishment due to those who do so.

They preach peace and good-will toward man, and send out men of war with terrible instruments of death. They claim temperance as a fruit of their religion, yet exceed in intemperance.

We all know that these are not the legitimate fruits of God's Spirit, of our God who is love, who is pure and holy, just and true; and his children, if children they be, partakers of the Divine nature, must be like Him. Will not God, the judge of all, deal out a heavier sentence of condemnation to them who knowing the law, break his laws?

And let me speak particularly of war. When Pontius Pilate sat in judgment on Jesus, he knew his prisoner was innocent; he wished to set Him free. To please the chief Priests and the Jews, he condemned Him to death, and then would wash his hands in water, to expiate his crime of being an unjust judge.

It is true as the Lord Jesus, the one appointed judge of all mankind said, "He that delivered me unto thee, hath the greater sin." And why? Because they knew as Pilate also did, it was their envy and malice that instigated them to cry out for his blood; but Christ's sentence implies though theirs was the greater sin, yet was not Pilate guiltless.

Now rulers of nations sit in Pilate's seat. They know war to be wicked, but they would justify themselves like Pilate as a matter of expediency or "exigencies of state." But this was the rock on which Jeroboam, who made Israel to sin, made shipwreck.

The Queen of England, a gentle, virtuous woman, whose reign has seen many wars, is said to have determined that a certain one should be the last which she would endorse, by her signature to the declaration. But her ministers advise as being expedient and forthwith the South African war with all its miseries ensues.

The President of the United States, a Christian man, detests war, yet on provocation fails to avert it, and from his position in the State feels bound as a matter of expediency to sign a declaration of war.

And now comes the Premier of Canada, who says in regard to embroiling Canada in the South African war, "I have no hesitation in saying that for my part I did not approach this question without some apprehension. I hate war, I abhor war; but the time came when there was nothing else to do but show the Mother Country that the hearts of the people beat with hers."

Must we then do evil, that good may come? If I read aright, the condemnation of such is just, even though justified by public opinion. Not that we, seeing things in a clearer light, would condemn those, who have not as yet perceived the power in the light, and if God's witness in their heart does not condemn, it is not our place to condemn those who are without. But yet are such entirely without, when the Queen of England is called the Head of the Church of England, and the two other countries whose heads are alluded to, are blessed above nearly, if not quite, all others in liberty, civil and religious?

Is it on the other hand the people, who cry out for war? Even the warrior David prays, "Scatter thou the people that delight in war" (Ps. lxxviii: 30). The laws of war justify murder, falsehood, treachery, robbery, devastation and ruin, and too often indirectly lead to other crimes detestable to humanity, and incurring the Divine displeasure. The contrast between these fruits of the spirit of war and those of the Spirit of Christ Jesus, the Prince of Peace, which are love, joy, peace, gentleness, goodness, meekness and temperance, is as great as between night and day. Indeed the former are those of the power of Satan, the latter those of God's power, and it is the main purpose of Christ's gospel to turn men from darkness to light, from the power of Satan to God; and where this is effectually done wars must cease, neither shall nations learn war any more, but peace shall reign, God be glorified, the nations exalted, and the promise verified, "Happy is that people whose God is the Lord" (cxiv: 15).

It was the exigencies of State, a matter of expediency, that induced Jeroboam to rear altars to two golden calves, "lest Israel should fall back again to Judah." And like Aaron in the wilderness proclaimed, "These be thy gods, O Israel," "which" Aaron said "brought thee up out of the land of Egypt." But it was the Lord alone who had done this, and it was the Lord alone who had called and made Jeroboam to be a king. He forgot that the power of God alone who called him to be a king, when but a servant of Solomon, could uphold that kingdom. It was peace and God's blessing of plenty that made these our countries great and powerful, and if He is disobeyed can He not send the sword, and pestilence and famine, like as other nations have suffered from?

The chief rulers of the Jews feared that if the peaceable doctrine of Christ should become prevalent, the "Romans would come and take away their place and nation." Pilate feared the Jews lest he should lose his place as governor. Between the two they crucified Christ Jesus the King of Israel as he came in the flesh.

This same Jesus, once crucified, now glorified, cometh in the glory and power of his spirit to peoples calling themselves by his name "Christians." He comes as the King of Righteousness, the King of peace, to rule and reign in the kingdom of God, his kingdom established in the hearts of the children of men, as Jesus Christ said "the kingdom of God is within you." But as the Jews said, "We will not have this man to rule over us," so they crucified their King. These Christians in their hearts say the same, since they refuse to obey his laws, and so they crucify Christ afresh, a put that holy name to shame, before unbelievers. For comes not Christ, in the power of his Spirit to redeem men from those lusts which war in them, and from whence all wars arise? And shall we who profess to own allegiance to the Prince of Peace, take up carnal arms to serve Satan ruling in those lusts in us, which the sword of Christ's Spirit would slay?

O ye ministers of his, who in Christ's name would teach his laws, proclaim aloud the law, "Whoever takes the carnal sword, even though ostensibly to save his Lord, shall perish by the sword of God, wielded in love alone, to save those lusts in men, who unredeemed therefore would yet pluck from the tree of life, and thus live estranged forever from Him who is peace, purity and love."

Teach men to yield their hearts to his government and law, as they pray "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as in heaven, and let men know his will unchangeable forever, Peace and good-will toward man. God's power will then go with you, his holy name and law be magnified, and honor, that which comes from God alone, be yours.

But know assuredly that whatever kingdom or people, will not obey his law, shall come to desolation, a by-word and reproach, and with Babylon of old, so joined to Babylon, this mystery of iniquity, shall surely fall. O ye teachers! in the judgment day, shall ye yourselves escape, if not faithful to your call, though you may say "Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name?" "Hast thou not taught in our streets?" What will all this avail of free consent joined to this iniquity, all through your false teachings it did me about? If you teach not his laws aright, a greater sentence will be yours, "Depart from me all ye that work iniquity."

Lift up your voice! Be not afraid! Lift up high the banner of the dove of peace, and ye will be with you; that peace may reign, and "the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever," whose right it is.

Thus shall your holy call, and God's purpose in his love to man in sending Christ be all fulfilled, and with Him you shall be permitted to enter "into rest, whilst angelic choristers with golden lyres, shall bear the glad refrain, 'Well done, thou faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'" W. W. L.

DILIGENT heart keeping yields a life unspotted by the world.—J. R. Miller.

Samuel Tuke—His Life Work and Thoughts.*

Seldom has a life been more admirably portrayed, and still less frequently has a biographer had so much wealth of material at his command.

The Tuke family of York, England, maintained, for more than a century, such a high character for piety, intelligence and benevolence, that one feels after reading this deeply interesting record of three generations, it would have been a rare privilege to have shared an acquaintance with any of its members. For clear and well-balanced judgment, largeness of sympathy and genuine religious experience, of the true Quaker type, William, Henry and Samuel Tuke will rightly hold a prominent place in the annals of our Society.

William Tuke, the grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was turned from indifference to a lively interest in the affairs of the Church, about 1760, when there was much activity in the administration of the discipline in many parts of London Yearly Meeting. It is recorded; "His spirit was stirred within him while he witnessed the perversion of this righteous instrument for the education of the body of love. He had been trained in a school of strict simplicity and sincerity, especially in regard to religious expression and was perhaps one of the finest models of it. His house was the resort of most of the Friends who travelled to the ministry, and opportunity for religious intercourse in the family frequently occurred during these visits."

Esther Tuke was his equal as well as his true help-meet." She was mentally addressed on one occasion, when pleading for the establishment of the Women's Yearly Meeting (in 1784), "Queen Esther." "Being concerned for the intellectual and religious training of daughters of Friends, she believed it to be her duty to establish, the same year, a school for girls at York, which should afford an education somewhat superior to that at Ackworth, opened ten years previously. In the management of it she had the assistance of her husband and daughters. It was for this school, known subsequently as "The Mount," that Lindley Murray wrote his English Grammar. The religious improvement of the mind and the training in true simplicity of manners were the primary objects, and everything was made subservient to these."

With such daughters as Sarah Grubb and Ann Alexander and Mabel Hipsley, all of whom were ministers of the Gospel, William and Esther Tuke seemed "to sit in the wisdom and glory of Solomon"—as their brother Henry's pure wife describes her impressions when visiting the family for the first time in 1769. Sarah resided in Ireland after her marriage, and was the founder of a school for the daughters of Irish Friends, while through her sister Mabel's efforts Rawdon School was established for children connected with Friends but not eligible for Ackworth.

The Annual Monitor was started by Ann Alexander in 1813, and continues to this day an instructive record of those who have exchanged their earthly services for an eternal reward.

The more humane treatment of the insane revealed to William Tuke so strongly he edited by Charles Tylor. Headley Bros., 14 Bishopsgate St., Without E. C. London.

opened THE RETREAT for those who were thus afflicted in 1792—the first institution of this kind then in England, if not in the world. From this time, for more than a century, until the death of his great-grandson, Dr. Daniel Hack Tuke, in 1895, the care of the mentally diseased claimed the continual attention of the Tukes.

John Woolman visited Friends in England in 1772, and Henry Tuke had the privilege of meeting this eminent servant of the Lord shortly before he died of smallpox near York.

Samuel Tukes writes: "I have frequently heard my father speak of this walk with John Woolman, of the indescribable sweetness of his company and the pleasure with which he remembered it." This intercourse had a most desirable and lasting effect both upon Henry Tuke and his sister Sarah, who nursed John Woolman in his last sickness.

"It was my happiness," said Samuel Tuke in after years, "in very early life to have a father who taught me the truth and made it appear lovely by his constant example, who, though he delighted to see me pleased and happy, exercised a steady, gentle rule in all his household, and whose word was not to be gainsaid. But what shall I say of my mother? Never were parent and child bound more firmly together than we were. She had an extraordinary power of teaching by analogies and of opening the hearts of her children to her instructions. My parents were not, I am persuaded, without some ambition that their children might be honorable amongst men. But the one absorbing desire was that they might be really the followers of Christ, conformed, assimilated to Him in all our ways. My father always brought a healthful cheerfulness with him, and he loved the company of the young. Though a man of business, he was literary; biblical studies were his favorite engagement. My father and mother frequently differed in opinion and held warm discussions together. We also took our part." This was illustrated by the different political preferences of the household about the election of William Wilberforce. Charles Tylor says: "The Tukes were Tories; Henry Tuke, especially, was a warm admirer of Pitt. Not so his wife, and many an animated discussion took place, in which the children joined, on the respective policy and character of rival statesmen. Mary Maria Tuke wrote to her husband, then in London: 'Oh, that we may have peace! Thy mentioning it as possible pleases me much.'

'Tho' Pitt was perfect in my Henry's eyes, He was but man, and was not always wise.'

This independence of judgment was not lost on their son, for while his father and grandfather were attending the Yearly Meeting—rather discouraging any participation in political matters—Samuel Tuke subscribed £50 toward the expense of Wilberforce's election. His father wrote, on hearing of it: "Samuel's bold stroke gave his grandfather and me some surprise . . . so that we feel ourselves in a very awkward situation." His mother, however, espoused his cause so vigorously "they also caught the enthusiasm, upon their return home, forgot their fears and entered heartily into the contest,"—which proved successful for the famous anti-slavery candidate.

"Little schemes and plans which were afloat were much talked of; and my mother's penetration was often strikingly evinced by her judgment as to the working of things and the success of individuals."

Samuel Tuke was exceedingly amiable in childhood. His mother compared him to a "sweet-toned instrument." When only seven years of age he says: "I have a distinct recollection of warm religious feelings during the reading of the Scriptures and the journals of Friends, which took place at least once in the day." He attended Ackworth School when only eight years of age, and was afterward at a private institution, going to business at thirteen. This was that of a tea merchant with his father.

Pricilla Hack, of Chichester, became the life companion of Samuel Tuke in 1810, and this union, for the subsequent 18 years, was referred to, nearly forty years later, in these words: "I cannot look back to any act or word by which she led me astray, or discouraged me in what was good; but I well remember how her quiet good sense and exquisite gentleness tended to soften the asperity and hardness of my nature."

It was about this time Samuel Tuke began to devote himself more continuously to collecting facts relating to the insane and, at his father's request, prepared a history of THE RETREAT, which aroused a world-wide interest in its methods. This publication was eventually the means of introducing much needed reforms into the mad-houses and work-houses of Great Britain and elsewhere.

He visited these institutions to make himself familiar with existing conditions, which were often deplorable enough for their wretched inmates.

William Foster, then a young man of twenty-six years, was the friend of both father and son, and as he was closely associated subsequently with the latter, in his ministerial labors, it may not be out of place to insert the record S. Tuke relates of Wm. Foster's appearance and delivery: "His person is tall and slender, and his countenance combining the innocence, sweetness and simplicity of a child with the gravity and wisdom of a veteran Christian. His manner of speaking is simple but forcible; his language partakes of the same character; he is frequently animated, but seldom flowery; his words are well-chosen, and he seldom uses any technical or peculiar phraseology without clearly explaining it."

We also have Stephen Grellet portrayed thus: "His manners are particularly soft and pleasing; he has the politeness of his nation without its levity. He is short and slender, of a swarthy complexion, with sharp and rather interesting features."

Henry Tuke died before his venerable father, in 1814, at the age of fifty-nine. Shortly before the end he said: "I die as I have lived, in the faith and hope of a Christian; I am perfectly resigned to the will of my Heavenly Father." Commenting upon his death, Samuel Tuke says: "Such a father, such a friend, and such a partner few persons had to lose. The world looked to me as a frightful wilderness in which I could not walk without his assistance and counsel."

A year later Mary Maria Tuke was gathered to her everlasting home, and just before her spirit took its flight her devoted son knelt by her side and asked for an assurance that she might join the spirit of her beloved husband.

(To be continued.)

PUT TO SLEEP IN THE DARK.

The weary child, the long play done,
Wags slow to bed at set of sun,
Sees mother leave, fears night begun,
But by remembered kisses made
To feel, tho' lonely, undismayed,
Glides into dreamland unafraid.

The weary man, life's long day done,
Looks lovingly at his last sun,
Sees all friends fade, fears night begun,
But by remembered mercies made
To feel, tho' dying, undismayed,
Glides into glory unafraid.

—Bishop H. W. Warren, in The Independent.

Selected for "THE FRIEND."

From a Letter of John Thorp.

My dear friend, what can we do for our children? Nothing of ourselves, to be sure, that will do them any good; but through Divine help we can love, pity and pray for them, and indeed with some this is the last and only resource; and oh! the fear that I have felt lest I should be deficient here. "The fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much;" let us be found diligent in this holy exercise. The example of Job is worthy our imitation, and with what fervency did the father of the faithful address the Most High with this petition, "O that Ishmael might live before Thee!" "God forbid," said the prophet Samuel, concerning the rebellious house of Israel, "that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you." Oh! that we may be found fervent enough, and frequent in this great duty, often retiring to the closet of our hearts, the temple which God hath chosen, and there pouring forth our supplication to "our Father, which art in Heaven," that He would take our children under his care. Much benefit would arise from this practice. Let us remember the example of the woman who came to Christ, and would not be denied (Matt. xv: 22); and likewise the parable of our blessed Lord, by which He taught that men should always pray and not faint (Luke xviii).

Oh! the consolation and support we also should derive from thus spreading our cause before the Lord, and committing ourselves, our children and our all into his hand, who is the Shepherd and Bishop of souls.

KNOWING GOD'S VOICE.—For years I puzzled and struggled over the text, "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them and they follow me" (John x: 27). I looked around among professing Christians, aye, among professors of holiness, and they did not know the voice of the Lord. They said, "You must use your reason and your sanctified common sense and trust the judgment God has given you." One day I took the "hard question" to the Wise One and said: "Lord, Christians don't know Thy voice." He answered so gently, "My sheep do." Then I understood. A sheep is a Christian whose chief characteristics are simplicity and harmlessness. They know the Shepherd's voice who are gentle, unresisting, humble and quiet. When I take my place as his sheep, I have no trouble in hearing his voice.—Word and Work.

The Second Coming of Christ.

BY ARTHUR W. DOWE.

In an age when religion has become largely a matter of mere form and appearances, a mere lip profession of beliefs and dogmas, and when materialism has such a dominant hold on the minds of the masses that nothing short of external proof of the truth of Divine revelation will be accepted, it is intensely refreshing to turn to the early fundamental teachings and experiences of Friends who spake as those "having authority" of things which they had truly felt and known. "That which was from the beginning which they had heard, which they had seen with their eyes, which they had looked upon and their hands had handled of "the Word of life." Where the testimony was daily offered that "the life was manifested, and they had seen it, and bore witness, and showed unto others that eternal life which was with the Father and was manifested unto them" (1st John i: 1-2). And while the senses by which these things were apprehended were not natural but spiritual, they were nevertheless to those who exercised them as real and substantial as any by which outward testimony is received and recorded.

Probably in no age in the world has so much been said and written concerning the literal second coming of Christ as in the present. Books and pamphlets and papers in great numbers are being scattered broadcast proclaiming the near approach of the Lord God and Saviour Jesus Christ, in power and glory, to gather his elect into the new Jerusalem, and to save them from the wrath about to be poured out upon the present evil world. "Times" have been set over and over again when the Lord is to appear; even the day and the hour and the very spot where his feet are to touch this old earth are marked out with what is, to the writers, unerring precision, all of which is confirmed by ingenious arguments drawn from the Scriptures or by special vision or revelations in dreams, etc.

The late writings of Lieutenant Totten led thousands of enthusiastic but deluded followers to look for Jesus to come externally in person to the earth before the end of the year 1899. And the writer of this article personally heard a prominent Western evangelist publicly declare that he would risk his eternal salvation on the literal fulfillment of the second coming of Christ within the time specified by Professor Totten. The air is full of the returning of the Jewish race to Jerusalem, the "rebuilding of the Temple," etc. William Miller was the originator of a wide-spread agitation of a similar nature in 1846 as that now troubling the world, all of which came to the same disappointing end and left many of its followers in the same uncertainty and doubt, and often infidelity, as the present. Such extremes spring largely from materializing spiritual truths, as well as the prying into the secret things of God by the carnal mind, which is enmity to the things of the Spirit.

Scholarship is placed before spirituality, and instead of waiting patiently on God till his Spirit reveals the secrets of God, men fall to searching, and by their own efforts expect to wrench from the Holy Scriptures those mysteries that are "hid from the wise and prudent and revealed unto babes."

Natural men believing themselves to be spiritual, reading the words of holy men (old, take to themselves the honor of expounding God's meaning. Not realizing that "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet himself is judged of no man" (1st Cor. 14-15). Now it was the custom of the early Friends, and is still the custom among those who are Friends indeed, "to speak not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth, comparing spiritual things with spiritual" (1st Cor. ii: 13). Not as matters of opinion, but of experience and knowledge, by the same Spirit which put for the Scriptures through the apostles and prophets, an example of which is found in the following spiritual application of the Second Coming of Christ without Sin unto Salvation written by William Shewen, a member of the Society of Friends, a linen draper by trade who died in the city of London, England, the year 1695: "As this view of the truth and the inward experience of the same is really the one thing needful, and is the blessed privilege of all to enjoy and know for themselves while upon this earth, and by which alone they are fit for the life of the world to come, cannot but raise our voice as a trumpet to call people to turn from the outward and fleshly setting of times and reasons wherein is trouble and disappointment forever, to the inward and spiritual and celestial view of the appearance of Christ which fully satisfies and fills the soul with the good things that are shared common by all who find the true kingdom of God which Truth says is within you."

By thus building upon the word of God one is always ready for whatever outward dispersion it may be his providence to manifest. Always recognizing the truth that growth and manifestation is from within outwards instead of to the contrary, which many well-meaning people seem to hold.

"It is a blessed thing truly to know how to wait for the appearance of Jesus, and to know Him when He doth appear. I say this is very blessed; but it is more blessed, or a greater degree of blessedness, to be witnesses of His appearance, and to join with Him when He doth appear, and so to experience the end of his appearance accomplished, abiding with Him till He finished, truly understanding the wherefore He doth appear, and their state and condition at his appearance.

"This is the main thing chiefly to be understood and minded throughout all dispensations and under them all He is to be carefully minded and regarded, though it be in his first or best appearance, which is to convince of self-righteousness and judgment; in order to destroy sin, finish transgression, and bring everlasting righteousness. Except people abide with Him, and love his appearance in the ministration of condemnation, which brings tribulation and anguish upon the soul that has sinned, they can never come to enjoy and inherit the ministration of life and salvation to enjoy the glory of his appearance the second time without sin unto salvation.

"This is the loss and misery of man and

It was our loss and misery in the day of our ignorance, that they know not how to wait for the appearance of Christ, or the coming of the first One. Neither did they, nor do we, know when He did appear; for He often appeared unto us and stood at the doors of our hearts, and knocked and waited to show himself gracious unto us, but we, not knowing it was He, did not regard Him nor open unto Him. Yet He who was indeed the desire of our hearts, and Him whom we longed to enjoy, is the desire of all nations, the Light and Salvation of the Gentiles, the consolation and glory of Israel. But in this was our loss and misery, that we knew not how to wait for his appearance, neither did we know Him when He appeared. So I say again, it is a blessed thing for a people to know how to wait for the appearance of Jesus the Saviour, and to know when He doth appear. But behold, this is a greater degree of blessedness, to be witnesses of his appearance, and to know the coming of the Just One, or the rising of the One of Righteousness with healing under his wings, and to be able to say, with the primitive Christians, "We know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, whereby we know Him that is true, and are in Him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ; this is the true God and eternal life" (1st John v: 20). This is a high and heavenly knowledge and a blessed state. This mark and prize of the high calling of God Jesus Christ we have been called unto, and this is the state all are to wait for, inherit and possess, and not sit down short of it. If this we have not witnessed and enjoyed, all profession is vain, all knowledge is vain, all religion and piety of christianity is vain and of no worth; it is he that believes that Christ is come in flesh, and that demonstrates the livingness of his faith by the works thereof, that is of God, and God dwelleth in him, and he in God. This is more than a bare profession of verbal confession, according to the testimony of John the Divine, in his first epistle, chapter iv. It is a very blessed state to be found true witnesses for, and witnesses of, the second coming of Christ, which is without sin unto salvation (Heb. ix: 28). For true happiness doth consist in having seen one of the days of the Son of man, or in being witnesses of his appearance, wherein He convinceth and revealeth for sin, but in waiting for and witnessing his second coming to cleanse, save and redeem from sin; herein is the joy of our salvation felt and enjoyed. Christ's appearance is first to convince of sin, and this is a ministration of condemnation, which is glorious in its time, but there is a ministration which exceeds in glory, which we are to wait for, witness and not sit down short of. This is the mark of the highest thing, the high and heavenly state which they are called to even to know the second coming of Christ, without sin unto salvation, and a being entered to the Father without spot or wrinkle, to possess and enjoy is the end, sum and substance of all the dispensations of God towards mankind ever since the fall. This is the end of good words and writings and the end of Christ's first and second appearance."

Let me ask the readers of the above, Do you thus know Jesus? "Thou shalt call his name Jesus because He shall save his people from their sins" (Matt i: 21). Has He thus appeared to you? Do you know the power and glory of the kingdom of God? If not, then you are in great danger. Give yourselves no rest, day nor night, till sin is slain and the everlasting King of Righteousness reigns in thy soul. God grant it.

AGUACATE, CUBA.

ORIGIN OF MONTHS' NAMES.— January was named after the Roman god Janus, the deity, with two faces one looking into the past and the other gazing forward to the future, writes Clifford Howard, in the Ladies' Home Journal. February comes from the Latin word februo, to purify. It was customary for the Romans to observe festivals of purification during that month. March owes its name to the old God of War. Among the Saxons this month was known as Lenot, meaning spring, and this is the origin of our word Lent. April was named from the Latin aperio, to open, in significance of the opening of flowers. The Saxons called the month Easter, in honor of their Goddess of Spring, from which comes our word Easter.

May was named after the Roman goddess Maia, and June was so called in honor of Juno. July was named in honor of Julius Caesar. September is from the Latin septem, seven, this being the seventh month according to the old Roman calendar. October, November and December also retain the names by which they were known under the old calendar, when there were but ten months in the year—octo, novem and decem, meaning eight, nine and ten.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Power of Sunshine.

Over ninety millions of miles from this earth rolls that grand centre of our solar system which, centuries ago, seemed so awe-inspiring to the ancients that they worshipped it, and which we, the people of this modern age, cannot look upon to-day and fail to discover there a mighty embodiment of infinite power. This power of the sun comes to us and is felt by us in such a mysterious manner that we cannot understand it. We have only to step a short distance from the doors of our homes in order to be completely surrounded by the indirect evidences of its work. Every flower that springs from the bleak earth that the snow left so desolate, every blade of grass that makes the complicated scenery of each landscape a little richer, every tree that sends forth leaves after its few months of rest and quiet, every manifestation of nature that comes with the oncoming of spring, — tells its own story, bearing testimony in silence to the power that produced and nourished it. It is sunshine wielded by God's finger, that makes Nature so beautiful just now. Leaves would not grow, birds would not sing, flowers would not bloom. There would be no spring, no summer, no autumn, were it not for the sunshine which drives winter backward for nine months of the year. It puts the song into the heart of the bird, and music upon the lips of nature. It makes the air heavy with fragrance and delights the eye with the fresh green of the meadows. Lowell fully appreciated the beauties of spring when he wrote:

"Every clod feels a stir of might,
An instinct within it that reaches and towers,

And groping blindly above it for light
Climbs to a soul in grass and flowers;
The flush of life may well be seen
Thrilling back over hills and valleys;
The cowslip startles in meadows green,
The buttercup catches the sun in its chalice,
And there's never a leaf or a blade too mean
To be some happy creature's palace!"

With justice we may claim the right to call sunshine one of the greatest gifts of the Creator, since it makes the earth beautiful and fruitful, and life worth living; since it gives the poor man his daily bread, the rich man his luxuries, the artist his models, the poet his theme and his inspiration. As it spreads over all the wide world, coming from that source of all heat and light, the sun, and giving life to plant and animal, it may be well termed the symbol of the life-giving and all-sustaining power of the Creator himself, teaching us to look for his finger behind every manifestation of nature.

Perhaps it is only a reflection of the brightness of nature outside, but there exists within the human heart, which has been called a world in itself, something of this same power of sunshine. Not the mere material sunshine, that quickens the grass and flowers, but the spiritual sunshine, the sunshine of the soul, that which gladdens the life of the individual and places such a stamp upon him that he may always be recognized. It is the quality that makes us happy. Surely there can be no more miserable soul in all this world than that soul that never smiled. While we realize that "into each life some rain must fall," Nature is not always dark and dreary, and the sunshine of a happy spirit ought to drive away the clouds of unhappiness. When the cold rain falls on the earth, it is the indirect work of the sun, and when discouragement and disappointment bring sadness to a human soul, it is only a rainy day inside, "Behind the clouds the sun is still shining"—cheerfulness and contentment can make a life as beautiful and as fully alive and useful as the life of nature all around us, if the sunshine of the soul only be shed about us as brightly as the rays fall on the earth without. While the single individual is thus changed by the twin virtues of cheerfulness and contentment, in proportion as he possesses them, no less potent are the good results which are received by all with whom that individual comes in contact. The best feature of this spiritual sunshine is that it goes hand in hand with charity and leaves its indelible mark not only on its possessor's life and character, but in the deeds of other men. The individuality of a man is reflected in the life of his companions, and not only are the virtues of his life copied, and magnified, but the dark side of his nature leaves a still darker shadow on his friend. It thus becomes our duty to receive the reflected sunshine of great lives, and to "make our lives sublime" by being also reflectors, scattering kind words and good deeds everywhere. And the life, which, above all others, we must learn to copy and reflect, is that of the Sun of Righteousness himself. From every act of his earthly existence, from the cradle to the cross, shines the glorious sunshine of perfect patience, of boundless love, of renewed hope, bright with the halo of a perfect human life and brighter still with the glory of Divinity. Nature teaches us to be cheerful; God teaches us to be patient. The united lesson of the sunshine of the soul, and of the solar system is to hide the shadows. We should learn to rise above the clouds, to look on the bright side of things, and since "every cloud has a silver lining," looking from above, we shall see only the bright side of the clouds of misfortune. Nature in this season of spring-time bids us to be happy and invites us to admit the sunshine into our lives, to say with Bryant, "The sunshine on my path, was to me as a friend." No human being, with all of God's works at their grandest at this delightful season, can afford to be unhappy. Nature is rejoicing with "the high tide of the year," and therefore let man be happy, too, for "one touch of nature makes the whole world kin." Springtime is a synonym of brightness and has been appropriately called "the season of joyful music." The silent voices of the flowers and the musical medleys of the birds are singing the same song in nature's praise. No one could have learned this lesson and caught the inspiration of the season better than Browning when he wrote:

"The year's at the spring,
The day's at the morn;
Morning's at seven,
The hillside's dew-pearled,
The snail's on the thorn,
The lark's on the wing,
God's in his heaven—
All's right with the world!"

It is estimated that there are 10,000,000 Jews in the world; 4,500,000 are comprised in the Russian dominions and 1,800,000 in the Austrian.

Items Concerning the Society.

Joseph Potts, formerly of Philadelphia, has become editor of the North Carolina Friend.

The Yearly Meeting in Ohio to which the proposed "Uniform Discipline" was offered, has declined to accept it. The other Yearly Meetings thus far heard from, while some have provisionally adopted it, have generally deferred conclusion till their next year's sitting.

Mary P. Nicholson having during the present week attended the meeting for worship at Westfield, N. J., and the Monthly Meetings at Haddonfield and Mount Laurel, expects to be at Friends' meeting in Tuckerton next First-day, and at Barnegat the First-day following.

The decease of William White, an ex-Mayor of Birmingham, England, on the 11th ult., in his eighty-first year, takes away from his country the form of another of those eminent citizens, members of the Society of Friends, who have had a national reputation as men of wisdom in a Christian public spirit and service.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Weather Bureau has received from its local forecast official at Galveston, a report of the great hurricane of Ninth Month 8th.

The report gives a complete scientific record of the great storm, with a succinct account of the damage done. A map of the ruined area of the city, and records of the meteorological instruments at the station, up to the time they were destroyed by the hurricane.

The wind before 8 P. M. reached hurricane velocity, and a record of over eighty-four miles an hour, was maintained for five minutes. When the wind reached one hundred miles an hour the anemometer was carried away. It is estimated that this gust reached a velocity of one hundred and twenty miles an hour.

The map of the area of total destruction, indicates that 3636 houses were totally destroyed. The loss of life is estimated at over 6000. Property damage will exceed $30,000,000.

Subscriptions forwarded from this city to Tenth Month

1st, $95,862.21. The Governor announces total receipts have been $672,476.29.

But little change has taken place in the Anthracite Coal district during the past week. The fear of the riots have somewhat quieted, and a portion of the troops has been withdrawn. The operators have offered an advance of 10 per cent. in wages, and to submit other differences to arbitration, but the miners are slow to accept any proposition that does not recognize the United Mine Worker's Association.

A special to the Tribune from Valley City, N. D., says: Judge J. M. Dennett has just returned from the Cascade Mountain district of Washington, bringing samples and news of the location of the vast fields of pure anthracite coal. In company with Professor Burch, a mineral expert of Seattle, Judge Dennett penetrated into the Cascade range sixty miles from the railroad, and after two days of prospecting located veins showing nineteen feet of coal, and located on 640 acres of land. He estimated the quantity of coal in sight at 25,000,000 tons. Judge Dennett first discovered the coal on a prospecting trip in the 60's, but lost track of the location till his recent visit. He will form a company to work the veins. The samples shown are of the same quality, but lighter, than the Scranton product.

The long absence of heavy rains is reported to have caused the Schuylkill river to fall to the lowest point known in more than thirty years, and some of the mills at Manayunk have been obliged to suspend partially their operations for want of water power.

If the drought shall not soon be broken, there is apprehension that the general supply for Philadelphia will be seriously diminished.

The Pennsylvania Steel Company has just been awarded a contract for 6000 tons of steel rails by the East Indian Railway Company, of India. The contract is said to be worth $250,000.

The production of aluminum for commercial uses began in 1889 with a total output of 47,463 pounds. In 1898 it had reached 5,200,000 pounds, and at present the rate of production is over 7,000,000 pounds a year.

A German syndicate has just made arrangements whereby it secures all the timber on a large strip of land in the mountains in the Eastern Kentucky. It is estimated that the strip contains about 800,000 of the finest specimens of oak trees.

The Chicago Times-Herald calls attention to the growth of commerce in America's unique chain of inland seas. The lake trade, it says shows the most marvelous development of any marine commerce in the world.

During last year 20,055 vessels, carrying 25,255,810 tons passed through the Sault St. Marie Canal, which connects Lake Superior with the lower lakes. This was more than double the number of vessels, and more than three times the tonnage which passed through in 1889.

It is also interesting to note the influence of the lakes upon the transportation problem. In 1857, it cost nearly 10 cents to ship a hushel of wheat from Chicago to Buffalo. Now, the rate is a slight fraction over a cent, while for the forty-one years the average rate has been a trifle over five cents.

The report of Commissioner of Immigration of New York, shows that the arrival of foreigners the last fiscal year were 400,482. The immigration from Southern Europe shows an increase, while from the northern countries it is decreasing.

There were 347 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 9 less than the previous week and 17 less than the corresponding week of 1899. The new cases of diphtheria, scarlet fever and typhoid fever and the deaths caused thereby for the past two weeks were as follows:

	Ninth Mo. 22nd.		Ninth Mo. 29th.
	Cases.	Deaths.	Cases.	Deaths.
Diphtheria . . .	101	15	77	10
Scarlet fever . . .	12	2	29	1
Typhoid fever . . .	41	5	70	7
Markets, &amp;c. — U. S. 2's, new, 104½ to 105; 3's, reg., 109½ to 110½; 4's, reg., 114½ to 115½; new 4's, 134 to 135; 5's, 113½ to 114.

COTTON.—11c. per pound for middling uplands.
 FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.50 to $2.70; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.40 to $3.60; Western winter, clear, $3.35 to $3.55; do., patent, $3.80 to $4.10; spring, favorite brands, $4.40 to $4.60; city mills, patent, $4.00 to $4.60. RYE FLOUR.—$3.10 per barrel, for choice Ponna.
 GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 75½ to 76c.
 No. 2 mixed corn, 45½ to 46c.
 No. 1 white oats, 29c.
 No. 2 white oats, 28c.
 BEEF CATTLE.—Prime, $5.85; good, $5.45 to $5.85; medium, $4.50 to $5.40.
 SHEEP.—$2.50 to $4.12½. LAMBS.—$4.25 to $5.40.
 FOREIGN.—The first step toward a practical realization of the plans of the Hague Peace Conference have been taken. A meeting was held at the Hague on Ninth Month 4th of the resident diplomatic representative of sixteen of the nations represented at the original Hague Conference, and a permanent organization effected which took the form of a council of administration. A list of the ministers deposited ratified copies of the various treaties emanating from the conference to which the respective governments had given their adherence.

No case of yellow fever has been reported at Santiago de Cuba, since Twelfth Month last. This is said to be owing to the persistent efforts of the Commander of the Department. One hundred miles of streets are swept daily, and previously infected houses have been ten times disinfected. A house to house inspection is made by the surgeons, and thousands of gallons of carbolic acid and tons of chloride of lime have been used.

There are 75,531 exhibitors at the Paris Exposition 1900, and 42,790 of these received awards in five different grades. Out of 2,829 diplomas given of the Grand Prix, the United States received 218, and out of 8,166 gold medals given, the United States received 486. There are also 6,000 exhibitors from the United States at the Paris Exposition, and about 2,000 of these, or more than one third, received an award in one of the five different grades.

Uruguay's population, according to the census taken Third Month 1st, is about 900,000. For the whole of the republic, except Montevideo, the official returns are Uruguayans, 509,165; foreigners, 90,199, and 8 per cent added to the possible omissions, making 647,813. The present estimate for Montevideo is 252,713.

RECEIPTS.

Unless otherwise specified, two dollars have been received from each person, paying for vol. 74.

Homer Child, Iowa; Milton Stanley, Agent, for Albert Maxwell and Joel D. Carter; John Sharpless, Pa.; Paschall Worth, Pa.; John E. D. nell, N. J.; Wm. M. Parker, Pa.; George Rorke; for Sarah V. Rorke, Canada; Arnoldi Haight, Canada $14 for himself, Lydia Moore, Lydia Clayton, Frank Starr, Mordecai F. Starr, Albert E. Starr, and J. D. Roland; Sarah L. Smedley, Pa.; Benj. P. Hoop, Phila.; Alice Tucker, Mass.; A. Herford Cool, Pa., to No. 14 vol. 75; Mary E. Whitacre, Pa. to 14 vol. 75.

Remittances received after Third-day noon will appear in the Receipts until the following week.

NOTICES.

An elderly man, a Friend living in a suburban town far from Philadelphia wishes to procure a housekeeper a Friend preferred. Address "M," Office of THE FRIEND.

THE CORPORATION OF HAVERFORD COLLEGE.—The Annual Meeting will be held in the Committee Room of 11th Street Meeting House, Philadelphia, on Third-day, Tenth Month 9th, 1900, at 3 o'clock, P. M.

GEORGE VAUX, JR., Secretary,
404 Girard Building, Philadelphia

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage will run trains leaving Philadelphia 7.17 and 8.19 A. M., and at 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when required. Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., twenty cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, Westtown Station or West Chester, Phone 85.

EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Superintendent

Friends' Library, 142 N. Sixteenth St., Philadelphia

Recent additions to the Library are the following:
 CHAPMAN, F. M.—Bird Studies, with a Camera.
 DEARMER, Percy.—Highways and Byways in Normandy.
 FISKE, John.—Mississippi Valley in the Civil War.
 GRINNELL, G. B.—Indians of To-day.
 HARRISON, Frederic.—Tennyson, Ruskin, Mill. * * *
 LOWELL, J. R.—Impressions of Spain.
 MOODY, W. R.—Life of Dwight L. Moody.
 MORLEY, M. W.—Down North and Up Along.
 ROBERTS, Ellwood.—Plymouth Meeting, Pa.
 SCHIEL, Edith.—Household of the Lafayettees.
 Open on week-days from 11.30 A. M. to 2 P. M. and on 3 P. M. to 6 P. M.

DIED, at his home near Coal Creek, Keokuk County, Ia. on the seventeenth of Ninth Month, 1900, DAVID J. [Name obscured] after a severe illness of near four weeks, in the fifty-fifth year of his age; a member of Coal Creek Monthly and Particular Meeting of Friends.

WILLIAM H. PILE'S SONS, PRINTERS
No. 422 Walnut Street

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TENTH MONTH 13, 1900.

No. 13.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,
No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,
PHILADELPHIA.

South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth,

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to
JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

Quakerism Not Declining.

We have an observation to make on the following, taken from the Christian at Work:

In an editorial on "Quakerism" in a recent number of the London Spectator, it was asserted as a deplorable fact that this form of faith is slowly dying away." The writer regretted its decadence because, in his view; the Society of Friends is a religious body made up of men and women of the rarest type, whose influence is felt everywhere and counts for the best and noblest things in life and character. In a subsequent number of the Spectator appears a characteristic letter from a Quaker reader declaring that the statement as to the declining membership of the Society was an error, so far at least as the United Kingdom is concerned. "Far from the Society of Friends 'hastening to an honored grave,' says the correspondent, 'it is every year increasing. The addition to membership this year is 121, a rather smaller number than usual. Looking over a longer period, we find that the present number in England and Scotland is 17,153, against 13,341 in 1861. The increase is, as a rule, slightly in excess of the growth of the general population. And when its source is examined, it still more clearly contradicts the notion that our recruits do not repair the losses caused by voluntary secessions;' for less than one in three of our new members enter by the gate of birth, the rest come by 'convincement.' There were 100 adult recruits this year (a poor year), against 138 'seceders.' The fact is, we make an annual loss on 'births and deaths,' and only increase by adhesions from outside. This curious phenomenon in natural decrease is due to the fact that our marriages are rather late and imprudent, our families not large, and a rule now present exists by which admission at birth is only granted to children both of whose parents are in membership."

QUAKERISM declining, or not declining? what are the statistics to do with this? Quakerism is not a census of members, but a concensus of principles. An increasing list of members of the Society of Friends may occur with a decline of Quakerism, or a decreasing list be no proof that Quakerism is not advancing. We have ample evidence of large accessions in membership where Quakerism is very little in evidence, where, indeed, to accommodate a swelling list in numbers, Quakerism is put on the retiring list. The one census-taker possible for Quakerism is not a counter of heads, but the Searcher of hearts.

Quakerism is a dependence on and being led by the immediate witness of the Divine Spirit in the heart. Several doctrines and practices are essentially connected with this root-principle, but this is the one without which Quakerism anywhere would be impossible,—as impossible as the philosophy of lightning with electricity left out.

Though the Society of Friends were wiped out of existence to-day, this would not assure us that Quakerism is not on the increase. That spiritual principle which the name stands for is obviously gaining recognition in the churches of Christendom generally, and its increase is the increase of Quakerism under whatever name. "Names are nothing, Christ is all," said he who was first called "Quaker." And in proportion as Christ becomes practically head over all things to his church and people, will all that immediate and practical headship be Quakerism, whether with or without a name.

Accordingly the census-taker of our profession must look through all the churches, and through as many outside of churches "as are led by the Spirit of God," in order to ascertain an increase of Quakerism. And in doing all this, He will find in the Society of Friends some instances,—we trust some of the best,—of a spiritual right to the name. But our own lists of membership in general carry far too little significance in that respect.

Selected for "THE FRIEND."

WHAT IS CHRISTIAN LIFE?—It is doing faithfully every day what the Lord wants us to do. Some think if they attend to more important duties the little duties can be neglected and it doesn't matter when Sunday is past if they deal unjustly, deviate from truth, lose their temper, speak the unkind word and join the world in pursuit of pleasure. Such are in error. Christian life is serving God in every daily act, and it is our everyday life that reveals exactly what kind of Christians we are. To grow strong in Christian character and experience we should do everything heartily as unto the Lord. The Master whom we serve does not want luke-warm servants. Such will exert no influence for his cause. "I can do all things through Christ, who strengtheneth me," should be the Christian motto. The Christian life is not only one of working and exemplifying, but of waiting and hoping and looking for better things and running with patience the race that is set before you.—H. L. Jackson.

For "THE FRIEND."

Changes in the Calendar.

An extract in last week's FRIEND on the names of the months contains some mistakes. In offering a correction it is perhaps not out of place to give a brief narrative of the changes which have been made in the calendar, especially as some points of particular interest to Friends have not, so far as I am aware, recently appeared in print. These facts may have been discussed in the periodicals at the time the changes were made, but they have now been pretty generally lost sight of.

The Roman Calendar, so far as known, never consisted of less than twelve months. Julius Cæsar sought to correct irregularities then existing and adopt a calendar which should be scientifically correct. He called in the aid of an Alexandrian astronomer, and decreed that the year should consist of 365 days of three successive years, and then of 366. The year began with the month now called March, and the intercalary day was added at the end of the year. Quintilis, the name of the fifth month, was changed to July in honor of the reformer of the calendar. The next emperor, not to be outdone, changed Sextilis to August.

It was found that the true length of the solar year was slightly less than 365½ days, so that the vernal equinox gradually shifted its place in the year. Pope Gregory XIII decreed that "October 4th," 1582 should be followed by "October 15th," thus restoring the vernal equinox to the place in the calendar which it had held in Julius Cæsar's time. This change was soon adopted by all Roman Catholic countries, and more slowly by Protestant ones. England was the last to make the change, adopting the Gregorian calendar in 1752. The changes introduced by Pope Gregory included the omission of the years divisible by 100 from the list of leap-years unless they were also divisible by 400. Thus 1700 had been a leap-year in England, but not in Catholic countries. Eleven days, therefore, were dropped in 1752, Ninth Month 2nd, being followed by Ninth Month 14th.

Advices were sent out by authority of London Yearly Meeting, in accordance with which Friends not only dropped out the eleven days, but began the year with the month called January instead of March. In this matter of the beginning of the year there had been difference of practice for a long time, so that events occurring in the months called January and February were given with a double date. Thus on the marriage certificate of Thomas Kite and Mary Brientnal the date is given as "Twelfth Month, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and forty-two-three. The year 1751 for Friends contained only ten months, for they had before called March the first month. If the common people in England called out "Give us back our eleven days," how much more might Friends be tried at losing two months beside! In the minutes of one of the monthly meetings on this continent, I find that one meeting was held in "Ninth Month, 1751." The next was held in "December, 1751," and the next in "First Month, 1752." This, I think, is quite positive proof of the fact that Friends had before begun their year with the month called March.

In Russia the Gregorian calendar has not yet been adopted. They are, therefore, now thirteen days behind time, and letters written from Russia are sometimes dated thus:—

"June 27, 1900."
"July 10,

Praying, and Saying Prayers.

All sincere seeking after God, under whatever form, is prayer—the effort of the soul to find its rest and peace. The very act of praying is an assertion and expression of our kinship with God.

Any one can "say" his prayers. Any one can repeat beautiful words learned out of a book. But to pray as the Master prayed, to touch the springs of life and quench the thirst of the soul, to talk with God and to know that it is God with whom one is speaking, is no light or easy thing. No habit of the religious life more quickly degenerates into a mere form than this. It is as easy to turn off holy words and set phrases addressed to the divine Being as for a Buddhist to turn his wheel. Every one who reflects, who studies himself, knows the danger to which he is constantly exposed—the danger of making the holiest act of life formal and unreal—and probably nothing else does so much to dwarf and injure the spiritual life of multitudes of good people as this degeneracy in their worship, this failure to feel the solemnity of prayer and the severe demand which it makes upon the soul.

To the sweet and lovely Christian, troubled by no great temptations, assaulted by no dangerous enemies, to the innocent and trustful child, prayer may be the quietest and most restful of acts, simple, childlike, easy. But to him whose very life has been assailed, who feels himself in the midst of mortal foes, whose every victory has been a costly thing, and who knows what it means to suffer the humiliation of defeat, to him prayer is an agony, often a Gethsemane, a wrestling like that of Jacob's, demanding and calling into exercise every energy of mind and heart. Is not that what Jesus meant by importunity, and what Jacob felt when he said, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me?" One such experience as that will do more for the education of the soul, its discipline, development, and power, than years of ordinary praying, and no life is so smooth or passionless that it does not have in it many of these crucial hours.—P. W. Baldwin.

"One cannot think once for all and then live thoughtlessly; he cannot choose once for all and then live carelessly; every day and every hour he must make his choice between the narrow path of virtue and the vice which lies all the way on either side of him."—L. Abbott.

Samuel Tuke — His Life Work and Thoughts.

(Continued from page 94.)

The interest which Samuel Tuke felt in providing suitable reading for his fellow-townsmen resulted in a library for the lower classes—in which "everything absolutely injurious was rigorously excluded." He was also a teacher in a newly started adult school during the winter of 1816.

His diary about this period shows much mature reflection; among other entries of this character the following have been selected, viz: "How amazingly does obedience enlarge our knowledge of the true motives and tendencies of our actions, and enable us to know, as by a single perception, rather than a train of reasoning, what that good is which we ought to pursue. "The process may be compound, but it has, like the perception of the visual organs, all the character of intuition."

"They that do the will shall know the doctrine."

"Purity of heart is essential to perfection of understanding."

"There is an evident want of able and willing laborers to dig and prune in the garden of our Society."

"Our remarkable grandfather seems to stand as almost the last relic of a race of worthies, whose like I sometimes fear we are never to look upon again. Yet the Hand that formed them is not less able or less willing to form their successors, nor are the materials less capable. Why, then, are we so degenerate? Are the vessels saying to him that formeth them, 'What doest thou?' We wish to work in our own way, to eat our own bread and drink our own water; but yet to be called by the name of Christ. We wish to be called disciples, but are not willing to be conformed either to the simplicity of our Master's birth or the sufferings of his death. Yet the terms of discipleship remain unaltered. 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, take up his cross and follow me.'"

The condition of the prisons in England claimed the frequent thought of Samuel Tuke, and we find him visiting them in different places and not infrequently reading from the Scriptures to groups of prisoners. Forgery and stealing were capital offences at that time, and he mentions a lad of only nine years under the sentence of death.

Lindley Murray's home was a frequent resort for the Tukes, situated as it was near York. Hannah Richardson, the housekeeper, gave them a warm welcome and provided entertainment for the children, escorting them also into the presence of Lindley Murray, whose "grave but very kind face" left a lasting impression upon all who knew him.

"He thought Christian people ought not to use costly things and spend a great deal of money to make themselves grand or even very comfortable"—while so many poor people needed help.

Wm. Tuke passed into the unseen world "without a sigh or struggle, and almost without the appearance of disease," Twelfth Month 6th, 1822, in his ninetieth year. Changes began to appear in the Society of Friends shortly after this time, which have very much affected and in places quite transformed its character.

It was two years after the death of his venerable grandfather that Samuel Tuke first appeared in the ministry. This occurred while accompanying his aunt Ann Alexander and Deborah Backhouse on a visit to the families of some newly received members of their Monthly Meeting. The sense he had of the importance of his high calling is feelingly set forth by himself, "I think nothing but a sense of that woe which attends the dereliction of what we feel to be our duty would have led me to open my mouth in this manner. O Lord, if it be thy will that I should thus advocate thy cause on earth, unworthy as I am, be pleased more and more to subject my will to thy all holy direction and guidance! Oh, simplify, purify and strengthen me." An honored elder wrote about this time, "There is certainly something of zeal spreading amongst the younger part of our large Quarterly Meeting and in no instance of dedication have I felt more comforted than in that of Samuel Tuke who closed the sitting on Fourth-day evening by an offering in thanksgiving and supplication, under a cover of solemnity, equal, I think to any I have witnessed. The effect was very striking and to some, I suppose, rather astonishing. I cannot but think how some whose spirits are now at rest would have rejoiced."

About this time he commenced a compilation of biographical sketches and selected from the writings of early Friends, and in the connection he wrote to Lindley Murray, Ninth Month 24th, 1824, "At a time when the Society is coming more into public notice and when its members are anxious to repel the insinuations of unsoundness of faith, it appears to me important for ourselves to bear in mind and perhaps to be put in mind of that high standard of conduct which the writings no less than the lives of our early confessors maintained."

The death of Priscilla Tuke in her fourth year, brought overwhelming sadness to Samuel Tuke and his motherless children, their aunt Maria doing what she could thereafter to supply their needs.

The establishment of the Friends' Provident Institution, was largely due to the interest and efforts of Samuel Tuke, who said, "Industry in business, prudence of expenditure and some restraint in present indulgences, was a view to a moderate provision for future wants of life and for those who are dependent upon us are among the general effects of a sound religious state of mind, and on the contrary, the idea that the pursuit of religion calls for the abandonment of the cares of life or that it is compatible with indolence or with the free expenditure of our money upon what is unnecessary for us when we have made no provision for the probable and almost certain wants of sickness, age and other vicissitudes is utterly at variance with true wisdom and with that godliness which is profitable for all things, for the life which now is and for the life which is to come."

The versatility of Samuel Tuke's mind repeatedly appears in the volume under review, especially in connection with the questions which were agitating the Society of Friends at that time, and his sentiments always having a wholesomeness truly consistent with a spiritually enlightened understanding. He writes to Josiah Foster under date of First Month 24th, 1832: "A great variety is compatible both with harmony and unity, and it is on-the recommendations of the Society to which belong that there is in it so little of the imposition of the human lines of faith. Indeed, it seems to have been one of the great objects for which the Society was raised to demolish those lines, and to establish again that liberty of the spirit which had been so much lost during the apostacy and so imperfectly restored at the Reformation. That apostacy and the imperfect restoration from it has led, I apprehend, to the present sectionary appearance of the church, which is likely to continue until the Spirit is more abundantly poured upon us from on high, and until under its healing wings, the now scattered and even jarring members of the common family shall be united in the liberty and in the love of the pure and simple gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

I believe in such a state of things. The views which our Society has taken of the immediate influence of the Spirit will not pass away . . . and I do feel it is my duty to endeavor to support them."

"When the love of churches has become cold they have usually attributed it to the deficiency of past means. We are, I apprehend, just in that position; whilst perhaps, on the other hand, some may be adhering in a sectarian spirit to the very forms of [godliness while denying the power], and considering our late dull and dormant state as the very perfection of the church. The struggle between these opposite parties will generally, in unprejudiced minds, be in favor of the revivalists, and so the simplicity of the truth is spoiled. Never did we, my dear friend, more need to seek for wisdom from on high, that wisdom which the Apostle describes as peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits."

The subject of foreign missions was beginning to engage the attention of English Friends early in the thirties, and it did not escape his discerning mind. Thus he says, "If any amongst us are constrained by the love of Christ to go and proclaim the Gospel to the heathen and the church have unity with their individual concern, let them by all means go forth (we may cite Daniel Wheeler was fitted out for his voyage to the South Pacific about this time), and we are provided with an arrangement for all their needful charges." It is interesting to read of one who had lived in India for some years as asked by Samuel Tuke "whether he had observed that there is any sense of right and wrong in those who have not known the Holy Scripture or the moral law which they promulgate. He answered unhesitatingly, 'Yes, there is nothing which we can appeal to with so much effect as the judgment within them of the great issues of good and evil. The only way a Hindu can be met is by an appeal to his moral consciousness and to the seat of judgment within him.'" A petition from two hundred and more citizens of York requesting Samuel Tuke to represent that city in Parliament was evidence of the high esteem in which he was held by his fellow-townsmen.

He declined the honor, but addressed the spectators in a speech which was long remembered for its eloquence and wise counsel. He said "Moral principle is the foundation on which all that is excellent, all that is glorious private or public character is built. It is that, fellow citizens, which truly secures the rights and liberties of mankind. If you act up to this, you will send men to Parliament of sound principles, men who will think much, whether they speak much or not. You will look to the House of Commons for moral integrity, for uprightness of conduct. I trust, fellow-citizens, this day is but the beginning of a better and a brighter day in our city. If we continue to act on those principles faithfully and fearlessly, we shall be able to do much towards reforming the House of Commons in the most essential particulars." A competent judge said of him "Samuel Tuke's eloquence was delightful; his choice of words singularly chaste, his manner calm and impressive, his enunciation distinct and clear. I never remember a speaker (John Bright possibly excepted), to whom it was a greater pleasure to listen."

(To be continued).

Fish-Eating Birds.

Nearly all the "killing" of land animals takes place on the surface of the earth. Very few birds are ever killed in the air, except by sportsmen and by a few hawks. In this country, the mole, the shrew and occasionally the fox and rat kill prey at a little distance below the surface. But the ocean is foraged and ravaged in all its coast waters from surface to sea bottom by fifty species of aquatic moles, varying in size from the seal to the sea parrots, swift, active and voracious creatures which abandon the light and land and air temporarily or for the greater part of their lives, and incessantly burrow in the deeps in pursuit of the fish. No form of life escapes them. If any sea creatures could hope to avoid the creatures of earth and air it would be the shellfish, great and small, firmly anchored to the rocks on the sea bottom, and often protected by shells of such flinty hardness that no bird and few beasts could be supposed capable of crushing them, even if they worked above water. It is conceivable that the gigantic walrus should dive down to the sea bed, and raking up the clam shells with his tusks should crunch them for a meal; but it is astonishing evidence of the invasion of the deep by creatures of the air that the scaup duck, the scoter and the elder, birds of swift flight and normal form, should dive fathoms deep to the mussel and whelk beds, and crush and devour these hard-shelled sea creatures with no more difficulty than a thrush breaks and eats a garden snail.

The only special equipment of the scoters and elders is the heavy ridge along the upper bill, which strengthens it when crushing the sea shells, and corrugated teeth or notches, like the "roughing" on the inside of a pair of pinchers, to aid in holding the shells. Yet they will fish and feed for hours in the roughest weather, devouring their food deep down below, where the surface disturbance reaches them not, and only rising for a moment to take breath before descending again to their submarine dinner-table. Equipped with this wonderful power of diving and shell crushing, they fare better than the more ambitious fish-eating birds, which have to pursue their prey in different parts of the sea according to the weather.—London Spectator.

THE spirit of God that gave forth the Scriptures is the rule of life and faith unto all the saints.

The Invention of the Safety Match.

A STORY OF THE LATE ARTHUR ALBRIGHT.

It will be remembered that the firm with which the late Arthur Albright was connected was the first to produce on a commercial scale the substance amorphous phosphorus, used in the manufacture of the safety match. The circumstances under which this kind of phosphorus was introduced into Sweden—the pioneer in the manufacture of safety matches—are interestingly told by Ernest Beckman, himself a Swede. He says:—

A large sample of the new product was shown at the Great Exhibition of 1851. There it attracted the attention of two Swedes, the brothers Lundström, founders of the great match factories at Jönköping, in Sweden. The idea struck them that it might be used for safety matches. They bought some of it and brought it home to Sweden. They had already experimented considerably in this line, but the prepared surface of the boxes, when stored for some time, lost the power of igniting. They now made sample boxes with amorphous phosphorus, and placed them as a deposit in the hands of a third person, with the intention of testing them in twelve months' time.

The whole thing, however, fell into oblivion until the approach of the Paris Exhibition of 1855. It then dawned upon the minds of the brothers Lundström that, in case these boxes were in good condition, no better exhibit from their firm could possibly be shown. Upon inquiry, it proved, however, that the boxes had completely disappeared. At last a vigorous search brought them to light among all kinds of rubbish in the garret of the house where they had first been deposited. F. Lundström has himself described to me their eager expectation when the box was to be opened. "You can be sure this will be useless, like so many of our experiments, so it's scarcely worth while to try them," said his brother, the well-known inventor. A match, however, was produced out of a box, rubbed against the prepared surface, and lo! there leaped before their eyes a bright little flame, the forerunner of untold millions. Upon this, a letter ordering a very large quantity of amorphous phosphorus, was immediately despatched to Arthur Albright, who was then in very moderate circumstances.

The reply to their order was of a rather uncommon character. It ran, as nearly as I remember, thus:—

"Gentlemen,—Amorphous phosphorus in such quantities as stated in your letter, can, to my best judgment, only be used for purposes of war. As I, who belong to the Society of Friends, disapprove of war, I beg respectfully to decline your order."

"When we read this," said Lundström, when narrating to me this incident, "my brother and I had a good laugh, and you may well imagine with what glee we promptly replied to Mr. Albright that he need not hesitate to accept our orders; not for war or destruction, but for peace, and the enlightenment of mankind."—London Friend.

"If only we could once try the highest form of Christianity on a large scale in our treatment of the heathen or in the relations between nations, an astounding change might be noticed."—Christian Register.

LINES WRITTEN IN MEMORY OF ABIGAIL VAIL, ON HEARING OF SOME OF HER LAST EXPRESSIONS.

"I will praise him forever,"
 The Lamb that was slain
 From the foundation of earth,
 Who has risen again;
 Dear Lord, I am weary,
 Thy hand would I hold.
 Shall I see thy sweet face
 When I enter thy fold?
 Shall the loved ones of earth
 Who have entered thy rest
 Gladly greet me again
 In realms of the blessed?
 Shall all sorrow be past,
 All tears wiped away,
 When I clasp their glad hands
 In blest realms of day?
 Shall life's toil and pains
 That wreck my frail bark
 Be remembered no more.
 When I am housed in thy ark,
 With loved ones of earth
 Washed white in his blood,
 Who are singing thy praises
 In the gardens of God?
 Shall we all meet again
 And join in thy praise
 Through eternity's cycle,
 Through numberless days?
 By thy grace they were saved,
 By thy love I shall be,
 By the blood of the Lamb
 Shed for them and for me.
 Yes, Lord, I am weary;
 But thou knowest best,
 In thy own blessed time
 I shall enter thy rest,
 The loved ones in Heaven
 I am longing to see;
 The loved ones of earth,
 I commend them to thee.
 Thy counsel I gave them,
 Thy will may they do:
 To the God of all grace
 May they ever be true;
 Thy bright angel host
 Are waiting to come
 Down to this dark earth
 To take my soul home,
 And when in great mercy
 Thou sayest, "Well done,"
 I will join the glad throng
 Around the white throne
 In singing thy praises,
 For ever and aye,
 In the home of the blessed
 Through eternity's day.

D. V.

A WONDERFUL TIMEPIECE. — What is perhaps the most wonderful watch in the world is in the possession of a resident of Prince George County, Md.

This remarkable timepiece, known as the Matile watch, from the name of its maker, was made at Looe, Switzerland, about forty years ago. It formed a feature of the Swiss exhibit at the Centennial held at Philadelphia in 1876, and was purchased on that occasion by its present owner. Mark Twain (S. L. Clemens) thus gives his impressions of the marvellous piece of mechanism:

"I have examined the wonderful watch made by H. L. Matile, and indeed it comes nearer to being a human being than any piece of mechanism I ever saw before. It knows the movements of the moon, and keeps exact record of them; it tells the day of the week, the date of the month, and the month of the year, and will do this perpetually; it tells the hour of the day, and the minute, and the second, and even splits the seconds into fifths, and marks the division by stop hands, having two of the latter; it can take accurate care of two race horses that start, not together, but one after another; it is a repeater, and musically chimes the hour, the quarter, the half, and the three-quarter hour, and also the minutes that have passed of an uncompleted quarter hour, so that a blind man can tell the time of day by it to the exact minute."

The watch was sold for $1,400, and it is still performing its complex functions with the greatest regularity. — Washington Times.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Ellen Johnson and the Sherborn Prison.

After the Civil War a band of earnest Massachusetts women urged the establishment of a prison exclusively for women. For seven years they besieged the Legislature for this object. Parlor meetings were held in Boston, petitions were circulated through the State, articles were written for the press, and reformers were brought to Massachusetts to plead for the reform. In 1870 a board of prison commissioners was formed consisting of three men with an advisory committee of three women. In 1874 the prison commission was authorized to purchase a site "and to cause to be erected thereon a suitable prison for a reformatory for women convicts, with accommodations for five hundred prisoners". A farm in the old town of Sherborn was bought, as it was found that it met all the requirements, ease of access, with pure air, sunshine and good drainage. The sum of $300,000 was appropriated for the building—plans approved in the Spring of 1875 and the completed structure accepted in the Autumn of 1877, having been finished within the amount appropriated.

The buildings face the southeast so that the sunlight reaches both sides during some part of the day. The main structure is four hundred and eighty-nine feet from end to end. The residence of the superintendent is connected with the prison by a covered bridge over an arch-way. The central building has three wings. The four grades of prisoners occupy different parts of the prison, all, excepting the lowest, having rooms with ordinary windows, instead of cells. There are large and well ventilated work-rooms, a fine chapel, a hospital, a cheerful nursery, and four dining rooms for the prisoners, besides those for matrons and assistants. The corridors are so numerous that, in order to make her rounds once, the superintendent must walk a mile, by actual measurement.

The system of treatment was formulated at the outset and has been followed from the time of the organization of the prison, with no interruption. The same spirit has animated the different superintendents and has permeated the prison from top to bottom. In the first place, the prison administration has been absolutely independent of politics; so there have been no changes except for good reasons.

When a woman is brought to the prison by the officer who has her in charge, she is taken to the superintendent and her name, age, nativity and certain other facts are recorded. After a bath she dons the prison dress and the prison physician makes a physical examination, the results of which are also recorded. She then goes into a probation room for a month, where she sees only the superintendent, the doctor, and the matron in charge. She has books to read, work in her room and daily exercise outside the room in the way of sweeping or scrubbing or similar work, at hour when the other prisoners cannot see her. While she is coming to herself in this enforced quiet, the officers are studying her, so that they may better understand her disposition and the best method of dealing with her.

On leaving probation she is taken to the office, where the superintendent has a plain talk with her, forbidding her to speak of her past life to other prisoners, and encouraging her to keep the prison rules, explaining how such obedience will lead to her promotion in grade. A record card is given to her which shows the number of marks she must earn for promotion to the next division, the number of days it will take to earn them, and the date on which those days will expire provided no marks are forfeited through misconduct.

The schooling in the reformatory plays a small part in the way of discipline, but it is doubtful if any other penal institution in the world encourages reading to the extent that this does. Every woman is compelled to have on her dress skirt a large, strong, flat pocket into which a book can easily be slipped. There is a good library of well chosen books, which is at the disposal of the women, and they carry their library book with them wherever they go. In this way if they have a few moments of spare time the book is always hand inviting them to read; and this is far preferable to gossiping with their mates.

The rearing and maintaining of this reformatory prison for women may be truly credited to the inspiration and patient labor of some of the best men and women of the State. It would be impossible to name all the women who devoted themselves to this work, and we should be ever held in grateful remembrance for what they accomplished here; but after the final history of the reformatory is written, the name that will stand as a synonym for all that is best in connection with prison reform among women will be the name of Ellen Cheney Johnson.

Ellen Cheney was born in New Hampshire about 1829. Her father was the chief friend and companion of his daughter. He taught her to ride horseback till she was one of the most accomplished riders of the time, and she used to say that the most beautiful views she had ever had in New England were from the back of a horse. She learned much about flowers and plants, gardening and farming knowledge that was to form part of her preparation for her life work, though at the time she did not dream of it.

After her marriage Ellen Cheney Johnson's home was in Boston. Both husband and wife were public spirited, hospitable and generous. Their house was always open for parlor meetings in behalf of reforms of different kinds. She was one of the first women appointed on the Prison Commission of the State and devoted much time to visiting the reformatory prison with which she had identified herself from the outset. Upon one occasion she took entire charge of it for some weeks, during an enency, so that she was entirely familiar with the administration before Governor Robinson asked her to become the Superintendent. This position she held for fifteen years, though she had accepted the trust for one year only. In her office were merged several offices, for she never employed a purchasing officer, though the law allowed one, nor a steward. She was herself superintendent, steward, purchasing agent and treasurer; and she introduced many original ways of reaching the minds and hearts of the women under her care. What other warden could dare to say to his prisoners, "It is a beautiful day and the sun shines gloriously on the pansy beds which are in full bloom. I wish you could all see them, for I think it would help to make you better to see how beautiful the world is. It would help you to try harder to obey all the rules so that you may the sooner have your freedom. Believing this and knowing that I can trust you to come in quietly, I am going to let you all go out and file past the pansy bed and then return to your rooms," and the wide hall door was opened, and the superintendent stood beside it, and every woman not in hospital or probation, or engaged in the domestic work that claimed her at that hour, filed out round the pansy bed, and back into the great building to her imprisonment. The highway was but a few rods away, and a fleet runner might easily have made a break for liberty and stamped the rest. There was not a guard, not a matron, to share the responsibility. Finding that it succeeded so well, this was repeated on different occasions, and always with perfect success.

Such experiments were made with the object of helping the women by changing their thoughts, giving them something to talk about during the scant minutes when conversation was allowed, and as rewards for good behavior. To the outside world Ellen Johnson seemed a self-confident woman, perhaps. To those who knew her best she was modest and retiring. She had too little rather than too much confidence in herself. Her whole life was bound up in her prison work. But it was her firm intention to resign soon.

In the summer of 1899 she went to London to read a paper on "Women in Prison" before the Woman's Congress. The paper was admirable, well read, and was received with enthusiasm. On the following morning she was suddenly stricken with great pain in her chest, and before a physician could reach her she had passed swiftly away, just as she had hoped that she might be taken.—Isabel C. Andrews, in New England Magazine.

A visit paid to the Sherborn Reformatory with an aged minister, in the time of Ellen C. Johnson's administration, is well remembered. Her answer to our request was, "Well, if you are Friends of the old fashioned kind, you may have a religious meeting with the assembled household; but if you represent the kind I heard in Quarterly Meeting to-day, the way is not open for your service." At the meeting she said: "I was over-anxious in prospect of a Quaker silence in the meeting, which the women were not used to. For if one had turned her head, or shown any business, she would have lost marks. I could not bear to think of one of them becoming degraded in rank, though attending a Friend's meeting. But the solemnity and dignity of the meeting seemed so to cover their spirits, that not a mark had to be given; and I never was more satisfied in my life to confide in the Divine power, where I was left in control."

She learned through another informant, that to a most remarkable woman who had been brought in, who would not in any manner of treatment or means of discipline, one day after much prayer said: "I am about to set up on our grounds a large poultry establishment, and I want a thoroughly competent woman to superintend this poultry department. "Would you like to undertake it?" The woman promptly said "yes!" and went to work in her new duties with the greatest faithfulness and interest, and seemed to be a new woman. Ellen Johnson had no more devoted and trustworthy friend throughout this prisoner's term, and when the five years had expired, such was the woman's regret to leave that she was allowed to stay several months longer.

A volume could be filled with remarkable anecdotes of Ellen C. Johnson's administration.—EDITOR.]

Development Through Struggle.

I kept for nearly a year the flask-shaped cocoon of an emperor moth. It is very peculiar in its construction. A narrow opening is left in the neck of the flask, through which the perfect insect forces its way; so that a forsaken cocoon is as entire as one still tenanted, no rupture of the interlacing fibres having taken place.

The great disproportion between the means of egress and the proportion of the prisoned insect makes one wonder how the exit is ever accomplished at all, and it never is without great labor and difficulty. It is supposed that the pressure to which the moth's body is subjected in passing through the narrow opening is a provision of nature for forcing the juices into the vessels of the wings, these being less developed at the period of emergence from the chrysalis than they are in other insects.

I happened to witness the first effort of my imprisoned moth to escape from its long confinement. Nearly a whole forenoon from time to time, I watched it patiently, striving and struggling to get out. It never seemed able to get beyond a certain point, and at last my patience was exhausted. I thought I was wiser and more compassionate than its Maker, and resolved to give it a helping hand.

With the points of my scissors I snipped the confining threads to make the exit just a very little easier, and lo! immediately, and with perfect ease, out crawled my moth, dragging a swollen body and little shriveled wings. In vain I watched to see that marvelous progress of expansion in which the wings swiftly and silently develop before our eyes; and as I traced the exquisite spots and working of divers colors, which were all there in miniature, I longed to see these assume their due proportions, and the creature appear in all its perfect beauty, as in truth it is one of the loveliest of its kind.

But I looked in vain; my false tenderness had proved its ruin. It never was anything but a stunted abortion, crawling painfully through that brief life which it should have spent flying through the air on rainbow wings.

The lesson I got that day has often stood me in good stead. It has helped me to understand what the Germans call "the hardness of God's love." I have thought of it often when watching with pitiful eyes those who were struggling with sorrows, suffering or distress, and it has seemed to me that I was more merciful than God, and I would fain have cut short the discipline, and given deliverance. Short-sighted fool!—how know I that one of those pains and profections could be spared? The far-sighted, perfect love of God, which seeks the perfection of its object, does not weakly shrink from present transient suffering. Our Father's love is too true to be weak. Because He loves his children he chastens them, that they may be "partakers of his holiness." With this glorious end in view, He spares not for their crying. "Made perfect through suffering," as Christ was, the sons of God are trained up to obedience, and brought to glory "through much tribulation."—Written by one laid for years on a couch of suffering.

Clara Barton in the Relief Work in Galveston.

Out of the wreck and ruin of Galveston a woman has arisen as the central figure in the work of relief. Into the hands of Clara Barton, President of the American National Red Cross, the Mayor and Citizens' Relief Committee of Galveston have given the distribution of all supplies arriving there for the survivors of the hurricane.

With the first confirmation of the news of disaster, Clara Barton summoned a dozen experienced relief workers and hastened to Galveston, where she quickly established Red Cross headquarters and began her ministrations of mercy among the destitute, the sick and the suffering.

Like a company of well drilled soldiers, the Red Cross staff fell to work, orderly, systematic, practical. Business men watched curiously, for a woman was in command. In less than a week leading citizens of Galveston said to one another: "This woman knows more about this sort of thing than we all. Let us give the entire work into her hands." It was done; and to-day Clara Barton, known to her closest friends as "Our Lady of the Red Cross," is directing the relief distribution in Galveston.

In this prompt recognition of her skill, experience and executive ability, the Mayor and Citizen's Relief Committee of Galveston have followed the precedent set by the business men of Charleston and other places where tidal waves, floods and various calamities have made necessary Red Cross relief during the past nineteen years.

Clara Barton thus describes her work in Galveston:—

"We are feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and caring for the sick. We cannot restore the dead; but the living can have their homes restored to them in some small measure at least. They cannot continue long in temporary quarters which they have found in the few remaining dwellings and business buildings; in the tents that are being erected, or under improvised shelter from the wreckage of their former beautiful homes. They have nothing left. The temperature has been warm and the weather fair since the hurricane, but rain and inclement temperature are likely to come at any time. Money should be immediately forthcoming with which to build temporary dwellings.

"The number of homeless, and, in many instances, utterly destitute persons, is very great. It is impossible to make an accurate estimate as yet; but it is likely that there are from six to eight thousand homeless persons in the city of Galveston to-day, many of whom have lost not only their homes and all of their worldly possessions, but have lost their employment as well. The destitute throng our warehouse from morning until night.

"The indescribable anguish of thousands of persons who have lost members of their families and their dearest friends is a suffering which cannot be removed even by generous contributions, but may be made lighter by partly restoring their lost property.

"Among the homeless sufferers of the hurricane are many orphaned and destitute children. For those waifs of the storm we have fitted up a temporary asylum on the upper floors of our large warehouse. For the care of these orphans money is urgently needed. I hope that the generous-hearted people of the United States will contribute promptly to their support."

Contributions for this work should be sent to the Red Cross Texas Relief Fund, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Narrations from Memory.

BY JAMES KITE.

I. JUDGE NOT.

A group of idlers were standing in the public square of the city of Warsaw, near the statue of the Polish hero, John Sobieski, at the foot of which divers women had stationed themselves for the purpose of supplying refreshments for passers-by. When an elderly man, dressed in coarse garments, stopped at one of the stalls and purchasing two loaves of bread put one in his pocket and went down the street eating the other, the company gazed after him until they saw him enter the imperial palace. "Do you know who that man is?" said a bystander to his companion. "I do not, but judging from his dress and mournful countenance I should suppose him to be an undertaker." "Wrong, my friend; that is Stanislaus Stazzic." "What! can it be possible that a man appearing like this can be rich and powerful?" "It is even so; under that unpromising exterior is concealed one of the most penetrating minds as well as one of the greatest geniuses of Poland." "Times have changed," said an old man whose gray hair and beard recalled the days of Sigismund. "Times are changed. It used to be that when a Palatine traversed the capitol it was in a coach and six, preceded by out-riders to clear the way. What respect can possibly be felt for a minister who has not the heart to afford himself a carriage, but dresses like a mechanic and eats a piece of bread in the streets just as a beggar would do?" Among the listeners was a young man whom Stazzic had placed and maintained in the university. Grieved to hear one who had ever been to him the kindest and truest friend spoken slightly of, he could not forbear pleading in his behalf. "What does it matter to us how he dresses or what he eats so long as he makes a noble use of his fortune?" "And what use does he make of it, pray?" said a priest with a supercilious air. "The academy of sciences needed a building to contain their collections. Did not Stazzic bestow a magnificent palace upon them?" "Yes; because he is as covetous of praise as he is of money." "Poland considers it as among her crowning glories that the discoverer of the sidereal system was one of her children. Who was it that raised a noble monument to his memory and called the chisel of Canova to perpetuate the fame of Copernicus?" "Yes, it was Stazzic, and for this all Poland honors the illustrious senator; but, my dear friend, it is not by a few splendid actions that a man should be judged; it is the whole course of his life which should witness for him. This man in the books he has written deplores the sad fates of the peasantry, while at the same time on his great estates five hundred miserable serfs toil daily. Ought not this pompous giver of palaces and builder of monuments to regard the welfare of his own serfs, especially when he professes to be so concerned for those controlled by others? Besides it is in the privacy of domestic life that one's true character is shown. Go some day to his house and there you may see a proud, stern man refusing a poor woman who appeals in vain for aid." The young man would have spoken further on behalf of his friend, but no one would listen to him. Every one had something to relate concerning the minister's parsimony. "He sits on the floor to keep from wearing out his chairs," chimed in a saucy-looking lad, and all joined in a mocking laugh. The young man turned away distressed, for the last remark of the priest had made some impression. He would watch and see if it could be true, and at night having access to his benefactor's home he beheld with his own eyes such a scene as had been depicted. His resolution was at once taken. It was Stazzic who maintained him at the university. Now he would no longer receive the bounty of one who could look unmoved on the tears of his own sister. With a heavy heart he made his way to the palace. The powerful premier seeing his favorite pupil enter did not desist from writing, but as he stood silent at length spoke: "Well, Adolph, what can I do for you to-day? If you want books take them out of my library, or instruments order them and send me the bill. Speak freely, and tell me if I can assist you in any way." "On the contrary, I have come to thank you for what you have already done, and to say that henceforth I must decline receiving your help." "You have become rich, then?" "I am as poor as ever." "And the college?" "I must leave it." "Impossible!" starting up. "You are our most promising pupil; it must not be. Tell me what this means." "Ah, sire, you wish to heap favors upon me at the expense of your suffering family." The eyes of the powerful minister filled with tears, and he grasped the youth's hand warmly as he said: "My dear boy, always take heed to this injunction, 'Judge nothing before the time;' ere the close of life the purest virtue may be soiled by vice or the blackest calumny prove to be unfounded. I cannot now explain my conduct. It is the secret of my life." Seeing he still hesitates he added: "Keep an account of the money I give you, and some day when through study and labor you are rich, repay the debt by educating some poor and deserving young man; and as for me, wait for my death before you judge my life."

Of humble extraction, Stazzic owed all his advancement to his own unaided exertions, but when did ever genius raise itself to its true bent without mediocrity revenging itself by calumny? For 30 years did Stazzic allow himself to be misrepresented and his motives called in question. He knew that the time would come when all Poland would do him honor, and he was content to wait. On—a date I cannot remember—30,000 mourning Poles flocked around and sought to touch, as if it was some precious and holy relic, the bier on which the mortal remains of Stanislaus Stazzic lay; even the Russian soldiery wondered the interest manifested. His will had explained all his purpose and aim in life.

Writing from memory I cannot enumerate all his benefactions to the poor of Warsaw only this I recall, his great estate was divided in five hundred farms, each the property of a free peasant, his former serf, subject to a light rental designed to go toward purchasing the freedom of others. As for his sister, she inherited merely the same sum he had given her yearly through life, for she was a person of vain mind who lavished her means on personal adornments.

(To be Continued.)

Christianity and Childhood.

Not till Christianity had begun to affect with beneficent force the Roman Empire, touched with subtle, invisible energy even those who were quite unconscious of the fact—as the currents of the Gulf-stream clothe with heat the very rocks which repulse them, in the Hebrides, or within the Norwegian fiords—till then did affection for children find expression in literature, and care for children become the custom of the great. Then Trajan tempted to give an unpurchased freedom to the children of free parents, deserted, but preserved. He even established a fund for the maintenance of poor girls and boys, and they were portrayed on coins and monuments raising from the ground women kneeling with their children. Pliny, with no doubt other citizens of generous opulence, followed at a distance the example. Hadrian increased moderately the bounties for this purpose. Antoninus Pius augmented them still further; and Marcus Aurelius put such endowments under the charge of consular officers, and set apart fresh funds for the purpose—while he wrote to his friend the teacher Fronto of his happiness in the hearing of his little girls, and Fronto in turn sent kisses to "their fat little toes and tiny hands" and recalls the merry sound of their prattle. Aurelius appointed a prætor to watch closely over orphans, and required a registration of births. A bas-relief at Rome is believed to show the puellæ Faustianæ cluster around the figure of the Empress, from which the name had been derived.

There was not improbably a new tendency shown here, as Renan insists, springing directly from Christianity, but by a reaction from the shocking and savage preceding cruelties. I think such a tendency does appear having source in part in the Stoical ethics, preparing the way for the gospel to tread opening men's hearts, in a measure at least its superlative lessons and force. But it seems to me almost as indisputable as is the independence of the city around us to commerce its growth, that to the new Christian atmosphere, ever more widely although imperceptibly diffused through the empire, even such partial and imperfect recognitions of the rights of childhood must be fairly in some part ascribed. The Hebrew faith, preceding Christianity and supplying the base on which its spires and pinnacles arose, had at least involved a widely different view of childhood from that which prevailed outside of Palestine. It had given great authority to the father, but it had imposed also strict obligations; while to ther had been trusted an authority which nowhere else had equally possessed. While anticidism was common and was justified elsewhere, it was no more permitted among the Jews than was the murder of the High Priest. The large number of children in a household was regarded as a token of Divine favor. Mothers nursed their own children, and the time of the weaning was signalized in the family. The instruction of children in the history of the nation, and in the precepts and principles of the law, was early, solemnly, and repeatedly prescribed. The whole community guarded the infant child; and the independent will of the mother was not supreme, under the restraining patriarchal legislation. If he judged his son even worthy of death, as stubborn and rebellious, intemperate and a drunkard, the mother must die with him, and together they must bring their bodies before the whole city, for lawful punishment. The prosperity of the city was then only conceived as perfect, when, with old men and old women dwelling in it, it should be "full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof." The hope and prayer of the father was, that "their sons might be as plants grown up in their youth, and their fathers as corner-stones, polished after the similitude of a palace."

It was only natural, under such a religion, that children should be accounted the heritage of the Lord; that for them, at different stages of their growth, the language should furnish only general names, of a tender significance; that they should be presented with thank-offerings in the temple; that it should be afforded even the son of the concubine that he had "heard the voice of the lad;" that some of the most touching and memorable passages in the Hebrew literature should be devoted to recounting the grief of parents when their infant of days had died; and that the noblest and grandest thought, one may almost say, which prophecy itself ever delivered, that which came from the sublimest of the new seers, that the fierce and warring elements on earth should be subdued in the name of the Messiah, that the wolf and the lamb should dwell together, and the leopard with the kid, and that "a little child shall lead them." That word is like the point of light in the eye of a portrait, illuminating the scheme of the prophetic economy.

Even the preparatory Hebrew system is thus only distinguished from the State regulations and the social economies prevailing around it. But Christianity surpassed it, here at least, in the light of the sun the pale lustre of the moonbeams. Transcendent in its doctrine, robust in its law, robust and masculine in its developments, never sentimental and never effeminate, it yet came to the docile obedience of childhood as a priest to consecrate, as a king to enthrone it. It made at any intervals spaces of quietness amid the tumultuous motions of the world, in which infancy should be sheltered, and its mysterious glory felt. It was when they who believed in the Father not only saw in each human soul an appropriate object for his Divine mission, but looked back with venerating wonder to his own cradle—when they [understood] that angels had sung above his birth, and had proclaimed this the sign of the world's redemption—when they conceived that kings had come from out the dim and distant East, rich in gold, aromatic with spices, bringing to him on his mother's breast frankincense and treasure—it was then that the sense of the sacredness of Infancy took its secure possession of the world. For childhood, at least, the new age dawned when He whom men thought a celestial Person came, according to their apprehension, from the heavens to the earth, not in the fulness of power and supremacy, but amid the very humblest conditions which ever invest a human birth. As the light from the babe, in Correggio's Holy Night, illuminates all surrounding figures, so the light of that birth shed an unfading lustre on the minds of the disciples. To them it was only natural that afterward, in the perfect fulness of his energy and wisdom, the Lord should take children from the street in his arms, and lay his hands on them in supreme benediction; that He should say, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven;" that He should announce that their angels do always behold the face of Him before whom the seraphim bow; that He should declare, in words whose echo never ceases in the world, "Whoso shall receive one such little child in my name, receiveth me."

That was, for the world, the coronation of childhood; and from that time not only the cruel abandonment of it by parents had been made impossible, but the shelter of its weakness, the culture of its delicate but prophesying power, have been chief ends in all the societies into which the inspiration of Jesus has entered.

The same strong current of governing influence which thus was revealed breaking into history, has flowed on in it ever since, and it is not needful that I even remind you how richly it is manifest in the Christendom of to-day. The assiduous and affectionate training of children—it may not be always accomplished as it should be, but it certainly is honored as a primary duty, not of the household or church alone, but of the state. The protection of the child is as general and careful as of the adult; and no infant can suffer disastrous injury, by permission of the law, even though it be inflicted by the parent. The wrong is avenged, and the babe is protected. Not merely to the children of cultured households does such watchfulness extend, but to the destitute and the orphaned. Institutions of beneficence, for their shelter and nurture, such as had not been known in the world till the power of Christianity began to be felt are now common in the countries which Christianity has blessed; while the Church, inspired by the words and by the action of him whom it accepts as Master, regulates its worship, constructs its buildings, invests or applies new forms of art, creates a new literature, to minister to children. The ancient prophecy is fulfilled. The little child does lead the household, and lead the state. The deepest fountains of affection are unsealed with its advent in the household. The first faint cry, laden with the ever new mystery of life, seems a voice appealing from the eternities, as it breaks into time. And the subsequent solicitude of the state for its future citizen is not wholly from motives of expediency. The parental love in those who form and who govern the state inspires here its administration. The one consecrating spiritual function which secular commonwealths still retain, after severing themselves from every office of religious instruction—that which more than all else gives them moral elevation, and a charm for the heart—is this of securing to all children within them the instruction of knowledge, and a quick communication with the best and largest thought of the world.

If no other change had followed the coming of the religion of Jesus, this change in the attitude of civilized society, with its multiplied instruments, its vaster enterprises, its prouder hopes, and its bolder ambitions, toward the weakness of childhood, is surely one to impress and delight us. It seems to me to repeat the example of the Master himself, and to bring the Christendom which now honors, blesses and consecrates that childhood, nearer to Him than all cathedrals ever builded.—R. S. Storrs—Divine Origin of Christianity.

THE Congregationalist says: "Marked changes in the direction of popular religious interest are evident. Nice theological distinctions receive little attention. The transformation of individual character, the purifying of society and the christianizing of nations are the objects most earnestly sought."

THE Pacific says: "Force resides in the spiritual realm. An unspiritual church is a powerless church; no matter what its material equipment or its social environment. It simply cannot do the work it was appointed to do."

Notes from Others.

The new pulpit in the new era will, like the kingdom of God, be not in word, but in power. The disciples were to be endued with power from on high, a power which becomes life and spirit, and then clothes itself in words.

Shall the lament at the close of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth century be repeated? "Beloved friend, where is the refuge of peace, of freedom? The century ended in murder, and the new one opened with murder."

What wonder if the pulpit loses its power if we so use or abuse it that men have come to think of it, not as the sacred place from which one authorized to speak for God gives the message of God, but where men exhibit their learning or eloquence, ventilate their theories of philosophy or criticism, and express their own opinions on the questions of the day. When the pulpit speaks God's word it will have the Divine power promised of God; when it speaks man's word it must suffer from man's weakness.—William Paret, in the Church Standard.

In Zion's Herald, C. H. Parkhurst of New York thus criticises Archdeacon Farrar's article in the North American Review, justifying war and pretending that Jesus did not condemn it:

"It is a cruel indictment, next to blasphemy, to affirm that Jesus in any way, by any act or expression of spirit or purpose, approved of war. In trying to justify war by the Scriptures, Canon Farrar is wholly wrong and dangerously misleading. The lust for colonial acquisition and martial glory for the Briton has blinded him and made him a blind guide."

It is related of a minister of great ability and of great modesty that, having received the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity, he was congratulated by a friend upon the honorable distinction he had received. He replied he presumed he was thus honored on the principle laid down by the apostle: "Those members of the body which we think to be less honorable, upon these we bestow more abundant honor." This is very suggestive to all who have received the degree, and as well to those who have not.—Herald and Presbyter.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The report of the Census Bureau states, there are in the United States three cities with a population in excess of 1,000,000. These are Greater New York, Chicago and Philadelphia. Eleven cities have reached the 100,000 class since 1890, and there are at present thirty-nine cities, with 100,000 inhabitants and more. As examples of wonderful growth, St. Joseph and Los Angeles may be accepted. Each of them have doubled their population within ten years. In 1880 Spokane had only 350 inhabitants: In twenty years it has grown to be a city of nearly 37,000.

GAINS IN TEN YEARS.

The following is a complete list of State capitals in the Union having a population of 25,000 and upward by the present census, with an additional column showing their population in 1890, and a third one their aggregate gain in the ten years:

State Capital.	1900.	1890.	Gain.
Boston, Mass.....	560,892	448,477	112,415
Providence.....	175,597	132,146	43,451
Indianapolis.....	169,164	105,436	63,728
St. Paul.....	163,632	133,896	29,736
Denver.....	133,859	106,713	27,146
Columbus.....	125,560	88,150	37,410
Albany.....	94,151	94,923	*772
Atlanta.....	89,872	65,533	24,339
Richmond.....	85,050	81,388	3,662
Nashville.....	80,865	76,168	4,697
Hartford.....	79,850	53,230	26,620
Trenton.....	73,307	57,458	15,849
Des Moines.....	62,139	50,093	12,046
Salt Lake City.....	53,531	44,843	8,688
Harrisburg.....	50,157	39,385	10,782
Lincoln.....	40,169	55,154	*14,985
Little Rock.....	38,307	25,874	12,433
Springfield, Ill.....	34,154	24,936	9,218
Topeka.....	33,608	31,007	2,601
Montgomery.....	30,846	21,833	8,513
Sacramento.....	29,282	26,386	2,896

* Decrease.

The "East Side" of New York has generally been considered the most congested centre of population on the face of the earth. The new census, however, reveals that another spot further up-town is entitled to this unenviable reputation, says the New York Journal. The most populous block now in New York runs from Tenth to Eleventh Avenues and from West Sixty-first to West Sixty-second Street. By actual count 6,888 people live in that one city block. This is more than the entire population of many good sized towns.

The North German Lloyd steamer Bremen, which was almost destroyed by fire in Hoboken in Sixth Month last, is bound for this port to load 5,000 tons of bituminous coal for Dantzic, Germany, where she will be refitted for passenger and freight service.

The monthly statement issued by the director of the Mint, shows that during Ninth Month the coinage executed at the Mints of the United States amounted to $6,440,938—gold, $2,293,335; silver, $3,932,185; minor coins, $215,418.

At the annual meeting of the Peabody Education Fund recently held in New York, interesting statistics of the educational development of the work in many of the southern states were presented. In Arkansas the conditions are improved. In Louisiana there would be no normal and industrial school for negroes but for the Peabody fund. In Mississippi there was less being done than could be desired. In North Carolina education was considered a secondary matter to party success. South Carolina conditions are more favorable, but in Georgia the outlook is gloomy. The report from Texas is favorable. Alabama reports that the State is under lasting obligations to this fund. West Virginia reports favorably of the good work of the Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute. The yearly income of the fund amounting to $84,055.61 in accordance with the conditions under which the bequest was made, has been distributed among educational institutions in the southern and southwestern States.

The present attitude of some of the Governments in reference to the troubles in China, gives hope for diplomatic negotiations. The United States, in the note delivered on the 4th inst., accepts, practically without modification or conditions, the line of action proposed by Germany,

This embraces the following programme: The Powers will at once arrange to proceed to negotiations for peace without reference to the punishment of those who are guilty. The foreign Ministers in Peking are to unite in a careful statement in the nature of an arraignment showing who the guilty men are and whether they are the identical persons named by the imperial edict as deserving degradation and punishment. The ministers will also decide whether the penalties to be imposed by the Chinese Government are such as justly fit the crimes for which they are indicted. Assuming that this agreement among the Powers will be acted upon without delay, instructions were telegraphed to Minister Conger by the Secretary of State directing him to make a thorough investigation and report whether the officials named by the Emperor Kwang-Su are guilty of the crimes imputed to them and should be selected for punishment, either for their individual acts or for complicity of any sort in the attacks on the foreigners. It is assumed by this Government that there will be no opposition to the course of action indicated, and that Austria and Italy, whose assent was given to Germany's first proposition, will acquiesce in the amended policy with regard to the punishment of the Chinese officials.

In reference to the strike in the anthracite coal district, a despatch from Hazleton says: "The end of the strike is not far distant. It is certain that President Mitchell and the National Executive Board of Mine Workers will not hold out against such general concessions as were announced to-day by independent operators. From remarks let fall to-night by a member of the Board the offering of such terms by both the company and individual operators will justify the calling of the miners' convention.

It is estimated that the damage to cotton, caused by the recent floods and high water in Texas, will reach 400,000 bales, worth at least $20,000,000. The receipts of Klondike gold at the San Francisco Mint, and Seattle Assay Office, from Seventh Month 1st to Ninth Month 30th aggregated $16,047,555, and of Cape Nome gold $2,311,801. The total of all deposits at both offices, during the three months was $33,234,816.

A New York syndicate, headed by H. S. Hinkle, has purchased 2,000 acres of coal land in the southeastern part of Indiana county, on the line of a proposed railroad, for $30 an acre. Three English coal operators have purchased 50,000 acres of coal land in Greene County, Pa., and Wetzel County, W. Va., at a figure close to $45 an acre. One of the agents who handled the deal, said: "They propose to haul the fuel to tidewater and then ship it abroad. The same operators are negotiating for 13,000 additional acres in the same locality."

There were 334 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 13 less than the previous week and 94 less than the corresponding week of 1899. The new cases of diphtheria, scarlet fever and typhoid fever and the deaths caused thereby for the past two weeks were as follows:

	Ninth Mo. 29th.	Deaths.	Tenth Mo. 6th.	Deaths.
Diphtheria . . .	77	10	97	14
Scarlet fever . .	29	1	30	0
Typhoid fever . .	70	7	99	6

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, new, 104 to 104½; 3's, reg., 109 to 109¾; 4's, reg., 114¾ to 115¼; new 4's, reg., 134 to 135; new 5's, 113 to 114.

COTTON.—Market quiet, closing on a basis of 11c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.75 to $3.00; Pennsylvania roller, clear, $3.20 to $3.40; do., straight, $3.40 to $3.60; Western winter, $3.60 to $3.75; spring, straight, $3.75 to $4.00; city mills, patent, $4.00 to $4.60. RYE FLOUR, $3.10 per barrel.

GRAIN—No. 2 red wheat, 76½ to 76¾c.
No. 3 red wheat, 73½ to 73¾c.
No. 2 yellow corn, 48c.
No. 2 mixed, 46½ to 46¾c.
No. 2 white oats, 28¾c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5¾ to 5½c; good, 5¼ to 5½; medium, 4¼ to 5c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4¼ to 4½; good, 4¾ to 4c.; common, 1½ to 2½. Spring lambs, 3½ to 6c.

FOREIGN.—The British Government has followed in the footsteps of the United States in the Chinese negotiations. It has authorized Sir Claude MacDonald, the British Minister at Peking, to enter into relations with the Chinese officials, just as the United States Government did in the case of minister Conger. It has left to its Minister discretionary power to pass upon the sufficiency of the credentials of Li Hung Chang, Prince Ching and the other Chinese envoys. The Government has been informed that Sir Claude MacDonald will be instructed to make the same inquiries relative to the punishment of the Chinese ringleaders that have been committed to minister Conger.

The first practical outcome of special commission Rockhill's investigation has been an instruction to him by the State Department to co-operate with Minister Conger in the inquiries with which that official is now charged relative to the character of the Chinese envoys and punishments.

The British Parliamentary elections were continued on the 8th. It is believed the ministerial majority in the new Parliament will be about 150.

The Standard has the following from Tien-Tsin dated on the 5th: "A German force came into collision with 8,000 Chinese, described as 'Boxers,' a few miles south Tien-Tsin this morning. The Germans were checked and compelled to retire on Tien-Tsin. There is reason to believe that the Chinese in this case were not 'Boxer' but were Li Hung Chang's veterans, who had been ordered to wait near here in view of the possibility that the foreigners would bar his progress to the capital."

The Shanghai correspondent of the Morning Post in despatch dated yesterday says: "All the foreign troops here are held in readiness against a possible attack of 8,000 Chinese troops now advancing along the Grand Canal."

The British Consul at Smyrna recently made the following report to his Government. During the past decade, the preponderance of Manchester in the cotton exports of Smyrna has been substantially shaken. In cloth, American competition, which supplies more durable goods, has supplanted the English manufactures. Shirtings the Americans have also acquired the greater part of the market. America is likewise supplying principally the people of the Levant regarding with high favor its goods from that country.

RECEIPTS.

Unless otherwise specified, two dollars have been received from each person, paying for vol. 70.

Mary Hasket, O.; Wm. H. Pennell, Pa., to No. George Rhoads, Pa.; Anna H. Tierney, Gtn., and Bertha H. T. Ufford, Mass. to No. 27, vol. 75; Jose E. Maule, Phila.; Sarah R. Harmer, Pa.; M. M. Child; Samuel L. Whitson, Phila.; Thos. H. Wilson for Joseph Bringhurst, M. D., Pa.; Lydia Moorman, Iowa; Watson W. Dewees, Pa.; Lewis H. for Thos. Dewees, O., to No. 14, vol. 75; George Blackburn, agent, for Catharine Fawcett, O., to No. 14, vol. 75; Mary T. Evans, Del.

Remittances received after Third-day noon will appear in the Receipts until the following week.

NOTICES.

A FRIEND wishes a position as housekeeper or companion or near the city. Address "R," office of THE FRIEND.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—A stated meeting of the General Committee will be held in Philadelphia Sixth-day, the 19th inst., at 10.30 A. M.

WM. B. HARVEY, Cleric

WANTED.—A young Friend, having a thorough knowledge of electrical engineering, desires a position with a Friend. Address "V," office of THE FRIEND.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of sons coming to Westtown School, the stage will run trains leaving Philadelphia 7.17 and 8.19 A. M., and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when requested. Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., twenty cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, Westtown Station or West Chester, Phone 85.

EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Sup

DIED, in Quincy, Ill., on the seventeenth of Seventh Month, 1900, HENRY WARRINGTON, son of the late H. and Margaret Comfort Warrington of Westfield, N. J. His forty-fourth year, a member of the Northern District Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

—, in New Garden, Chester Co., Pa., on the twelfth of Sixth Month, 1900, ELIZA LARKIN, daughter of R. Henry and Rebecca J. Thomas, a member of New Garden Monthly Meeting. She bore a long suffering illness with much patience, and during this time she was evily under the preparing hand of her heavenly Father pressing a poverty of spirit; but as the end drew near her faith became firm that a mansion was prepared for her, and before the close expressed herself as seeing angels about her. She desired her dear ones not to be so fully and quietly and we reverently believe that through her adorable mercy she has been permitted to enter those blessed mansions she believed was prepared for

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TENTH MONTH 20, 1900.

No. 14.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,
No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,
PHILADELPHIA.

South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth.)

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

Isolated Meetings.

There are closed meeting houses in neighborhoods where a remnant of membership still lives, in which we believe the meetings might not only be kept up, but also grow, if but a single worshipper would persevere, at every appointed hour, to sit in the house, and faithfully wait on the Lord and love his appearing. Though the faithfulness of one, meetings are thus revived and been regathered, and would do so again, especially in localities where few of where sufficient number of members remain to gather in to a meeting, but there are also numbers of reasonable excuses which seem allowed to overmatch the more reasonable service. What if one meets with the minister alone,—is it not a privilege? Why, then, do you try to explain thy non-attendance by another who does not meet with thee, or perhaps another who would? The grace of worship is not in meeting with people, but in meeting with the Shepherd and Bishop of souls. But it is precious and helpful, as we are members one of another, to meet Him with only two or three who are gathered in his name. Yet if they be absent, the public testimony singly borne for a meeting that is in spirit and in truth is a divine service that will not go on without his blessing upon us and others.

Sometimes committees are suggested for occasional encouragement or revival of all or isolated meetings. These have their proper place in their seasons. The Head of the Church sometimes details this messenger or minister to visit them. And these who heed their calling become a committee authorized the Lord. But these committees are by no means a substitute for the permanent committee already placed in each locality for the life and prosperity of its meeting. By the providence of birth and of other means of being held together in a neighborhood, one is designated to cooperate with the Master of assemblies in the presence of his brother's keeper and his meeting's keeper in that very locality to which he or she is committed for service. A committee for each meeting is already appointed, and its home members are that committee. Let them also consent to be anointed.

JUSTICE AND PEACE.—While all candidates for the presidency who accept the principle of War, must in that respect be ranked in the same category, we are compelled in justice to recognize a difference, in that it has been brought to our knowledge, since an exhibit of the natural war-spirit towards Friends appeared in our columns week before last—that a discrimination in degree, if not in kind, should be made regarding the attitude of some of them. In the case of one who strongly commends the arbitration of differences, and of his colleagues, who is said to have delivered a discourse specifically against war, due credit must be accorded. So that our apprehension that all who stand on the war principle somewhere, could in substance have written the extract quoted, seems too sweeping. Though any, however, be just over on that side of the line, we wished to indicate that it is a side which represents that source in the heart of man which breathes forth, in divers manners, the spirit and substance of that language.

And are all we as peace-professors clear in which of the two kingdoms we are standing? Inasmuch as some have undertaken to denounce that extract, we would warn any that fulminations, tirades or personalities against it when spoken or written in the same spirit, serve only to irritate and spur on the spirit which could write it, and to convince the writer that it is justified, and to make the oppression of Friends, as possibly martyrs for a principle, harder in some coming day of trial.

Carnal warfare for peace is carnal still, whether conducted with sword or pen, with tongue or spirit of the natural man. Ardent spirits quench no fire, nor is evil overcome by anything but good, nor the spirit of war met successfully by aught lower than "the Peace of God which passeth understanding," and "shall keep our minds and hearts by Jesus Christ."

Grief banished by wine will come again,
And come with a deeper shade,
Leaving perchance on the soul a stain
That sorrow hath never made.
Then fill not the tempting glass for me,
If mournful I will not be mad;
Better sad because we are sinful,
Than sinful because we are sad.

—H. a' Becket.

For "THE FRIEND."

Ohio Yearly Meeting.

The meeting of ministers and elders convened in the meeting house at Stillwater, near Barnesville, Belmont County, Ohio, on Sixth-day, 28th ult. Minutes of ministers in attendance viz.: Benjamin Vail, of Philadelphia; Elwood Carter, of Plainfield, Indiana; Debbie E. Cope, of West Chester, Pa., were read, and also one of Mary Ann C. Scattergood, of West Chester, companion to the latter. Several Friends from a distance without minutes were present. This meeting was owned with a precious feeling of solemnity, under which several weighty testimonies were borne. The fact that the qualifications for both ministry and eldership proceeded from the same source, viz.: the immediate revelation of Christ in accordance with his declaration that upon this he would build his church was pointed out, and the blessed unity and harmony of exercise which flowed from this among his dependent children.

A concern also spread over the meeting for the welfare of the children and rising generation, that they might be helped both by the example and silent exercise of the parents on their behalf, and the belief that the injunction to one formerly "Take this child and nurse it for me, and I will give thee thy wages" would thus be fulfilled, and successors from among such raised up who would be as judges and counsellors in the church.

Seventh-day, Ninth Month 29th. The Yearly Meeting was opened with Nathan R. Smith and James Walton acting as clerks. Epistles were read from each of the five Yearly Meetings with which Ohio Yearly Meeting corresponds. These each contained evidences that they were penned under an earnest concern for the strengthening of each other in the Truth, and expressions in some of them met a cordial response in the hearts of those to whom they were addressed. A committee was named to prepare replies.

In the report sent up from Hickory Grove Quarterly Meeting the attention of the Yearly Meeting was called to its anomalous situation as a Quarterly Meeting located within the limits of Iowa Yearly Meeting with which Ohio Yearly Meeting is in correspondence. After consideration a committee was appointed in which each Monthly Meeting was represented by two or more of its members, excepting those belonging to the Quarterly Meeting sending up the subject for consideration.

This committee submitted to a subsequent session an address directed to the members of Hickory Grove Quarterly Meeting, which was adopted with great unanimity by the Yearly Meeting—and the clerk was authorized to have it printed in the Extracts from the Minutes of the Yearly Meeting. In numbers it is understood that Hickory Grove Quarterly Meeting is probably somewhat larger than Iowa Yearly Meeting, to which it has been proposed to attach it.

The meetings on First-day were seasons of Divine favor, in which many testimonies were borne to the precious truths of the Gospel of Christ, and the fundamental principle of the appearance of the grace of God which bringeth salvation, purchased for mankind by the offering of Christ, and its blessed effects when received and submitted to, were clearly enforced.

The attendance on each occasion was as large as the house could comfortably accommodate, and is estimated to have been from 1000 to 1200 persons. A large number of visitors, actuated apparently mainly by curiosity, assembled on the grounds during the day near the meeting-house, who could not have found seats in the house even if they desired it, and whose presence on such occasions has long been an annoyance which Friends of the Yearly Meeting have patiently borne.

This congregating of such numbers of people on the meeting-house grounds was brought to the notice of the Yearly Meeting on Third-day, and a large committee of men and women Friends was appointed to consider the subject, who subsequently made certain recommendations which were adopted.

Second-day, Tenth Month 1.—Nathan R. Smith and James Walton, who served the meeting last year as clerks, were reappointed. The reading of the Queries and Answers was proceeded with, in the course of which many observations were made tending to encourage those present to faithfulness and for the removal of these things which hindered a progress heavenward.

The reports from Quarterly Meetings on the education of the youth showed that there were 515 children of school age, a considerable portion of whom were sent, in the absence of schools under the care of Friends, to the public schools. This, though felt to be a cause of great weakness in various places, appears to be unavoidable. Two hundred and nineteen children included in the above number are members of Hickory Grove Quarterly Meeting.

The reports from the Quarterly Meetings showed that three Friends in the station of Elder had died during the year.

Third-day the report of the Book Committee showed that it had been engaged in circulating our approved writings in many neighborhoods, and an appropriation of $100 was made to continue its efforts.

The report of Boarding School Committee showed that about 56 scholars had attended the school during the winter and 17 during the summer session. A new frame building had been erected to accommodate the chemical laboratory, and for other purposes, without expense to the committee. The financial statement showed a small balance in favor of the school. The committee on primary schools had expended the greater part of last year's appropriation of $250, in assisting in the education of children unfavorably situated, and an appropriation of the same amount was made for its use during the year. The minutes of the Meetings for Sufferings showed that the subject of exempting the funds used for benevolent purposes had claimed its attention. A memorial of Abigail Vail, a minister deceased, a member of Pasadena (Cal.) Monthly Meeting, was read and directed to be printed with the Extracts from the Minutes of the Yearly Meeting.

Fourth-day the public meeting for worship was held in the morning, and an appointed meeting for the young and middle aged in the afternoon.

Fifth-day a minute was read embodying some of the exercises expressed in the meeting when the Queries and Answers were under consideration, which was directed to be sent down to subordinate meetings and members in the printed extracts.

Essays of replies to the Epistles received at a previous sitting from New England, Canada, Western, Iowa and Kansas Yearly Meetings were produced. The reading of these was attended with a tendering and cementing feeling, which increased until the meeting closed under a precious solemnity.

Did the Ark of Noah Contain a Pump?

An old shipbuilder sat on the beach, talking with a stranger. The excellencies of the Bible was the subject of conversation, and the old builder said that the proportions of the ark, length, depth and beam, lay at the foundation of all specimens of perfect naval architecture in sailing ships.

The stranger asked, Did the ark contain a pump?

"I think not," said the builder.

"Are not pumps an essential part of the outfit in every ship?"

"Yes."

"Then the ark was not a perfect ship."

"It is true that no ship is sent to sea without a proper outfit in pump gear, because of the liability to spring a leak, but the plans of that great ship did not include the possibility of sinking. The crew was too small to man the pumps had there been any. She was made to float and not to get damaged and so be lost.

And herein is a great lesson for thee and me. Men now-a-days build for speed, for commerce, for pleasure, for war. One thought, and one only, controlled the builders of the ark. Noah builded for the saving of his house. The point of the lesson is, the ark is a type of Salvation. "Come thou and all thy house into the ark." Come to Christ and be saved.

But ecclesiastics often cry the "church is in danger," and there is a great rattling of pump gear! Friends let us be calm! The real church is not in danger. Pumps form no part of her furniture. Men come on board to confide in the Captain of their salvation, whom they obey. "So he bringeth them unto their desired haven." * * * H. T. M.

FACE ABOUT.—It had been one of those days on which everything goes contrary, and I had come home tired and discouraged. As I sank into a chair, I groaned, "Everything looks dark, dark!" Why don't you turn your face to the light, auntie, dear?" said my little niece, who was standing, unperceived, beside me.

"Turn your face to the light!" The words set me to thinking. That was just what I had not been doing. I had persistently kept my face in the opposite direction, refusing to see the faintest glimmer of brightness. Artless little comforter! She did not know what healing she had brought.—Selected.

Virginian Friends and Slavery.

HOW A FRIEND WAS CONVINCED.

About the time Friends of Virginia Yearly Meeting thought proper to change their Discipline, requiring Friends to liberate their slaves, Clark Moorman, of Carolina County Virginia, was a young married man with three small children. He had commenced the world poor, and by industry had got hold of considerable means, which he laid out in the purchase of slaves for his growing family. His slaves were his principal property, and to liberate them would be depriving himself and family of nearly all he had; so he concluded not to do it, but to suffer himself to be disowned before he would liberate them.

After a time a committee was appointed by the Monthly Meeting to visit him, and, if possible, convince his mind of the evil and inconsistency of slavery as incompatible with the Christian religion. The committee visited him from time to time, I think for more than year, without effecting any change in his mind, he being determined to retain his slaves. He requested Friends to disown him, and not to trouble him any further on the subject. Friends at length made an unfavorable report to Cedar Monthly Meeting, of which he was member, stating that he was not in a disposition of mind to liberate his slaves. The Meeting being about to appoint a committee to prepare a minute of disownment, Catlett Jones, young minister, rose and observed he thought there might be some use in continuing the committee a month longer with some addition and pay him another visit, which was agreed to, and Catlett Jones was added to the number.

The information reached Clark Moorman he felt tried with it, and told his wife not to call him if Friends came while he was out, if he did not intend to see them. Some time passed before Friends visited him, but at length they went. He was out in the field. Friends took their seats and said nothing.

Dinner being ready he was called, and finding Friends there, "Well," says he to himself "Friends are come again to try me on the subject of slavery, and I am determined to give them as good as they send. I'll not let the slaves go; they are the hard earnings of my youth, and may as well be my support old age."

Friends met him pleasantly, inquiring after his health, etc. After dinner was over, Catlett Jones observed: "Well, Clark, we have come to pay thee a little visit, and wish to have a private opportunity with thee, if thou hast no objection." He replied he had not, so they all sat down together, as he said, with his mind braced against anything they might offer. They sat in silence about an hour; when Catlett Jones observed, "Well, I reckon thou had as well ride." They then said "Farewell," without saying one word on the subject of their visit, to his surprise and mortification.

After this Clark Moorman's mind was much taken up with the visit Friends had paid him, and after revolving it over concluded that they must surely have had a clear sense of the state of his mind, or they would have had something to say to him. He soon after became deeply exercised on the subject, and had a dream in which it clearly appeared to him that himself, with some Friends, were taken up to Heaven.

to the Pearl Gate, which was opened for their entrance by a little black boy; and while his Friends were entering he made several attempts to go in, but the little black boy always presented himself in the way, so that Friends entered, the gate was shut, and he was left on the outside. Just at that time he awoke, much distressed, and told his dream to his wife, and said, "If I live until morning I will go to the office and liberate every slave I have; I am determined I won't be kept out of Heaven by a little black boy."

Accordingly he rose early, went to the office and liberated all his slaves; and then to his friends, to tell them what he had done. He often said he never had any cause to repent the act, but believed it had been blessed to him and to his family through life.

[From a private letter to the late Benjamin Seebohm, written by the grandson of Clark Moorman, from memory, of the story as related by his grandfather.]—London Friend.

A Scientist's Convictions.

There is a light "that lighteth every man that cometh into the world," an inward voice that testifies to the conscience the truth of God, and his eternal power and Godhead. Against this voice men can close their hearts and resist its utterances, until they lose their power. But this does not prove that God has never spoken to them, nor that they have had no convictions of the truth.

Perhaps no one has more carefully traced out the evidences of design, contrivance and skill in nature, than the late Charles Darwin; and yet the facts he ascertained contradicted his theories which he held, and his convictions at times almost overpowered the fancies which he promulgated.

In a Glasgow lecture the Duke of Argyll said: "In the last year of his life Mr. Darwin did me the honor of calling upon me in London, and I had a long and interesting conversation with that distinguished observer of nature. In the course of conversation I said it was impossible to look at the wonderful processes of nature which he had observed, without seeing that they were the effect and the expression of mind. I shall never forget Mr. Darwin's answer. He looked at me hard, and said:

"Well, it often comes over me with overpowering force, but at other times (and he shook his head) it seems to go away."

"It seems to go away." Light rejected becomes darkness, and conviction resisted leaves the soul unconvinced and hardened in unbelief. If the light that is in you becomes darkness, how great is that darkness."—The Christian.

"COMMIT all unto the Lord; it is only for a little while till the seven sealed rolls of the mystery of God's providences will be explained to me. And so sure am I that to all eternity I shall praise and give thanks for each EVENT in life, that I have vowed to spend my span of time here in doing the same. Then I see so many who are in as bad a humor with the Lord as Jonah was when things did not go as he had understood the Lord they were to do. I feel like saying, 'Father, I want to be one of the new children in thy family who are not constantly finding fault with thee in their heart, charging thee with folly.'"—E. LEWIS.

For "THE FRIEND."

Personal Observations of the Doukhoborts in Canada.

BY JONATHAN E. RHOADS.

An interest in the Doukhoborts which was first aroused by hearing of their persecutions through an English Friend who had travelled in Russia, having continued with me during the time that the care of Friends has been extended to them, led me to look towards visiting them when a favorable time should present to discharge a religious concern for their spiritual welfare. This opportunity seemed to come in the early part of the summer just past. A minute of my Monthly Meeting granting liberty to engage in religious service among others, as well as among them, was procured; and my friend, Joseph S. Elkinton, whose experiences with them gave him many advantages as a representative of our Yearly Meeting, kindly agreed to accompany me.

Arrived in Canada we called on several officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway and of the Dominion government in Montreal and Ottawa, by whom we were treated with genuine kindness and furnished with such conveniences for our journey as greatly facilitated its prosecution.

The administration of the Canadian Government is more paternal, not to say charitable, in its care of immigrants seeking homes on its lands than is ours of the United States. Not only are free homesteads given them, but money is appropriated for their help where needed, and advice and protection are bestowed while making their settlements; and employment found as far as practicable for the able-bodied men, by which to win the means of subsistence until land can be brought under cultivation and a remunerative business established.

Frederick Leonhardt, who was born in Russia, but of German descent, is employed as a government interpreter. He is furnished with a pair of horses and spring-wagon in which to travel among the Doukhobor settlements to advise and assist them in business matters. He has a home in Yorkton, to which town the Doukhoborts are frequently coming to buy supplies and to sell their senega root. Frederick Leonhardt and his wife extend much kindness to them, and he aids them in dealing with the merchants.

William F. McCreary, Immigration Commissioner, gave us the use of the team and wagon with Frederick Leonhardt's assistance as interpreter and driver. Doukhobor teams were employed to carry our luggage and provisions from village to village, while Gregory, a Doukhobor boy, accompanied us in the trip through the Yorkton and Swan River colonies to assist in care of the horses, preparing meals, etc. A stock of oats for the horses was part of the outfit, while bread and butter, tea, coffee and sugar, canned fish, meat, fruits, vegetables and milk made a substantial variety for ourselves, the Doukhoborts often adding from their provisions eggs, fresh milk, pan cakes and butter. Wild strawberries were finely flavored, and the wild gooseberry stewed was refreshing.

Their bread is made of coarse flour and is dark in color, heavy and somewhat sour. They cut it in thick slices and place it beside one's plate at the table. Radishes and green onions were offered us early in the journey; fine new potatoes fried in butter came on the table before our travels ended.

The lands assigned to the Doukhoborts are parts of the great prairie country which extends from the borders of Texas far north into the British territories. Scattered over these are belts and clumps of timber, largely composed of a poplar, which serves a useful purpose for houses and fences, while its quality would compare unfavorably with our oak and chestnut. Tamarack grows in swamps, and is a solid and durable wood, but not abundant. Occasionally the plains are treeless as far as the eye can see. Their vast expanse is an impressive scene. The routes of travel over them on leaving a railroad are trails formed by the wheel-tracks of wagons which, if long used, become widened sufficiently to form good paths for a pair of horses; except that the badgers often choose to burrow in the compacted earth, and even an experienced horse will occasionally set his foot in the wide aperture. New trails, of which we found not a few between the villages, are rough by reason of gopher mounds and other inequalities which keep a vehicle rolling and pitching almost constantly.

The wagon journey began on the twenty-fifth of Sixth Month, one week after leaving home; the first stage being a ride of thirty miles from Yorkton to the village Terpenie, which name means "patience" or "suffering."

Frederick Leonhardt was accustomed to lodging in the houses when out on his trips, and we adopted the same plan, dispensing with a tent altogether. This brought us into close contact with our friends and gave better opportunities to observe their habits. On arriving at a village we would be quickly directed to a house, perhaps of the head man, or one more commodious than the average. If we had been travelling for some time, Frederick Leonhardt would ask for the indulgence of a nap, when fresh beds would be arranged for us. At other times we would enter at once on a house-to-house visitation, during which any sick or feeble persons would be discovered and some pecuniary aid given to procure for them comforts that the ordinary provision would not afford.

As we passed from one family to another the people were asked to assemble for a meeting, by which their attendance was generally secured. The gatherings in the day-time were often out of doors, and if the weather or time of day made it desirable to meet under a roof the window sash would be removed for ventilation. Smudge fires were much used to drive away mosquitoes from people and cattle. A small one smouldering near the door of a house prevented their invasion of the interior.

When a permanent site has been chosen for a village a wide avenue or green is laid out with building lots on each side of it; houses are built with gables to the street, and generally with the entrance facing south. Gardens around or near them are frequently fenced separately; the fence at times formed of upright posts or stakes interwoven with large twigs in wicker-work that look tasteful. One fine village of the South Colony was inclosed by a strong fence, which included spacious gardens, and abundant room for green, door-yards, houses and out-buildings. As much contrast in good management and thrift among the different communities is evident, as is noticed between individuals with us.

The houses in a given village may differ in size, but are similar in plan, with little exception. Seventeen feet by thirty feet may approximate the average inside measurement. Entering by a low door at the side of the house, an outer room of smaller capacity is used for storing flour and other goods, and generally contains a bed. Back of this there is frequently a kitchen having the brick stove or oven opening into it. The large living-room is between these two rooms and the street. The stove may be built in this, though its mouth should open in the kitchen. Berths for sleeping on extend from the side of the stove to the end of the room. Seats run along the end of the room and the other long side. These seats can be widened by placing benches alongside of them for additional beds when needed. A table two feet by three feet stands in front corner of room. Stools and occasionally a chair or two are added to the furniture. Copper cooking vessels have been brought from Russia, including the grand samovar or tea urn, which is to be met with here and there. Dwellings are built of logs and plastered with clay. Ridge poles supported by posts bear the higher ends of closely placed rafters, over which is spread coarse brush, and the whole topped with sods. Where timber is scarce the walls of houses have been built of sods alone. Out of them may be seen the prairie vegetation still growing. Women make bricks of well-trodden clay, baking them in the sun, to be used in building stoves. Windows closed by home-made sash and glazed with small panes are common. Floors are universally of earth and are sprinkled and swept daily. But little hardware goes into the composition of a house, the whole cash outlay not exceeding three and a-half to five dollars.

Certain Asiatic ways imported by the Doukhoborts are interesting to notice. An ox-yoke and a threshing implement similar, we may believe, to those used by Araunah the Jebusite, with the hard-trodden earthen threshing-floor arouse the recollection of primitive times. Their scythes are good as a tool for easy hand-work, but are being displaced by mowing machines now to be found in many villages. Steel ploughs, disc harrows and seed drills are adopted by them, as they have the means to buy. Spinning-wheels still do good work, and a simple home-made hand-loom will answer well for long winters when little can be done abroad. With increased means will come advanced ideas of comfort and ease, when the spinning-mule and power-loom will supplant the old laborious processes. A few wagons built in Russian style had the appearance of serviceable strength, but "Bain" wagons, bought of local dealers, were much more common. Blacksmiths and joiners showed a fair degree of skill. Some pieces of wood-work suggested the thought of cabinet-making being followed in the winters for local trade.

Gloves and stockings knit from yarn, spun by themselves, were among the gifts bestowed on us by the women as evidence of their gratitude for the help they have received. Here it may be the place to say that emphatic expression of deep thankfulness was given from village to village for the "gifts" that have come to them through Friends. This expression often took the form of a whole company bowing down to the ground. The obeisance we could reject as having no personal reference to us.

The ceremonial part of their worship includes much bowing. At sunrise on the first day of the week they gather in a company that is apparently somewhat select, clad in their best, the men having checked or striped sashes; the women silk kerchiefs on their heads. They arrange themselves in two ranks, men in one and women in another, standing face to face. A leader is at the head of each, while others stand according to age or position in the community. Beginning with the men, the two at the head clasp hands, make two low bows, kiss each other and bow again; the second man turning to the women makes still another bow, which is returned by them. This is repeated all down the line except the bow to the women. In the meantime the third man has taken up the same form, and each in turn, until all have gone through it. The women then repeat the same with each other. Reciting and singing of psalms or prayers follows, in which the women take a prominent part. All is done with a seriousness and solemnity that did much to redeem the formality. We witnessed no preaching from a Doukhobor, except by Ivan Makortoff, the ancient patriarch, who accompanied us in the tour through Assiniboia, and frequently spoke with much fervor and some eloquence.

For want of ready communication by conversation it was difficult to learn precisely much of their doctrinal belief, and there may be some differences among them in the degree of their conformity to Bible teaching. But so far as the expressions of such men as Ivan Makortoff and Peter Verigen were understood their conception of spiritual Christianity corresponds in many points closely to that of Friends. Their confession of the Three who bear record in Heaven, of the sensible guidance of the Holy Spirit, and the spiritual nature of saving baptism and of the true communion are believed to coincide closely to the belief of Friends. They also agree with them in the rejection of sacerdotalism in worship and the marriage covenant. Community of goods does not form a religious tenet; while taking the life of animals has a strong hold on the conscientious scruples of the great majority. Purity of life and integrity in dealing are among their marked characteristics.

In our religious communications to them there was at times enunciated Christian doctrine with which it might be supposed they would not be familiar, owing to their limited acquaintance with the Bible, due to general illiteracy; but in the responses frequently made at such times no aversion was shown to the sentiments expressed. Their earnest intention to keep the faith they have held was many times expressed in connection with our exhortations.

That there are to be found persons less spiritual and less cross-hearing than the majority is a condition corresponding with other societies of men that is to be observed in all Christian communities. Among them, on the other hand, are men and women whose hearts have responded to the love of Christ and who are prepared to example and counsel their fellow believers.

Schools and teachers were the subjects of conversation on one occasion, when we were given to understand that they are unwilling to accept any as instructors in whose religious principles they could not have full confidence. That they have a desire for school education is not to be doubted; and it is a field into which Friends may well enter. To assist them in preparing some of their young women for teachers appears to be the most feasible plan for inaugurating a system of primary schools in the villages, and to put them on the way to more advanced learning. It is thought the department of public instruction in Regina would be willing to assist in a well-designed scheme for education. Should any Friends who are well settled in their religious principles have a call to this work, they may find a sphere of usefulness, in which the Divine blessing will repay any sacrifice of the Society and comforts that the service shall involve.

Questions which interest Friends much are these: What are the prospects for the Doukhoborts becoming self-supporting? Will they need help during the coming winter? Information gathered and observations made, lead to the belief that at the rate of progress already made, many of them will be in good circumstances in the near future; that with the exception of a small proportion of them, their crops and wages for labor will enable them to pass the winter comfortably. Some individuals will probably need assistance, and possibly a village less prosperous than others will require aid as a community. Looking back to previous experiences it is hoped the means to meet any requirements will be forthcoming without difficulty.

It is desired to place a small flock of sheep in every village as being among the most promising means of profit in a business point of view. Measures have already been taken to buy a limited number of these, the money to pay for which is now in our treasury.

Statistics gathered at every village show a total population of seven thousand four hundred and forty-nine souls. The number of births exceeds that of deaths by fifty-five.

JONATHAN E. RHOADES.

Confirmation has been received of the report that twelve of the exiled Doukhoborts are about to be released from imprisonment in Siberia. The London Committee of Friends have sent £125 to Irkutsk to aid in paying their way to British Columbia; and an arrangement was made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for transportation to the Colonies at half-fare.

A LITTLE girl, as she lay dying, looked up into the face of her mother, who was standing at her bedside, and said, "Mother, I cannot see you very well; it is growing dark." Then she closed her weary eyes, and there was silence for a brief space. Presently she opened them again. There was a glad light in their heavenly blue, while a celestial smile illumined her pallid countenance, as she added, "But I can see Jesus!" And so with us as we toil along though the way be dark and lonely, and our eyes heavy with weeping, yet we may still "see Jesus," who is our sun and shield, and very present help in every time of trouble and distress.—Union Gospel News.

Some Account of the Early Experience and Subsequent Travels of Ruth Newlin.

I have had it on my mind for some years to leave in writing a sketch of my life and the merciful dealings of my Heavenly Father with me. I was born in Wayne County, Indiana, the 17th of First Month, in the year 1826, of honest parents, Abner and Rebecca Lewis, members of the religious Society of Friends, near New Garden Meeting House, and not far from New Port, now called Fountain City. I was the oldest of nine children. My parents had but little of this world's goods, and neither of them had a strong constitution, yet they endeavored to take us to meeting as much as circumstances would admit. I recollect very well what a stillness with something of a seriousness came over me when in meeting before I was six years old, and when a minister would speak the tears came into my eyes, although I was too young to comprehend much of what was said. Sometimes I felt so sad I did not want any one to speak to me when meeting closed. I feel thankful to this day that I was brought up to going to meeting. I do believe it had a good effect on my tender mind; and in after years, when the whole responsibility of the training of my children rested upon me, I labored many times early and late to keep them prepared for school and for meeting twice a week, for we had a great deal of poverty to struggle with after their dear father's death. I often felt with my poor health I could not keep up much longer. Sometimes I was tempted to leave them at home, it would be so much easier for me. Then my own experience in childhood would come to my remembrance, and I would be animated afresh to press through surrounding difficulties, and often thought I was helped, to my great admiration, and sweet peace was my reward that I had not left one lamb at home; and if I was favored with a crumb I had a great desire they might be visited by the Holy Spirit to the stilling of their wandering thoughts. Although they were too young to understand it, I hoped they, like myself, might know Him in after life.

In the spring of 1833 we moved to the State of Ohio, Warren County. When I was in my ninth year I became a wonder to myself. While other children around me were so restless in meeting, and so merry and playful after it broke, I did not want them to look me in the face, for I knew my eyes would betray me, and I feared they would laugh at me for crying. One day, after we got home, I asked my mother why I cried, and could not be lively like other children. She told me it was Jesus tendering my heart and visiting me with his love; and she encouraged me not to be ashamed of myself, nor to suppress my tender feelings so as to prevent my growing up to be a thoughtful girl. Oh! how different it might have been if I had always heeded her advice! While I did heed it I had peace of mind, and tried to be careful not to do anything that I thought would be wrong. But as I grew older I became less watchful, and my mind was more on the things of the world. I wanted nicer clothes, like other girls of my age, and as my parents were not able to get them for me, I took in all the work I could do to obtain means to supply my wants. I worked hard also to favor my dear afflicted mother, whose health was very poor. I often suffered a great deal of anxiety for fear she would be taken from us before we could care for ourselves. My father's business called him much from home for four years, so from the time I was ten years old until I was fourteen, our instruction every way rested mostly on our dear mother, who felt the responsibility to be very great.

She would often tell us of her desire concerning us, and would relate some of her youthful experience,—what great struggles she had with the enemy at times, and how at other times she was given to feel that the mercy of the Lord was toward her. When in her fifteenth year she was taken with a severe illness, during the time being blind for several days. While in this outward darkness she was brought into true submission of soul and could say in truth, "Not my will, but thine be done." One day her mother asked her if she felt ready to die. She felt no hesitation in saying she did. Sometime afterward she said to her mother, "I have asked for a further confirmation. Now get the Bible and turn to the first and second chapters of Job, and if I can repeat them it will be a confirmation to thee and to me, for I never committed them to memory or read them more than any other portion of the Bible," which she did without making any mistake; at which their hearts were contrited together at the goodness and mercy of God to a poor worm of the dust. It was afterward given her to see that her life would be spared for several years, and the path she would walk in was marked out to some degree. In these latter days we have heard the parents spoken against because they were never seen on the bended knee or heard in vocal prayer. I have a vivid recollection of our dear mother seating us around her and reading a portion of Scripture, then remaining long in silent waiting with tears running down her cheeks. I was too young then to understand the meaning of her tears, but have since believed she was imploring our Heavenly Father for more grace to sustain and wisdom to direct us all through this vale of sorrow. Yes, I am a firm believer in silent prayer.

While in Ohio we lived most of the time in rented houses, and sometimes they were very scarce and hard to get. My father's health failed, so that he had to give up a good situation he had at a mill. So we moved into a house for a short time until father could look about for another. He had agreed to give possession in the Fourth Month. For some time he went every day that was suitable for him to be out, but not a house could be found for rent. The last week had come that we could stay. On Second-day evening on his way home, not knowing what to do, he passed a place where the woman was out milking. She called to know if he had found a place. He replied "No; and I do not know what to do." She answered, "Don't get discouraged. I think there will be a house for you by the time you have to leave." She was taken dangerously ill that same evening, and died and was buried on Fifth-day morning before meeting. Her husband came to my father and gave him an offer to move into a part of his house, which he did. The fire in the fireplace had not gone out when we moved in. Father soon went into business that called him from home, and we were to pay our rent by doing chores. So this fell to my lot a great deal of the time. I had a singular dream while we lived at this place, which I penned down. [She was only ten years old at that time]. I dreamed I was up in the hay-mow getting hay for Henry Hawkins' horses, when I saw his wife in the corner of the mow. She said she watched me every time I came to feed, and once I was going to give the horses shatterings off the barn floor, but concluded that would be dishonest, and did not do it. She said "I want thee to tell thy mother to have a care over Mark and Noah, my too oldest sons. They have to die sometime, and I am anxious about them. Henry can teach them to hoe corn and potatoes, but I want them taught something better." She said there was something going on in the neighborhood, "and has been a long time, that is terrible. It will come out before long, may be next year." Then she left me and I awoke, and it was a dream. I was sad for several days, but said nothing about it till mother found what I had written. It seemed to impress her mind, and she tried to extend what care she could over the boys. The circumstance of haying the horses had happened a short time before. I was cowardly, and was afraid to go in the mow for hay. A very sad circumstance of domestic trouble in one of our neighbors' families was divulged in about a year afterward.

When I was in my fourteenth year it pleased the Lord to take home my little sister Rhoda, whom I had cared for a great deal. This was the first death in my father's family.

The following night, as I was meditating on the death of my little sister, the Lord was pleased to show me my condition—a poor, miserable sinner, and if I died as I was I could never go to heaven. I saw very clearly that I was not living as near Him as I once did—not as much concerned to please Him. I had lived too much in forgetfulness of the vows I had made in days past.

(To be continued.)

Narrations from Memory.

II. EUDOSIA.

(Continued from page 102.)

A certain Grecian philosopher who had a daughter born to him named her Athene, in honor of the tutelary goddess of his native city. The girl was beautiful and highly talented. Now at the father's death her two brothers resolved to retain all his property, leaving her without any share, and this by way of balancing things, they holding that as she had monopolized the wit and beauty of the family they would take the material advantages as their fair share. Being a young woman of spirit she was unwilling to submit to this injustice, and as they had the means of bribing the officials to whom she made application, she could not hope for redress in Athens, and so resolved to go to Constantinople and lay her wrongs before the emperor, who at that time was Theodosius the younger. Her native grace and courtesy made friends for her as she traveled, nor when arrived at the capital did she fail to find those who interested themselves in her behalf, and at length they obtained for her an introduction to the emperor's sister, Pulcheria, who finding her protegee not to be a Christian was disposed to turn away from her as from a defilement; but the poor girl telling her that her being a heathen was not her fault—she had been so educated—but if Christianity was anything better she would gladly embrace it, upon which in the hope of making a convert, Pulcheria took much interest in her and allowed her to come often for instruction. Upon profession of faith and baptism she renounced her heathen name of Athens and took the Christian one of Eudosia. After this, way was made for her appearing in person before the emperor and pleading her cause. So impressed was Theodosius with her charms that when she had finished he said, "However great may be that portion of your father's estate of which you have been unjustly deprived, I presume it is not equal to that which I am prepared to offer you," and thereupon proceeded to tender her his hand and a share in his throne. The poor girl was so overcome by unspeakable surprise that she had to be carried from the presence in a fainting fit. On coming to herself there was Pulcheria standing over her, who said, "Rise, Eudosia, empress of the east, and embrace your sister." The coronation soon followed, and her first act as empress was to send an officer to Athens with orders to bring the delinquent brothers before her for judgment. They, scarcely less astonished than she at what had come to their sister, began, as guilt will, each to try to throw the blame on the other, and wondered how they could have been so unkind to their now dear sister. Regrets were, however, unavailing. They must answer for themselves before her who had power to punish as she pleased. Falling at her feet they begged for mercy. All she said to them, however, was to repeat the words Pulcheria had addressed to her. She said, "Rise and embrace your sister."

In looking up some years ago historical reference to verify this story of my boyish days, I was much pleased to find with what Christian equanimity Eudosia bore trials that came upon her after her husband's death, because of her resolution to do right in opposition to a powerful faction at court.

III. HETTY MARVIN.

When the British and Tories attacked New London, Connecticut, during the Revolution, and set a price on the head of Governor Griswold, the latter fled to the town of L——, where a cousin named Marvin hid him for some days in an outhouse. At length his retreat was discovered, and he was compelled to flee, as an officer and troop were coming to search for him. His only chance of escape lay in his reaching the river, where he had a boat ready to use in case of emergency. It was two miles by the road, but a by-path would bring him to the water and save near half the length of his fearful run for life. Where the by-path entered the road sat Hetty Marvin attending to the family wash of linen. Thus was she employed when her hunted cousin sprang past her on his race to the river. Hetty was a timid child of 12, but wise and thoughtful above her years. She was frightened at the headlong haste with which the Governor rushed across the meadow. She arrested his attention, and a scheme occurred to delude his pursuers. "Hetty," he said, earnestly, "I am flying for my life, and unless I can reach my boat before they overtake me I am a lost man. You see the road forks here, and you must tell them that I have gone up the road to catch the mail wagon, which will soon be along, then they will turn that way." "Oh, cousin," said the little girl in an agony of distress, "I cannot tell a lie, indeed I cannot. Why did you tell me which way you were going?" "Hetty, dear child, you certainly would not betray your cousin to death? Hark! I hear them coming. Tell them I have gone up the road, and Heaven will bless you." "Heaven never blesses those who speak falsely, but run as quickly as possible, and I will not tell them which way you go, even if they kill me." "It is no use; unless I can deceive them I am a dead man." "Cousin, cousin, hide under my web of clothes. They will not think of looking there. Come, get down as swift as you can, and I will stand sprinkling it." "It's my only chance, and I'll get down as you say." Angry at their disappointment in not finding their prey in the house, the six mounted Tories, headed by a British officer, dashed down the road in swift pursuit. At sight of the girl in the meadow the leader halted. "Child," he said sternly, "have you seen a man running hereabout?" "Yes, sir," said Hetty, trembling. "Which way did he go?" "I promised not to tell, sir." "You must tell, or take the consequences." "I said I wouldn't tell if you killed me," sobbed out the frightened girl. "I'll have it out of her," said the furious officer with an oath. "Let me speak to her," said the Tory guide. "Your name is Hetty Marvin, is it not?" he said, pleasantly. "Yes, sir." "And the man who ran by was your mother's cousin, wasn't he?" "Yes, sir." "Well, we are friends of his. What did he say to you?" "He said he was flying for his life." "Just so; I hope he won't have far to go; where was he going to hide? You see we could help him if we knew his plan." Now Hetty was not a whit deceived by this smooth speech, but she wisely thought that frankness would serve her purpose better than silence, so she answered, "My cousin said he was going down this way to the river, where he had a boat, and he wanted me to tell you that he went up to catch the mail wagon." "Why didn't you do as he told you when I asked?" thundered the officer, fiercely. "I couldn't tell a lie," was the tearful answer. "Hetty," began again the smooth-tongued Tory, "you are a nice child. What did your cousin say when you told him you couldn't tell a lie?" "He said, 'you wouldn't betray me to death, would you?'" "And then you promised you wouldn't tell which way he went if we killed you?" "Yes." "Well, that was a brave speech, and so I suppose he thanked you and ran on down the road?" "I promised not to tell which way he went." "Oh, yes, I forgot: well, tell us the last word he said and we will not trouble you any more." "He said, 'It is my only chance, child, and I will get down as you say,'" and overcome by fright and the sense of her kinsman's danger should they rightly interpret her words, she covered her face with her hands and sobbed aloud. Her tormentors did not stay longer, but supposing they had the information desired dashed off down the road. Meantime the hunted fugitive lay safely where the simple shrewdness of his little cousin had hidden him, until time for her to return to her home, when bidding her to tell her mother to send some supper and his valise out to him, he safely made his way—after the coast was clear—to the river, and when he rejoined his father in a place of security he named a little daughter which had been born to him "Hetty Marvin," that he might be daily reminded of the cousin whose shrewdness had saved his life.

IV. THE PIRATES.

A famine prevailing among the Cape de Verde islanders in the early part of last (18th) century, some benevolent persons freighted a ship with flour for their relief. She sailed out of the port of Boston. Her commander gave in substance the following account: He said that in the grey dawn of the 18th day out he was aroused by a call from his watchful mates that there was a suspicious sail in sight. In a moment he was on deck, but the first glance almost dispelled the vague fear which the mate's words had occasioned.

"She is a Portuguese lugger, and she can't sail," was the remark. "She looks like that build, but she is not an honest vessel, for all that." "She may be a slaver, for we might expect to meet with slavers in this latitude." "She is no slaver, captain." "Why not?" "Because she has cannon on her deck instead of water casks." Taking the glass from the officer's hand he saw that it was even so. But now they had been sighted, and the stranger was shaking out his sails for the pursuit. This looked alarming, but all doubt was soor ended by the running to the mast of the pirates' dread ensign, the skull and crossbones. The vessel was now slowly overhauling them coming on like a panther, who, secure of his prey, is in no haste. When within hail an order came for the captain to come aboard. "Let me go," said the officer of the deck. "I will see if the mate will not do as well." At the same moment the boat left a launch was swung over the side of the pirates, and twenty cut-throats, armed to the teeth, sprang into her and were soon climbing the sides of the captured vessel. While the men were busy breaking open the main hatch and searching their prize the commander of the party, a short, thick-set, dark-featured man in whose deep-set eyes cunning and cruelty were mingled, approached the cabin hatch, where the captain was standing, and inquired with some civility if he was the commander, when a dialogue to this import ensued: "Where are you from?" "Boston." "What are you loaded with?" "Flour." "Where are you bound?" "To the Cape de Verdes." "Why, they are all starving there." "Yes; and the flour in this ship is the gift of our people to those who are starving." He said something to his mate which the captain could not understand, but which stopped their work and caused them to crouch down in a corner, from which the looked at him in curious amazement. "You Americans are all heretics; why should you send bread to feed Catholics?" "Because they are our fellow-creatures, and because their Saviour is our Saviour." He crossed himself and bowed his head at the Name. "You lie to me," he exclaimed, with a fierceness that almost startled: "If you lie to me I will nail you to the deck. Is the flour in this vessel the free gift of your countrymen to those starving people?" "I will prove it by my papers." "I don't want to see your papers. Swear it by the name of the Saviour you have just pronounced." "I swear the Holy Trinity." He said something to men which caused them to skurry over into their boat, but he remained gazing at the deck as if one might moderately count fifty. When he looked up his whole expression was changed. His eyes, late so full of cruelty, were now calm and clear in their depth. "Captain," he said, reverently, "Could you spare me a couple of buckets of water?" The order was given and he was lowered into the boat, but the man still remained as if loath to go. At length extending his hand, "God bless you, and send you to those who are praying for bread," and he was gone.

This has always seemed to me a very remarkable narrative, but I forbear comments, which every reader can make.

Items Concerning the Society.

David Scull finds himself obliged to remain in bed through the winter, on account of the death of his son.

Death unto sin, an hourly salvation, a true liberation from the world, a conformity to Christ, — constitutes us Friends. "Ye are my friends who do whatsoever I command you."—N. C. end.

The last resident member of the former Nantuxet Meeting of Friends, Eunice Paddock, has lately departed this life. One household from Pennsylvania now remaining the year round on the island, still observes at home Friends' manner of ship.

Besides the Friends named as attending the Ohio Yearly Meeting with minutes, Zebedee Haines, Benjamin P. Brown, and Henry T. Outland were present as ministers. Lloyd Balderston, Jr., of Mount Pleasant, delivered an address before the Pennsylvania Association of Barnesville Boarding School.

The fourth annual meeting of the Westtown Scholars' Association has been announced to be held in Fourth and Arch Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia, on Sixth-day evening, the 19th inst., at 6 P. M., the social part including refreshments, beginning at 6 P. M.—various interests of the Association being presented by selected speakers.

There are three hundred and sixty-four acknowledged ministers within the compass of the London Yearly Meeting; the number is steadily increasing, and probably twice as many take vocal part in our meetings. Some meetings are asking for more silence rather than for more speech. Our membership as a whole, through the great advance in the character of the public schools of our Society, enjoys a much better mental equipment, and a much larger number are qualified to give clear expression to their thoughts.—London Friend.

Short Extracts.

It is not until we have passed through the furnace that we are made to know how much dross is in our composition.

If you want to be miserable think about yourself; if you want to be happy, think about what you want, what you like, what respect people ought to pay you and what people expect of you.

Certainly it makes a great difference whether we work for God or whether we let God work through us.

It is always best to avoid controversy with two classes of people; those who cannot understand you and those who will not.

"We need not go far to find God, for He is everywhere; but we may have to go very far to find the ear that hears his voice, the heart that responds to his touch, and the life that embodies and expresses Him."

THE MINISTRY OF SUFFERING.—Few women have suffered more than Elizabeth Barrett Browning. One who knew her well said that her face reminded her of the face of mighty mountains deeply scored by spent torrents. From the age of fifteen till her thirty-seventh year, she suffered almost continually, and lay in a darkened chamber. When she was yet a girl, her brother was suddenly swept from her by a yachting accident; leaving her, she says, to perpetual nightmare. And so she wrote to her husband, saying,

"A heavy heart, beloved, have I borne from year to year, Until I saw thy face; and sorrow after sorrow Took the place of all those natural joys."

After her marriage, her father would not permit her name to be spoken in his hearing, would open none of her letters, and did not mention her in his will. But do you think that she could have comforted tens of thousands of women, or written "The Cry of the Children," or inspired Robert Browning to write the poetry which is being increasingly woven into the texture of our times, unless she had gone through this for others' sake?—F. B. Meyer.

"Calling—that is a word to be kept. It is a higher, better word than trade or handicraft or profession, for it suggests that the true man, whether he labors with brain or with biceps, and the true woman, whether she sweeps in dignity through a drawing-room or sweeps industriously in a drawing-room, is occupied with a vocation, not just an avocation, and hears a Voice from heaven summoning to that work."—Observer.

Notes from Others.

Majorities are seldom right till a minority is first right. Had it not been for the courage to stand with a minority, there had been no reform in history.—The Morning Star.

The devil, like death, likes a shining mark. Hence He apparently lays out his best endeavors to cast down those who are prominent in the work of God.

A German proverb tells us that every great war leaves a country with three armies—one of invalids, one of mourners, and one of idle persons ready to commit crime.

BE SILENT BEFORE HIM.—The mind wants steady- ing and setting right many times a day. It resembles a compass placed on a rickety table; the least stir of the table makes the needle swing around and point untrue. Let it settle, then, till it points aright. Be perfectly silent for a few moments, thinking of Jesus; there is almost Divine force in silence. Drop the thing which worries, which excites, which interests, which thwarts you; let it fail like a sediment to the bottom, until the soul is no longer turbid, and say secretly: "Grant, I beseech thee, merciful Lord, to thy unfaithful servant pardon and peace; that I may be cleansed from all my sins and serve thee with a quiet mind."—Bishop Huntington.

THE DELIVERANCE OF THE RACE FROM SIN.—A long time ago there was in Scotland a chain bridge famous for its massive strength. A French engineer came over and took its dimensions, and in due time built a similar structure on the Seine at Marly. It was, however, much lighter and airier than its prototype. When its gates were opened to the multitude it began to sway to and fro ominously beneath their footfall, and presently gave way. The trouble with this bridge was that its architect had omitted the middle bolt, thinking it but a clumsy feature at best. There are those who are making a similar mistake in these days in their eagerness to press the application of the Gospel upon the temporal wants of the people. The middle bolt of the whole Gospel fabric is the cross of Jesus Christ—God's [provision] for the deliverance of the race from sin.—David J. Burrell, in Spirit of the Age.

GOD MUST HATE SIN.—God would not be a holy God if it were all the same to Him whether a man were good or bad. As a matter of fact, the modern revulsion against the representation of the wrath of God is usually accompanied with the weakened conceptions of his holiness and of his moral government of the world. Instead of exalting, it degrades his love to free it from the admixture of wrath, which is like the alloy with gold, giving firmness to what were else too soft for use. Such a God is not love, but impotent good nature. If there be no wrath, there is no love; if there were no love, there would be no wrath. It is more blessed and hopeful for sinful men to believe in a God who is angry with the wicked, whom yet He loves, every day, and who cannot look upon sin, than in one who does not love righteousness enough to hate iniquity, and from whose too indulgent hand the rod has dropped to the spoiling of his children. "With the froward Thou wilt show Thyself froward." The mists of our sins intercept the gracious beams and turn the blessed sun into a ball of fire.—Alexander Maclaren.

THE DECREASE OF MEMBERSHIP IN THE CHURCH.—Indeed, losses in a single year, occasioned by a careful and close revision of church records, may be an evidence of good housekeeping and spiritual vigor. Quality is better than quantity, if much of that quantity is a positive hindrance to the spiritual life of the membership. There is no doubt that the Church is often burdened with the accumulated rubbish of years of neglect. In such a condition the only remedy is the pruning process, by which the removal of the worthless and dead portion may increase the vigor and growth of the remaining branches. But the most serious and alarming condition that can befall the Church is spiritual stupor and indifference in the work of soul-winning and spiritual culture. We refer to the Church in general, and not to any particular denomination.

If the Church does not feel keenly its spiritual barrenness and loss of winning power, it is in a perilous condition. There is need of alarm. If the cause is removed, then the temporary losses may be retrieved. But if the conditions which lead to decline shall continue, then there is no hope for the future.—The Religious Telescope.

YALE'S WORKING STUDENTS.—The action of the authorities of Yale University in opening a labor bureau for the advantage of students who have need to earn the whole, or a part, of the cost of their education, is, we believe, a novel one. It is likely also, to prove useful in a successful degree. Already it is said there are more applications filed for students' services than the bureau probably will be able to supply. Some of them, not unlikely, are for such services as a student cannot well perform and keep up his studies. It is an interesting statement that is made in connection with the inauguration of this enterprise, that, in the class of three hundred and twenty-seven men who were graduated last year fifteen paid all their expenses by their own labor, fifteen others paid nearly all their expenses, and sixty-nine paid a large proportion of their expenses. Statistics compiled by classes for their own information and use show that for a period of ten years, about one of every five men graduated has paid a large share of his expenses by his own labor, and one out of every twenty has earned the entire cost of his college education. It goes without saying that men who purchase education by such toils and sacrifices do not believe that it is an incumbrance instead of a help in their future career. President Hadley, by his course in this matter, shows a determination to prevent Yale from acquiring the reputation of being an institution especially for rich men's sons.—Boston Herald.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The reply of the State Department to the French note relative to the basis of Chinese negotiations has been made public.

It contains the following clauses: 1st. The punishment of the guilty parties who may be designated by the representatives of the Powers at Peking. 2nd. The continuance of the interdiction against the importation of arms. 3rd. Equitable indemnities for the Governments, corporations and private individuals. 4th. The organization in Peking of a permanent guard for the Legations. 5th. The dismantling of the forts at Taku. 6th. The military occupation of two or three points on the road from Tien-Tsin to Peking.

In accordance with a request, Minister Conger has cabled a list of prominent Chinese whom he regards as the responsible authors of the outrages on foreigners, and has made recommendations as to their punishment. It is understood that the minister has named some who were not included in the recent imperial decree when Prince Tuan was degraded.

It is understood that the final disposition of the silver, some $275,000, taken by the American marines at the capture of Tien-Tsin, may be determined by Congress. In the meantime, the silver is being treated as a trust fund. Washington reports speak of the anxiety of the Government authorities to bring about negotiations for peace as the only means to prevent further outbreaks in China.

Houghton County, Michigan, which is in the heart of the Lake Superior copper mining region, is said to have the highest assessed valuation of property per capita of any county in the United States. The total valuation for the county is $120,000,000.

The convention of anthracite coal miners on the 13th at Scranton, voted to accept the operators' proffer of a ten per cent. wage increase, providing the operators will continue its payment until Fourth Month 1st, 1901, and will abolish the sliding scale in the Lehigh and Schuylkill regions.

The treasurer of the Galveston local relief fund acknowledges receipt of contributions to Tenth Month 12th of $979,595.

During the year over 30,000,000 pounds of relief supplies have been distributed in Porto Rico by the Quartermaster's Department. It has been found impracticable to use the native cattle for subsistence, and the refrigerated beef from this country has been generally acceptable. The cost of the relief supplies in aid of the hurricane sufferers was $824,828; 796 schools are open under American control, a gain of 180 over last year; while 35,000 children attend an American system of schools, a gain of 10,000 over last year.

It is believed the wage-earners of the United States are to-day enjoying a higher standard of living and a larger measure of well-being than wage-earners have ever before enjoyed in the history of the world. The wage-earners in the United States have on deposit in cash in the savings' banks subject to call, two thousand five hundred millions of dollars.

The north half of the Colville Indian Reservation in Washington, about equal in size to the State of Delaware, has been opened for settlement.

Yellow fever in Cuba is believed to be due to a poison conveyed by parasitic insects, like fleas and mosquitoes.

It is estimated that the orange crop in Florida this year will amount to 1,000,000 boxes. In 1894 it was upwards of 5,000,000, and the orchards are now recovering from the effects of the severe cold weather which occurred shortly afterwards.

The statement is made that the greatest distance over which electrical power is now being transmitted by wire is eighty-five miles, being carried from a waterfall at Redlands, Cal., to the city of Los Angeles, to run a street railway, to light the city and to furnish power for several municipal undertakings. The plant was set up in 1897. It has a capacity of 100 horse power and 33,000 volts.

It is said that over 3,000,000 of our population are in annual need and actually receive some kind of charitable assistance. In New York city there are on an average more than 100,000 unemployed persons.

A bulletin issued by the Commissioner of Labor gives a summary of data on the rate of wages paid in various occupations for a period of ten years past. It shows that for six years following 1892 there was a decline in wages, but the rise in the last two years has carried the rate above the average prevailing in 1891.

A Washington despatch says it is understood that the President has selected Judge Gray, of Delaware, to represent the United States, with ex-President Harrison, on The Hague permanent arbitration tribunal.

The average wealth per inhabitant in the United States is said to be $1,050.

The Tri-state Medical Society, of Tennessee, Alabama and Georgia, has taken steps to secure medical legislation in those three States for the purpose of regulating or prohibiting the marriage of habitual criminals, persons afflicted with incurable diseases, drunkards and victims of harmful drugs.

Massachusetts, it is said, uses more postage stamps per capita than any other State.

There were 338 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 4 more than the previous week and 144 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 180 were males and 158 females: 55 died of consumption; 22 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 16 of cancer; 16 of diphtheria; 10 of typhoid fever, and 3 of apoplexy.

COTTON closed on a basis of 10 $\frac{1}{4}$ c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.50 to $2.70; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.40 to $3.50; Western winter, straight, $3.50 to $3.65; spring, straight, $3.75 to $4.00; city mills, straight, $3.50 to $3.70. RYE FLOUR.—$3.10 per barrel for choice Pennsylvania.

GRAIN—No. 2 red wheat, 74 to 74 $\frac{1}{4}$ c.

No. 2 mixed corn, 46 $\frac{1}{4}$  to 46 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.

No. 2 white oats, clipped, 27 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 28 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 6c.; good, 5 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.; medium, 4 $\frac{3}{4}$  to 5 $\frac{1}{4}$ c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.; good, 4 to 4 $\frac{1}{4}$ c.; common, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; spring lambs, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 6 $\frac{1}{4}$ c.

HOGS.—Best Western, 7 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.

FOREIGN.—The Empress of China and the court are now, it is supposed, fully 600 miles from Peking, and it is too late in the season for them to undertake the long, slow journey back to the Province of Pe-Chi-Li. They can communicate easily by wire with the envoys at Peking or Tien-Tsin, but that will be slow and unsatisfactory, and after all the important point is the restoration of some sort of government at Peking.

Military activity on the part of the allied forces in China, notably the sending of troops to Pao-Ting-Fu, has served to arouse an anti-foreign sentiment in the Empire that may delay the beginning of negotiations for a settlement of the troubles.

A rebellion quite unconnected with the Boxer movement, and, presumably, directed against the Government of China, instead of against the foreigners in that country, has appeared. If it should prove to be a serious uprising, it will add very undesirable complications to the already greatly involved situation of the allies in China. In one battle the Imperial troops were routed, and 200 killed.

Li Hung Chang has transmitted the reply of the Chinese Emperor to the demand of Germany, in which it is ordered that three high Chinese officials are to be decapitated, others to imprisonment and Prince Tuan is to be banished to Siberia. The sincerity of these statements is doubted. It is said that 2000 Japanese, 8000 German and 1500 Russian troops will pass the winter in Peking.

The International Peace Congress lately meeting in Paris, epitomized its work in an appeal to the nations, in which the Congress condemns the refusal of the British Government to agree to arbitration or mediation in South Africa, and expresses keen regret that the majority of the Governments who might have offered mediation abstained from so doing in spite of their pacific declarations at The Hague.

Regarding China, the Congress, after recognizing and pointing out the primary causes of discontent upon the part of the Chinese, urges that the solution of the conflict be just and equitable and in conformity with the inalienable right of the populations to freely dispose of themselves.

The Congress points out the moral and material injury resulting from formidable armaments and recommends the Governments to study these questions on the solution of which it is asserted depends the prosperity and the very existence of the nations.

The Congress recommends international arbitration, and urges the conclusion of treaties making arbitration permanent and obligatory.

Since the discovery of argon in the atmosphere in 1894, four other hitherto undiscovered gaseous elements have been separated from liquid air by fractional distillation, viz: Helium, Neon, Cypton and Xenon. The latter is the heaviest simple gas yet discovered, being about four and a half times heavier than the air we breathe. The English cloctions are practically ended. The relative strength of the Government and the Opposition force in the House of Commons remains about as it was before the dissolution of Parliament. The Government song and has received the popular approval which usually follows a successful war, yet the Government majority in the House will not differ materially from its majority in the last Parliament. The balance of parties remains unchanged.

Miniature Bibles are worn as watch charms in Russia. They are each one inch long, three-fourths of an inch wide and three-eighths of an inch thick, and contain the five books of the old Testament. The text is in Hebrew and can be read with the aid of a magnifying glass.

The Viceroy of India reports: "The general condition of the crops is excellent, and, except in a part of Bombay, famine conditions are disappearing. The total number on the relief list has fallen to 2,746,000."

According to reports from St. Pierre, seventeen fish vessels that were operating on the Grand Banks during the gale of Ninth Month 12, are still missing, the crew aggregating over 200 men.

The British War Office has issued orders that the bulk of the militia regiments called out for service during the South African war are to be disbanded. This will affect about 50,000 men.

English statistics show that of late there has been large and rapidly growing importation of tomato. Tomatoes were but a short time ago an article of luxury in Great Britain, only used for the rich; but now they have become a common dish on the table of the work classes.

Dr. Robert Koch, an eminent German bacteriologist, announces to the medical world that his investigations in Dutch West Indies and East Africa have convinced him that his cure for malaria is positive. He also wants it known that he has found a way of ridding countries of the malarial parasites, the mosquitoes. On his arrival in Berlin he will present his official report to the German Government, and will recommend that measures be taken at once to introduce his method of exterminating the parasites and his cure for malaria, which, he claims, can be manufactured at once in all countries.

RECEIPTS.

Unless otherwise specified, two dollars have been received from each person, paying for vol. 74.

Sarah A. Holmes, N. J.; Pelatiah Gove, Vt.; F. E. Haines, N. J., 50 cts. to No. 14 V. 74; Jos. Brantingham, agent, O., for Jonathan Brown; Susan W. Worrell, Pa., to No. 14 V. 75; Casper T. Sharpl N. J.; Ashbel Carey, O., to No. 40 vol. 74; Lars Wick, agent, Iowa, $10, for Axel Melberg, Lars T. Andrew Tow, Anna Tow and Ole G. Sevig; William Abel, Neb., $1, to No. 27, vol. 74; Zenaide M. Ha Phila.; Thos. W. Fisher, Pa.; John S. Kirk, I. Joseph B. Kester, Pa.; Alexander C. Wood and Edward S. Wood, N. J.

Remittances received after Third-day noon will appear in the Receipts until the following week.

NOTICES.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—A stated meeting of the General Committee will be held in Philadelphia Sixth-day, the 19th inst., at 10.30 A. M. The Commission on Instruction will meet at 9 o'clock at the same place. WM. B. HARVEY, Cler.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of sons coming to Westtown School, the stage will leave Philadelphia 7.17 and 8.19 A. M., and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when requested. Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., twenty cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, Westtown Station or West Chester, Phone 85. EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Sup.

A FRIEND wishes a position as housekeeper or companion in or near the city. Address "R," office of THE FRIEND.

WANTED.—A young Friend, having a thorough knowledge of electrical engineering, desires a position with a Friend. Address "V," office of THE FRIEND.

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting House, Twelfth St. Philadelphia, Tenth Month 4th, 1900, HENRY DU ALLEN, of Philadelphia, and FRANCES ARMITT WOOD, daughter of Paschall and Lydia Worth of Chester Co. Pennsylvania.

WILLIAM H. PILE'S SONS, PRINTERS
No. 422 Walnut Street

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TENTH MONTH 27, 1900.

No. 15.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,
No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,
PHILADELPHIA.

Orders from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Printed as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

Then and Now.

Having given heretofore in this column publicity to reflections on the Society of Friends by Governor Roosevelt fifteen years ago, seems but fair that he should have the benefit of an equal place for his language delivered at Plainfield, Indiana, on the 12th inst.

Understand that this community is composed of members of the Society of Friends, who for social and industrial virtue in a way that respects them to the respect of all people. That virtues and righteousness which they practice the foundation of good government cannot be had, and without them we should never have been able to make the republic what it is and must be. I am glad to address the members of the society that stood by President McKinley and gave influence toward international arbitration at the Peace Conference at The Hague.

It is impossible yet, for we have not advanced enough, to settle all our difficulties peaceably by arbitration; but in every case we should avoid going to arms where possible, for we, as a party, are pledged to peaceful settlement until war becomes a last resort."

The Friends' Intelligencer of last week contained the following extract from a recent letter of Governor Roosevelt to William E. Walling of Baltimore, Md.

"Sincerely, my dear sir, I need hardly say that I am in your love for peace and desire for arbitration. I heartily agree. The sentence of mine which you complained of, and which was written fifteen years ago, was intended to express my disagreement with the man who acts on inadequate provocation, and of the man who on adequate provocation fails to act.

It would be untrue to say that I have altered my convictions in the matter, but were I now to write the sentence, I should certainly so phrase it that it could not be construed as offensive to the Society of Friends, a body whose social virtues and righteousness justly command universal re-

"Whom to Attract."

We have long united in the view that "Friends' principles are not confined to the stated Friends' meetings," and that such Friends are recreant to them who would conduct a meeting for worship or devotion under any different principle. The word "mission" does not release a Friend from being a Friend. We have believed that Friends have a mission, namely to commend by consistent practice a worship conducted livingly and purely "in spirit and in truth" before the face of the world, whether in our regular or in appointed or "mission" meetings; and that a right concern to hold meetings among people of any class would be blessed with better results by a living consistency with the principle of a waiting worship and a waiting ministry.

The class among the people to whom our mode and principle would, if brought before their attention, especially appeal, is thus brought to view by John William Graham in the British Friend:

"I believe that in most towns and in many country districts a minority of people exists, now, as it did in the seventeenth century, who are sufficiently adult in their spiritual manhood to be happier without the clergyman, the singing, and the creed. They have heard the calling of the Inward Voice; they see the light on their path, for they are lantern bearers. They breathe fresh air and priesthoods choke them. They are rebels against clericalism; and they often bear with weary patience the round of mechanical routine which seems to help the weakness of others. They are mostly of two classes, those who are fairly active members of other congregations; and those who, having been such, have abandoned the religious bodies they had known.

"For a generation,—time moves so fast that one might almost say for two generations,—the most widely prevalent method has been to adapt Quakerism to popular taste by undertaking mission work on very much the ordinary Nonconformist lines, so far as unprofessional workers can. By hymns, by Bible reading, by addresses not aspiring to the type known as called and anointed ministry, the dread vacancy of silence has been kept at bay. Then, in full recognition of the fact that this is not so pure a form of worship as a proper Friends' meeting, and in the earnest wish to lead converts to what is felt to be a better training for the soul, attempts have been made to assimilate the mission meeting to Quaker form, or, on the other hand, to alter the regular meeting for worship to suit the needs of new members or attenders. But these attempts to put in the banner of distinctively Quakerism have, though continued or at least desired for many years, been generally not very successful, and have been largely given up as impracticable. That mission meetings breed mission meetings is found to be the general rule.

"This is but natural, for we began by attracting the people who like to have something always going on, and are uneasy if no one is conducting. That is their inborn, inbred temperament, to change which is among the hardest of tasks. Meantime we have quite ignored our inborn Quaker. He is still in the street or the church. Why should he go to our mission meeting? He has been to many already, not conspicuously different, to outside seeming, from ours.

"Had we not better try to attract him to begin with; and even if he be not a multitude, yet by getting hold of him we are doing our proper work, and hitting our mark. This is a truly catholic, truly unsectarian view. We are a specialized weapon; we are only one of many; we do not pretend to compete in the competition of the churches for the many-headed multitude. But we offer a home to those who are attuned to our low quiet note, who have in them the makings of the Quaker temperament. Incidentally, how much we should be spared in the way of ministry in some suffering meetings, where good people with an uneasy wish to keep up consecutive utterance have large scope. Never mind the grammar or the pronunciation; how little they matter. Talkativeness is the truly fatal thing. If we found our real brethren to begin with, that would generally cure itself. How, then, shall we try to do so?

"Begin boldly with a Friends' meeting pure and simple. This requires only a warm, clean room; and it is desirable not to have fewer than two people. Anyone likely to begin a Friends' meeting is likely to have some little nucleus about him of some kind; or some few people whom he can associate with him to begin with.

"Let Quakerism be prominent from the beginning. Make no secret of it. After you have gathered a few attenders, your course is plain. You have compromised no ideal; your edifice is stable, if not extensive. The curious question whether you ought to take people into membership and try to make them Friends afterwards—a dangerous extension into the religious world of the practice of long credit—never troubles you. You do all you can to send the children to Friends' schools."

OPEN-MINDEDNESS.—The editor's confidence in the pure concern of heart and the sound intentions of a contributor to add her mite to the upholding of the distinctive doctrine of the Early Friends, perhaps suggested his sugpecting that her view of open-mindedness to the truth everywhere was open to any construction differing from William Penn's exhortation, "Be universal in your spirits;" meaning, as we have apprehended, an openness to the universal and saving light of Christ from day to day for our spiritual progress. We are aware that human language by its imperfection, especially where "philosophy" is touched upon, seldom does justice to the thought of a writer or of a responder, who may both at heart be in agreement. And so a discussion, if permitted, could ensue indefinitely. But our columns are perhaps responsible more for what they have seemed to others to say, than for what the writers meant to say. Accordingly in case anything has appeared in them that would convey to the general reader the view that the apostles, the early Christians and George Fox and many eminent Friends could not be expected to comprehend the principles of Christianity as well as the learned of the present day who are "open-minded;" or that if we were only open-minded we would comprehend the things of God by our intellectual faculties;—we would repudiate such a sentiment, and we believe the writer of the former article on "Quakerism and the Individual" would join with us in doing so.

For the clearing of any concern which may have arisen in this respect, the following communication should have had place long since, but for preventions apparently beyond our control. In order that its writer also may at one point be justly understood, we would ask that those who would question the language: "What Christianity will require in the future it requires now; what it unfolds to succeeding generations, it unfolds now to all the Lord's humble, obedient children,"—would judge its meaning and intention by the sentence immediately preceding, and the one immediately following it.

Quakerism and the Individual.

We must not wander from the simplicity, purity and sweetness of the blessed and unchangeable truths taught and exemplified by our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. If the words of Christ, "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now," mean that the disciples could never attain the fulness of gospel light, then our early Friends and many of us their successors have been laboring under a delusion. "Ye cannot bear them now;" but they were further taught not only by Christ while in that prepared body, but the Comforter which He promised to them after his resurrection and ascension, was to continue to enlighten them. They were to tarry at Jerusalem until endued with the power from on high; but they did become endued with this power as declared by Peter in the great day of Pentecost when all of whatever language "heard them speak in their own tongue."

However learned the present and succeeding generations, I cannot admit that the past or present may not attain unto the same light which "enlighteneth every man." What Christianity will require in the future it requires now; what it unfolds to succeeding generations it unfolds now to all the Lord's humble, obedient children. Because mankind turn away from the light it does not follow that the light is not given. George Fox and his faithful co-laborers did not introduce any new doctrine—they simply revived primitive Christianity. How beautifully and cleverly did Isaac Pennington and Stephen Crisp and other faithful Friends write on these subjects. Other Friends, like John Woolman and John Barclay, were equally clear, and how joyful and triumphant was the setting of the sun of these and many more who might be named. As a people the Society of Friends have believed that the teachings of Jesus were clear and easily understood; and learned essays may only mystify, obscure and darken, instead of helping the dear seeking children of God who "hunger and thirst after righteousness" to come directly to the Great Teacher himself, that they may hear the gracious words that proceed from Him who still "teaches as never man taught." As these draw near to Him in silent introversion of spirit, in patience and humility, they are often instructed in those deep mysteries which are hid from the wise and prudent of this world, and revealed unto babes in Christ. In Him and in Him only are "hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge."

"Open-mindedness" to all that proceeds from the Divine teacher is very essential, but open-mindedness to the delusive teaching of some of the learned men and women of the present day often leads to infidelity.

There is such a flood of reading matter constantly pouring from the public press that the time of many is so largely occupied in the perusal of it, that little leisure is left for reading the deeply instructive history and biography of Friends. I commend to the readers of THE FRIEND, who have not already perused them, Daniel Wheeler's, Thomas Shillito's and John Barclay's Journals and letters, also John Wilbur's Journal and Correspondence. These dear, faithful Friends were taught in the school of Christ, and their varied experience, their depth of spiritual insight enabled them to become way-marks to others, and many brethren and sisters were helped through their instrumentality to a closer walk with God.

JOHN W. FOSTER.

WESTERLY, R. I.

AMID all this confusion, how comforting the Scripture that says, "Nevertheless, the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his." He knows his own, wherever they are. They may not be filling the public eye, nor causing any special comment, but in due time they will be revealed and honored. These are they who know the Shepherd's voice and follow only Him, and who in meekness and self-denying service are concerned only for his approval, and to whom He says, "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."—Charles C. Cook.

CONTINUAL unfolding is essential to man's relish of life.

The Insane in Palestine.

Extracts from a letter from Fareda a Theophilus Waldmeier, dated Asafuriyeh, Nih Month 12th, 1900.

. . . . You will of course have heard about the opening of our asylum which took place on the sixth of last month. The mingled feelings of joy, happiness and gratefulness toward the loving hand of our dear Heavenly Father which was upon this work from its very starting, no pen can describe; neither can any human heart perceive, the joy when we could take a very first patient in, a girl of sixteen years who was put in iron chains by her own parents and beaten. Oh, it was a terrible condition in which she was brought to us! and kept saying, "Don't beat me; don't put me in chains!" And now if you could only have peep at her! She has quite changed. I have lost that restlessness in her eyes, and her behavior. She does not tear her clothes, she looks quite happy; smiles so sweetly when we go to see her and gives us her hand. Do our dear Friends, who have and are so kindly helping on this most needed work, what the Lord has done through them. He will reward his faithful followers. Dr. Wolff, a specialist on mental diseases, a German, thirty-two years of age, is, I am sure, also sent and chosen by our Heavenly Father, for he is just the suitable person for Asafuriyeh, and has won already the love and esteem of everybody and also of our patients. We have in the "American Cottage" besides the above mentioned patient, five women patients, one from Tripolis, another from Damascus, three days' journey. She was brought by her husband, who is engaged in evangelic work in the Scotch Presbyterian Mission at Damascus. The three others are from Beirut. They are all on the way of recovery. One is already sent away.

The "Men's" or "Swiss Cottage" is rapidly full, and we had to order four more beds. Dr. Wolff is taking only acute cases in, as we would have filled the two hospitals with chronic patients; for these latter ones we ought to have a cottage built, also for epileptic patients. It is heartrending to hear the story of each of our patients, for all of them have been taken to that fearful cave in the Convent Kuzh. You have heard enough about it. It is described in the first appeal for the Lebanon Hospital for the Insane. We have among our patients Jos. Abdemur, "a Friend," (from Beyrouth, who was the first "Friend" and attended the meetings at Brumana so regular) a Mohammedan, a Jew, a Mennonite, a German Christian, a Druse—all denominations are represented. We are expecting a Turk, who is coming from Aleppo. The gratitude and love of all people, I would express in this sentence which a Mohammedan said the other day: "God himself is pleased with this establishment; may He reward those Friends who are helping us in caring for those dead who cannot be buried!" We are indebted to your dear Friends everywhere. Keep on praying for us and helping us to carry on this most Christ-like work. The books which the Philadelphia Friends have been so kind to send reach us daily. They are piled up still, till we find some one who will give us a bookcase for them. . . . Will you kindly give our love to our dear friends?

The Confidence of the Ends of the Earth.

The following article was sent to us enclosed in a letter from a New York physician, a member of the Dutch Reformed Church, who during his summer residence in West Falmouth, Mass., habitually attended Friends' meetings there. He says:

"Please accept of the enclosed, that shows the same beautiful spirit manifested in the message of the W. F. Friends. It comes from one of our Dutch Church clergymen whose local body has three or four thousand members in South Africa. It is good to get news from there.

Sincerely,
EPRRAIM CUTTER.

WAITING UPON GOD.

BY ANDREW MURRAY.

What can be the reason that so many of our beloved children complain continually, in various circumstances separate me from God; trials, temptations, character, temper, friends, enemies—anything can come between God and me." Cannot God so take position that He can be nearer to me than anything in the world? Must riches, or poverty, sickness, or sorrow, have a power over me my God has not? No. Why is it then we so often hear God's children make complaint? There can be but one answer, "They do not know their God." If there is trouble or feebleness in the church of God, this is the reason. And this is why, in addition to the promise, "I will be thy God," the promise is so often added, "And ye shall know that I am your God." If I know that, simply through man's teaching, nor with the aid of mind, or imagination, but in the living presence which God gives in the heart, then I know that the Divine presence will be so wonderful, and my God himself will be so beautiful and so near, that I can live all my days and all my strength, a conqueror through Him that loved me. What is that life that we need?

Why do not God's people know their God? For this reason: They take anything but God—ministers, and preaching, sermons, books, and prayers, and work, and effort, the exertion of human nature, instead of waiting until God reveals himself. That is one of our great weaknesses. Ah, brothers, no teaching can put us in possession of this blessed light of God, but only all, to your soul. I would to God that one of us would ask his heart whether he is saying every day, "I want more of God." Do not speak to me only of all the beautiful things in the Bible. That cannot satisfy me. Wait on God." In our inner Christian life, in our prayers, in our churches, in our fellowships, in our conventions, God must always be in the first place. If that be given Him will take possession. In a meeting every eye is fixed upon the chairman as the man who will say who shall read, and pray, and speak, and keep order. Oh, if in every meeting our hearts were set upon the living God, crying, "My soul thirsteth for God," what power would that blessings and what presence of the ever-living God would be revealed. When a man is giving a lecture with a map or illustrations, he often uses a long pointer to indicate the places or illustrations. Does the audience look at that pointer? No. It might be made of fine gold, but the pointer cannot satisfy them. They want to see what the pointer points at. The Bible is nothing but a pointer, pointing to God; and Jesus Christ came to point us, to show us the way, to bring us to God. I fear there are many people who love Christ and trust in Him, but who fail to see the one great object of his work; they have never understood the Scripture. "He died, that He might bring us unto God." There is a difference between the way I am going, and the end I have in view. I might be traveling amid beautiful scenery, in delightful company, but if I have a home I long to reach, all the scenery and company around me cannot satisfy me. And God is meant to be the home of our souls. Christ came to bring us back to God and unless we take Christ for what God gave Him, our religion will always be divided. What do you read in Hebrews VII.? "He is able to save to the uttermost." Whom? "Them that come to God by Him." In Christ we have the graciousness and condescension and tenderness of God, but we are in danger of being content with that, and Christ wants to bring us to rejoice as much as in the glory of God himself, in his righteousness, his holiness, his authority his presence and his power. He can save completely those who come to God through Him.

How can I come to know God as the God above all circumstances, filling my heart every day? The one thing needful is, "I must wait upon God." You know the original is, "My soul is silent unto God." What ought to be the silence of the soul conscious of its littleness and ignorance, its prejudices and dangers from passion, from all that is human and sinful, and saying, "I want the everlasting God to come in and take hold of me, and to take such hold of me that I may be kept all my life long in the hollow of his hand; I want Him to take such possession that every moment He may work all in all in me." That is what is implied in the very nature of our God. How ought we to be silent unto Him, and wait upon Him.

He is to be the light and the life of creation, the source and power of all existence. The beautiful trees and green grass, and the bright sun, God created that they might show forth his beauty, and wisdom, and glory. When that tree one hundred years old was planted, God did not give it a stock of life in which it could carry on its existence. Nay, verily. God clothes the lilies every year afresh with their beauty, every year He clothes the tree with its foliage, and its fruit, every day, and every hour; it is God who maintains the life of all nature. God created us, that we might be the empty vessels in which He could work out his beauty, his will, his love, and the likeness of his blessed son. That is what God is for—to work in us by his mighty operation, without one moment's ceasing. When I begin to grasp that, I no longer think of the true Christian life, as a high impossibility and an unnatural thing, but I say, "It is the most natural thing in creation that God should have me every moment, and should be nearer to me than all else." Think what folly it is to imagine that I cannot expect God to be with me every moment. Look at the sunshine! Have you ever had any trouble as you were studying in the light which the sun gives? Have you ever said, "Oh, how can I keep that light and be sure that I shall have it to use while working?" God had taken care that the sun itself should provide you with light without your care. Has God arranged that the light of the sun which will one day be burned up can come to me unconsciously, and abide blessedly and mightily; and is God not willing or not able to let his light and his presence so shine through me that I can walk all the day with God nearer to me than anything in nature? Praise God for the assurance; He can do it. Why, then, does He do it so seldom and in such feeble measure? There is but one answer: You do not permit it. You are so occupied and filled with other things, preaching and praying, studying and working, so occupied with your religion that you do not give God time to make himself known, and to enter and take possession. Listen to the word of the man who knew God so well, and say, "My soul, wait thou only upon God."

This life of dependence on the Father is the very glory of the Creator, the very life Christ brought into the world and to which He wants to lift us. The secret of the Christ-life is this: Such a consciousness of God's presence that whether Judas came to betray Him, or Caiaphas condemned Him unjustly, or Pilate gave Him up to be crucified the presence of the Father was upon Him, and within Him, and around Him, and man could not touch his spirit. That is what God wants to be to us. He first says to Moses, "I will bring you out," and then, "I will bring you in." Ah, God be praised! He has brought many of us out of the unconverted state; but has He brought us into the life of abiding communion? I fear not. Does not all that anxious restlessness, and all that futile effort prove that we have not let God do his work? Do not think that this desire is the stirring of your own heart; that everlasting Divine Magnet is drawing you. These restless yearnings and thirstings, remember, are the work of God; come, be still, and wait upon God; He will reveal himself.

How am I to wait on God? First of all, in your times of prayer; you must take more time to be still before God, without saying one word. In prayer, the most important thing is to catch the ear of Him to whom I speak. Do not offer one petition until you are fully conscious of having secured the attention of God. You need to have your heart filled by the spirit, with the holy consciousness that the everlasting, Almighty God is indeed come very near you. Be still before God; wait, and say, "Oh, God, take possession. Reveal thyself not to my thoughts, or imaginations but by the solemn, awe-inspiring soul-subduing consciousness that thou art shining upon me. Bring me to the place of dependence and humility."

Prayer may be indeed waiting upon God, but there is a great deal of prayer that is not. Waiting on God is the first and the best beginning for prayer when we just all bow in the humble, silent acknowledgment of God's glory and nearness. Then, ere we begin to pray, there will be the very blessing that we often only get at the end. From the very beginning I come face to face with God; I am in touch with the everlasting omnipotence of love, and I know my God will bless me. God help us that nothing may stand betwixt us and Him; that we may never be so occupied with hearing and listening that we forget the presence of God.

Some Account of the Early Experience and Subsequent Travels of Ruth Newlin.

(Continued from page 109.)

Oh! the pangs of sorrow that took hold of my mind that night, I felt that I would be willing to do anything that would bring peace of mind. I could not feel the dear Saviour's love, but only great condemnation until all was brought down and I was ready to renew my covenant with Him. If He would only forgive me I would strive to live a better and more watchful life. And just as the light of another day began to dawn in my room I felt the Saviour's love in my heart beyond describing. I felt that all my sins and transgressions were removed as far as the east is from the west. My joy was to the full. I had a hope I never would stray so far from the Saviour again. I believe I was helped in great measure to keep my good resolutions throughout that winter, and was favored with peace of mind. In the spring of 1840 we moved to the State of Indiana, Hendric Co., on my grandfather's place, very remote from meeting, or, with a very little exception, from Friends. My associates were all of other denominations, yet I did not feel that it would do for me to be anything else than a Friend. I did not feel that it would do for me to use the plural language—no, not one time. They sometimes did not know what I meant until I would explain it to them, which often brought peace for faithfulness in this respect. When we first settled there I thought some seemed rather shy of us. But when they saw we used all alike and kept to our profession, they became very friendly and often inquired about our principles and would sometimes say "they are good," and seemed to have a respect for us because we endeavored in some measure to live up to what we professed.

I worked by the week in different families in the neighborhood, and as there were no meeting-houses near, and the school-houses very indifferent, the country being new, they agreed to hold a union meeting alternately at their houses every week or two, on week-days or night. Consequently it often was held where I was working. I never had attended but one meeting except Friends' meetings, and that one I did not enjoy. I thought it might do for some, but it was not my place of worship. So when I heard of these meetings to be held there I was seized with fear and trembling.

My work was spinning wool on a big wheel, and it occupied the largest room in the house. So when the hour for meeting arrived I had to put by my wheel and sit down with them or withdraw entirely. As the weather was unfit for the latter, I spent the time of meeting in fear and trembling, so much so that I was sometimes noticed by others. I did not feel the peace and quietness I did in our meetings. The contrast between the two seemed very great to me. I did not understand why it was so, but believe I have understood since. If I had not been thus distressed I might not have sought the Lord to know what his will was concerning me, what I was to do or leave undone, and would have been drawn into for-bidden paths and not have filled the place in the Militant Church that was designed by my Heavenly Father that I should fill. I believe the Lord has a design in everything He does; praises be to his holy name forever.

Thus it was with me during the summer of 1840. In the fall I went to work for Moses Mendenhall; his wife was a great sufferer at times. I stayed with them over five months. It was the first family of Friends I had ever worked for. It was very congenial to my tried mind to be with such a heavenly-minded woman and to have the company of so many dear old Friends as came to see her. She had three little children. When I had been in the family six weeks the youngest one died suddenly. It was quite a trial to me, for I was getting very much attached to it. But its mother said, "I have not a tear to shed. It is a little angel in Heaven now, and I may not be far behind it." I did not feel happy as she did, but could not think of much else during the day and night but the uncertainty of time and the certainty of a never ending eternity with the Saviour, Son and Sent of God for man's salvation, or to be cast into eternal woe where is weeping and wailing forever and ever. Very earnest were my petitions that I might be helped, a poor erring creature, to be prepared for the hour of death, which might come in an unexpected moment, as it did to that little innocent babe.

To relieve me of so much care a kind relative had taken the baby home with her and said she would care for it three or four weeks. When one week had passed its mother said, "I want to see little Johnny so bad I wish they would bring him to-night." So he was sent for and when he came, she was so rejoiced over him and said she did not feel like giving him up to go away any more. She asked for him several times during the following day, which was unusual for her to do. The next morning she inquired about him and said, "I think there is something the matter with him." I took him up immediately and found there was. He died in two hours. I looked upon the whole circumstance as rather an unusual one.

While I have been writing this I remembered the peculiar conduct of my little sister, previously mentioned. On the morning of the day that she was taken sick, at two o'clock in the afternoon, I had some business that called me from home a few hours. When I returned she seemed unusually glad to see me and wanted me to hold her and was not willing for me to put her down, not even to eat my dinner. Yet I did so, much against her wishes, and then went to my work a short distance away. In less than two hours a messenger came, saying, "they think Rhoda is dying." I was overwhelmed with sorrow that I did not stay with her. Although she lingered a week she never seemed to recognize any of us again. I marked this down as a lesson never to be forgotten by me. I believe we might save ourselves much sorrow if we would only obey the gentle monitions we are often favored with. In the winter of 1840-41 I felt it to be a duty incumbent upon me when I retired for the night to take a review of how I had spent the day and in the morning to ask my Heavenly Father to help me to watch over my words and actions through the day, and was preserved in great measure just so long as I kept to the practice. It was quite a trial to me, young as I was, to be such long time away from home. The poor invalid was very loath to spare me, and help was hard to get. She repeatedly told me that if I would stay until some other way turned for them she believed I would not lack for some one to care for me when in need. This has verily been the case.

My youngest brother eight months old was taken very sick and I was sent for. I had been in the house only fifteen minutes when I gently ceased to breathe. I now felt at liberty to stay at home, a while at least, to comfort my dear mother, feeling also my health impaired by steady nursing and so much care for one of my age, only fifteen years old (The woman died a short time afterward, peaceful triumph, leaving the request that Ruth Lewis should divide her things among the relatives.)

(To be continued.)

Nuts as Food.

In European countries, particularly France and Italy, chestnuts and other such tree-seeds are consumed in immense quantities by the masses of the population, largely because they are inexpensive, and there is no reason why they should be looked upon in the United States merely as a luxury for occasional use. During the year 1899 we imported 9,957,400 pounds of almonds, valued at $1,222,580, as well as $625,789 worth of cocoanuts, and $879,166 worth of various other nuts.

Thus it appears that even the nuts we eat are largely brought from abroad, though nearly all of them might be produced very easily in this country. It will not be long before all of the cocoanuts we consume are grown on our own native land, inasmuch as plantations of them have been set out in Florida within the last few years, and already there are 250,000 of the growing trees in that State, about ten per cent of them being in bearing now. Naturally, Porto Rico will furnish large quantities of cocoanuts for use in the United States, where the demand for the fruit is steadily increasing.

Dried and shredded cocoanut is a very important article of commerce, and a very large amount of it is already used in this country. The meat of the fresh fruit is both palatable and nutritious, while the milk, iced, is a most delicious drink. Grated, the meat enters into the composition of the famous East Indian condiment, curry, while from the oil is made a beautiful butter which is finding its way to the tables of the poor, as a substitute for olive-margarine. When small and green, the nuts are powdered for medicinal use, being mixed with the oil of the ripe nut for a healing ointment. The milk contains about half as much fat as cow's milk.

Chestnuts are cultivated on a great scale in Europe, particularly in France, where they are the chief morning dish for a large part of the working classes is a preparation made by steaming the shelled nuts and cooking them with milk and salt, the mixture being sold on the streets. Also, these nuts are dried and ground to flour, which may be kept for quite a while, and which, when mixed with water, and baked thin sheets, affords a sweet and nutritious cake. An excellent soap is made from chestnuts, which are likewise utilized as a stuffing for birds, and sometimes boiled and dipped in syrup for a conserve. There is a German dish of chestnuts baked with raisins, and by the well-to-do they are utilized for various side-dishes esteemed as luxuries. In Italy they are substituted for corn-meal in a kind of porridge called "polenta," of which the poorer class are extremely fond, and among the Appennines at cakes of the flour, simply mixed with water, are cooked between hot stones.

Experiments made by the Government experts point to the conclusion that nuts, generally speaking, are not indigestible, despite the popular impression to the contrary. They are apt to be munched at odd hours and on top of hearty meals, when the digestive organs have already been sufficiently taxed, and in this way they have acquired an undeserved reputation for unwholesomeness. Most nuts contain very little water, much fat, and only a small percentage of starch, but to this rule the chestnut is a notable exception, being nearly one-half water and about 43 per cent. of starch, with less than seven per cent. of fat.

Enormous quantities of pecan nuts are now raised in this country, though chiefly by confectioners. This is a species of hickory nut, native to this continent, and not found anywhere else in the world. The finest pecans come from Louisiana, though the bulk of the crop is produced in Texas. They are shipped to New York by the carload, and are there "shucked" by ingenious machines which separate the kernels from the shells in the neatest way imaginable, preserving the former entire. The "meats" sell for from thirty to fifty cents a pound, and one firm disposes of no less than 10,000 pounds of them per annum. Pecan oil makes a very good table oil, and as a lubricant it is used by clockmakers and gunsmiths. It is a fine illuminant, the kernel being so rich in oil that it will burn for a few moments brightly when lighted with a match. Thousands of acres of pecan trees are already under cultivation in the Gulf States, and it is said that an orchard will yield a fortune and a big income for anybody who has patience to wait ten years, until the trees come into full bearing. One full-grown tree will yield two barrels of nuts each season, which will fetch fifteen dollars a barrel at wholesale.

Almonds, while recognized only as a luxury for dessert, find a great market in this country. As already stated, we imported nearly 1,000,000 pounds of them in 1899, and in the same year California produced more than 1,000,000 pounds. One man out in California has two square miles planted in almond trees. They don't do well east of the Rockies, and most of those we get from abroad come from France, Italy and Spain. The almond is a good food, containing as it does twenty-one per cent of "protein," which goes to make good and muscle, together with fifty-five per cent of fat and seventeen per cent of starch. One might live for quite a while on these nuts and retain health and strength. Of course, fat and starch are fuels that keep the body machine going.

The experts say that, speaking roughly, one pound of nut-kernels furnishes one-half as much muscle-making stuff and about the same amount of fuel as one pound of wheat flour. One could live pretty comfortably for some time on English walnuts, which contain sixty-six per cent of fat, sixteen per cent of starch, and seventeen per cent of "protein." They are raising these walnuts on a great scale out in California, last year's output of that State being 8,000,000 pounds. They ought not to be called English walnuts, because they are really derived from Persia, the original home of the peach and apricot. The ancient Romans knew them, and called them "Jupiter's acorns," but they did not reach England until the middle of the sixteenth century. The nuts are dried in the sun, or by artificial heat, great care being used in the process, so that they may keep well and not turn rancid. On Staten Island, English walnuts are grown for pickling and catsup, being picked green for those purposes. Chopped fine and mashed, the ripe kernels make delicious sandwiches. One hundred pounds of them yield eighteen pounds of oil, and it is said that half the vegetable oil used in France is walnut oil—three times the entire quantity of olive oil consumed in that country. A large variety with little meat is prized for its beautiful shells, which are utilized for glove-boxes.

Hazelnuts, otherwise called filberts, are not much used in this country, but in England they are widely cultivated, the county of Kent alone producing 100,000 tons of them per annum. It is thought that they would grow well in the Puget Sound region, and it has been proposed to cultivate there a valuable species, recently found wild in Washington, which though a tree, is so slender as to run along the ground like a vine, each pod containing two nuts instead of the usual one. In parts of Europe filbert kernels are ground to flour, which is used for making bread, and a valuable oil, of which they contain sixty-five per cent, is expressed from them. Along the Black Sea shore of Asiatic Turkey the culture of hazelnuts is most important, the production in the neighborhood of Trebizond amounting to 40,000,000 pounds per annum.

Efforts are being made, through cultivation, to increase the size of various native American nuts, and notable success in this line has been obtained with the "shagbark" and the chestnut. A new kind of black walnut has been found out in Ohio, which is a veritable freak, one-half of the shell being not developed, nor yet the kernel on that side, so that the pear-shaped nut contains only a single "meat." Ordinary black walnuts have a partition dividing them into two compartments, so that it is almost impossible to get the kernels out whole—a point which militates against the usefulness of the nut for market purposes. The freak nut is being tried in cultivation, and it may prove valuable some day.

There is no reason why the Brazil nut should not be extensively grown in the United States, where its cultivation has already been tried successfully. The demand for it is shown by the fact that we imported about $250,000 worth of these nuts last year. Already the pistachio, which is utilized considerably by confectioners, is produced widely though not extensively in the Southern States and in California. The kernel is greenish, and has a peculiar flavor. It is a native of Syria, and has long been cultivated in southern Europe, whence comes the bulk of the product brought to this country.

Butternuts, which are most plentiful in the Ohio River basin, have not the vogue they deserve. They are prolific, single trees often yielding fifteen or twenty bushels. A good many of them are picked half ripe and pickled. Also to be recommended are the "pine nuts" which are a wild crop on the Pacific slope, as well as in Colorado and New Mexico, most of them being harvested by Indians, who roast the cones until they open and release the kernels. Some varieties of these nuts are well adapted for use with dessert or by confectioners.

Peanuts cannot be omitted from a discussion of the food value of nuts, though in reality they are not nuts at all, but a kind of pea. The Government experts find that a quart of peanuts contains as much muscle-making stuff as a pound of rump steak, though costing only one-third the price. The peanut is the cheapest of all foods relatively to the amount of nutriment it contains, having forty-nine per cent. of fat and twenty-nine per cent of protein. The oil, which is one-half the weight of the kernel, is sweet and palatable, and is widely used as a substitute for olive oil. Lower grades of the oil are employed in the manufacture of soap and for lubricating purposes. Ground and added to bread, peanuts make a delicious stuffing for ducks, and they are otherwise utilized in the composition of croquettes, meringue, salad, soup (made like dried pea soup), jumbles, griddle-cakes, muffins and wafers. Peanut butter is already a well known article, and a poor grade of the kernels is converted into "burnt almonds" and peanut candy.—Boston Transcript.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Samuel Tuke—His Life, Works and Thoughts.

(Continued from page 99.)

We come now to a period in the history of the Society of Friends which called for the wisest action on the part of those entrusted with the conduct of its affairs.

The separation in America (1827-8) produced a reaction on both sides of the Atlantic, which for a time seemed likely to imperil the very foundation of Quakerism in an opposite direction; as the doctrinal pendulum has so often swung—from the days of the apostles to the present time.

"The Beacon," edited by Isaac Crewson, was the organ of a considerable number of Friends in England, who practically held the view that the Holy Scriptures were "The Word of God," and the only divinely authorized rule of faith and practice for the Christian church—contrary to the teaching of Fox, Barclay and all true Friends, who, nevertheless, have ever highly esteemed those writings as of Divine inspiration. At such a critical time, 1832-8, Samuel Tuke was clerk of London Yearly Meeting, and by "the exercise of calm judgment, self-possession and impartiality" prevented the most serious consequences which seemed likely to result from trying discussions.

His minutes were frequently "sketched in such perspicuous and sometimes stately English," and with such a just regard for the truth in its various phases, that "men of different lines of thought found their views expressed better than they could have expressed them themselves."

The Yearly Meeting of 1835 appointed a committee to visit Lancaster Quarterly Meeting with a view to restoring harmony. Samuel Tuke was one of this committee, who labored most earnestly and wisely in the interest of peace and unity, but without the desired success, as quite a number separated from the Society in Manchester and other parts of England in 1836.

His letters, during this distressing period, contain some choice expressions, indicating much depth of perception and largeness of vision, e. g., "It is beyond man's power to lay down, as is so often attempted, the true theory of the Divine conduct to man, except in a very general manner. Our circle of vision on earth is far too limited to take in anything like the whole of the grounds of action towards man on the part of Omnipotence, and it is most evident that the Bible affords us no encouragement for this theorizing and systematizing spirit. . . . What is the precise sense in which men who speak the same words respectively use them, what may be the essential agreement between men who use different expressions, and what may be the variety of human understanding in the comprehension of definitions and deductions, it is impossible to ascertain; but the men who love the holy law of God, who walk in his fear and hope in his mercy, are of one faith and serve one Lord.

"This is greater proof and evidence that these men love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, than can be given by all the fair words respecting Him which the mouth can utter." What could be more appropriate to the present time! Each generation can best express its thoughts and convictions in its own own language and uniformity cannot insure unity—the individual growing spiritually, as in every other way, by the free exercise of all the faculties in their proper time and place. Much that is now agitating the religious world, if viewed in the light of history, may be explained as an honest effort to express fundamental truth in the language of to-day, and in harmony with a more comprehensive and tolerant outlook.

The distinctive views of Quakerism have an abiding service in this connection, and are being recognized, with increasing appreciation, beyond our pale; the whole trend of modern thought, in its best expression, being strikingly toward the position so ably defended by Robert Barclay in his "Apology for the true Christian Divinity." Samuel Tuke writes to a friend, "There is a true unity of judgment with the early Friends which is compatible with some diversity of sentiment or expression, and there is a blind acceptance of every opinion and word which they have uttered, which is more out of unity with their spirit and with their great testimony to Christ's teaching than are the doctrines and conduct of some who make no profession with us at all."

"The early Friends were men of like passions and infirmities with ourselves, and though largely enlightened by the Spirit of Truth, they would not, if they were now with us, call on us to depend upon them and their words, but upon Christ alone, as He reveals himself to our understandings and as He is plainly testified of in the New Testament.

"Those who were livingly united to each other in early days did not all see eye to eye in every particular.

"It has been very instructive to me to observe how much of liberty, united with great condescension and decision also there was among them. In imposing no creed or articles of union they did not express indifference to opinions or doctrines, as if they were merely united with each other by a secret sympathy; but relying on the public declaration of their doctrines and practices, in connection with which many of them had been drawn into society with each other, and declaring their hearty acceptance of the Holy Scriptures words of God to man, they left room for as those differences of administration and various measures of natural and spiritual understanding which really exist in the true church of Christ. All the churches of the land had bound themselves by articles, creeds and confessions of faith, by which they tested one another; in refraining from this procedure the early Friends acted in full accordance with the Spirit and conduct of the primitive church.

"The first disciples of the Lord Jesus, though united in one faith, did not exactly accord in all matters; and even the apostles—though so manifestly baptized with the Holy Spirit—did not see alike as to the degree in which the law, or old covenant, was superseded by the new.

"And how teaching is it to our natural dogmatists to read of the conduct of the great apostle Paul towards a weak brother, who did not see the liberty of the Gospel with respect to meats which had been offered to idols."

Under date of Second Month 8th, 1836, in writing to his sister-in-law, S. T. says: "Our little Society is indeed shaken to the root; and the strength and health of its root fibres must be tried. I should not fear at all the storms of this windy day if we were spiritually healthy. The firmest bond of early Friends was not mere doctrinal agreement, but a practical knowledge of the efficacy and comfort of the truth they held. They found a virtue in them which could keep the heart warm in the coldest dungeon, and sustain the body and mind under the severest sufferings. Their search was for peace with God and they found it; and their doctrine arose out of this search and this finding.

"For my own part, I acknowledge that when looking speculatively at religious doctrines, I have often found ample room to cavil with Quakerism; but when my heart has been most deeply in search for the saving knowledge of God and Jesus Christ whom He hath sent, then the accordance of its primary views of Holy Scripture and the dependence of the chief subordinate ones upon these, has appeared fully satisfactory to me.

"The Bible is said to be a very plain book, and so it essentially is; it does not need great human learning or great talents to learn its great truths. Yet it is a deep book, not understood by superficial observers, nor penetrated by mere intellectual power; . . . for the true understanding of it, there is I believe, no platform but that of a lowly humble, earnest, prayerful mind, and no organ by which to discern it but the eye touched by Christ's own finger. . . . I am sick of religious controversy. Would that our earnestness to be like Christ—conformed to Him—bore any considerable proportion to our earnestness on these matters." When reviewing that trying period in after time, we find this memorandum: "When I call to mind the wide diversity of our mental characters and habits, the considerable differences in our views of some parts of Divine truth, the difficult and often painful position in which we found ourselves placed, I cannot but admire the large amount of patience and self-control, of condescension and brotherly love, of uprightness and truthfulness, of candor and fairness, which was exhibited throughout our deliberations, more, am inclined to think, than has often been anywhere seen in the Christian church under like circumstances; and such as would unquestionably have given to any candid spectator a highly favorable impression of the practical influence of Quakerism upon the character and conduct of its adherents."

(To be continued.)

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Am I His, or Am I Not?

This is a query which the young disciple often puts to himself, and which at times cause him anxious thought. I will not, nor could say, having had a little experience of the pilgrim's path, that it is the enemy of souls who always thus disturbs the serenity of the young believer; for Jesus after He had risen, addressed Peter, who once protested his allegiance to his Lord, and as foretold so soon denied that he even "knew the man;" now the Lord thrice queried, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?" "Lord, thou knowest a things; thou knowest that I love thee."

Where then shall I turn for proof to my anxious soul that I do indeed love Him after all? Shall it be to my own faltering steps and my stumblings? If Peter had done this, would he have correctly answered the Lord's query? No! The Lord Jesus had once taught him not to look to himself, nor too intently on his surroundings, when on Galilee's Sea, looking unto Jesus at the word of his command, he fearlessly walked on the stormy water, but his wandering eye gave place to fear. Our watchword is "Praying always," "Looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith" (Heb. xi. 2). We cannot keep ourselves from evil, but kept we must be if we would be his.

A query to the soul identical to this is, "Am I born again into the kingdom of heaven? There are but two spiritual kingdoms, that of God, and that of those out of God, a kingdom of darkness, wherein Satan rules. Kingdom implies, law, rule and power. A man is the servant or subject of whichever power he obey. And subjects love and obey their king or ruler and keep his laws. He who obeys sin, reaps its wages, death. He who obeys righteousness reaps life and glory. The first are the children of disobedience, which all are at first, for "God hath concluded all in unbelief or sin. What for?—that "He might have mercy upon all."

If then I now hate the sin, which once loved, and love the light or grace which it proves the sin, I love the giver of that grace. I truly love God, love his Son, and love the Holy Spirit; and as I obey these reproofs and admonitions of God's spirit, I obey God as Christ and come into the Divine will; and "sin Christ Jesus gives this promised Holy Spirit" all those who obey him" (Acts v: 32; Heb. v: 1), as I am faithful under trial I receive the more, and God seals his children to himself by his Spirit, and this "witnesseth with our spirits that we are the children of God" (Rom. viii: 6); and the apostle John records for our encouragement, "he that believeth hath the witness in himself." The psalmist, like Peter, appealed to God omniscient, saying, "Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting" (Ps. cxxxix: 23, 24).

I may, by the leading of the spirit be poor and weak and empty; were I as I feel myself to be, would not my enemy take advantage of my state to tempt me and draw me into evil? It says Paul, "when I am weak, then I am strong" (2 Cor. xii: 10), and how is this? because those brought into this state are the special objects of God's loving kindness and care, and are purposely brought here to teach them not to trust in themselves as Peter did and fell, but trust alone in Him who only is able to save, and "will save to the uttermost all those who come unto God by him."

God is love, and God is light. Were we not in his, we should not be sensible of his love. Had we not his light and did we not love to see it, we should not see the things we do, nor could we resist the evil, nor would such relief be ours when we slip in word or deed. By this I know that thou favorest me, because mine enemy doth not triumph over me" (Ps. xli: 11).

How simple, short, yet full is Jabez' prayer, "Jabez called on the God of Israel, saying, Oh, that thou wouldst bless me indeed, and enlarge my coast, and that thy hand might be with me, and that thou wouldst keep me from evil, that it may not grieve me." "And God granted him that which he requested (1 Chron. iv: 10).

Be not then anxious over-much. Ever pressing forward, feeling God's preserving power, thy heart warmed in love to Him and to thy fellow-man, more especially towards those who have received the like precious faith; the Lord with thee, He is thy Lord and thou art his, and patiently abiding under every dispensation of His will, the Lord will speak peace to thy soul. "Trust in the Lord. Do good." Dwell in the portion which He has allotted to thee, "and verily thou shalt be fed."

W. W. B.

oiding Bloodguiltiness in Essayng to Fulfil Political Duty.

In volume I. of Theodore Roosevelt's large book "The Winning of the West," after referring to the Christian Indians who had come under the tutelage of the Moravians and who, in 1771, moved out to the then wilderness, northwest of the Ohio, and settled on the Muskingum, where a large body of them were massacred at Madenhutten in 1872, the author continues:

It is a bitter and unanswerable comment on the workings of a non-resistant creed when reduced to practice, that such outrages and massacres as those committed on these defenceless Indians were more numerous and frequent in the colony the Quakers governed than in any other; their vaunted policy of peace, which forbade them to play a true man's part and put down wrong-doing, caused the utmost possible evil to fall both on the white man and the red. An avowed policy of force and fraud carried out in the most cynical manner could hardly have worked more terrible injustice; their system was a direct incentive to crime and wrong-doing between the races, for they punished the aggressions of neither, and hence allowed any blow to always fall heaviest on those least deserving to suffer. No other colony made such futile, contemptible efforts to deal with the Indian problem; no other colony showed such supine, selfish helplessness in allowing her own border citizens to be mercilessly harried; none other betrayed such inability to master the hostile Indians, while, nevertheless, utterly failing to protect those who were peaceful and friendly."

Then referring to their neatly kept villages, with orchards and grain fields on the Muskingum, T. Roosevelt proceeds: "But the missionaries who had done so much for them, had also done one thing which more than offset it all; for they had taught them not to defend themselves, and had thus exposed the poor beings who trusted their teaching, to certain destruction. No greater wrong can ever be done than to put a good man at the mercy of a bad, while telling him not to defend himself or his fellows; in no way can the success of evil be made surer and quicker; but the wrong was peculiarly great when at such a time and in such a place the defenceless Indians were thrust between the anvil of their savage red brethren and the hammer of the lawless and brutal white borderers. The awful harvest which the poor converts reaped had in reality been sown for them by their own friends and would-be benefactors."

The foregoing expressions it will be observed, are altogether in line with the position held by the same author in a passage taken from his "Life of Thomas H. Benton," quoted in "The Friend" of Tenth Month 6th, wherein ruffianism in a community is defended as preferable to the prevalence of a non-resistant policy, i. e. the non-use of deadly weapons in effecting the settlement of alleged grievances. In the matter of Indian retaliations, the author appears to have ignored the essential ground of the red men's wrongs (notably the wicked Walking Purchase) with which Friends had naught to do except to testify against them.

In the Eighth Month of 1898, a letter was received by the writer of this from a valued member and elder of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, expressing a great deal of concern relative to the moral laxity prevailing in the political world, not more on the part of officeholders than of those who, by a singular surrender of manliness and conscientiousness, lift the corrupt and self-seeking ones into place and power. Serious and urgent words of warning needed to be sounded, he believed, against the abounding selfishness and trickery that so made the matter of politics a by-word and reproach against the blind, weak, inconsiderate or conscienceless "acting and voting according to party spirit and feeling, instead of according to the pure dictates of Truth." He queried what Jonathan Dymond may have said upon this subject, that might be helpfully revived at this time.

The subject of the foregoing communication has not been forgotten by its recipient, and, indeed, in the intervening two years, when we consider the low status of public affairs, city, state and national, there seems reason for the apprehension that the political conscience, taken as an entirety, has retrograded in the direction of sensitiveness and of corresponding good endeavor. One extract only from J. Dymond, in which he refers to the abuse of political patronage, I give here as appropriate to the subject of the stimulation of the war spirit which has just been considered: "As to the State, when we consider," he remarks, "how much of patronage in all nations results from the vicious condition of mankind—especially for military and naval appointments—it will appear that much of this class of patronage is accidental also. Take away that wickedness and violence in which hostile measures originate and fleets and armies would no longer be needed; and with their dissolution there would be a prodigious diminution of patronage and of influence. So if we continue the enquiry, how far any given source of influence arising from patronage is necessary to the institution of civil government, we shall find, at last, that the necessary portion is very small. We are little accustomed to consider how simple a thing civil government is—nor what an unnumbered multiplicity of offices and sources of patronage would be cut off, if it existed in its simple and rightful state."*

As a ready illustration, consider the matter of pensions, the result of warring over differences, instead of settling them by the straight forward elimination of wrong, by conciliation, or the process of a pacific tribunal. Here is field for patronage embracing a not inconsiderable army of secretaries, clerks, attorneys, paymasters, etc. Take the government's alliance with the liquor traffic, a traffic involving a direct outlay, it seems safe to say, of not less than a thousand millions of dollars per annum, and opening the way to patronage in the Treasury Department, politically influencing another army of clerks, of internal revenue receivers, deputies, detectives, etc. Reflecting upon the stupendous amount of money involved and the millions of our fellows more or less evilly affected by the business, one is ready to conclude that William Windom, who was Secretary of the Treasury under President Arthur spoke the unrepresed desire of his heart, and from a knowledge of the awful burden of the unholy traffic, when he frankly declared: "Considered socially, financially, politically or morally, the licensed liquor traffic is or ought to be the overwhelming issue in American politics, and that the destruction of this iniquity stands next on the calendar of the world's progress."

JOSIAH LEEDS.

Items Concerning the Society.

Eliza H. Varney, on her return from visiting the Doukhobors in Canada, has been attending meetings in and near Philadelphia and in New Jersey.

The Fourth Annual Reunion of the Westtown Old Scholars' Association was held at Friends' Meeting-house, at Fourth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia, on Sixth-day evening, the 19th inst., between the hours of 6 and 9.30 p. m. Refreshments and social opportunities being most pleasantly enjoyed until eight o'clock, the meeting was then called to order. Reports of committees on the various interests undertaken by the Association were presented in a manner that attracted lively attention, and enlarged the encouragement felt by the friends of the School. These reports were from the Membership Committee, the Treasurer, the Board of Managers, the committees appointed to expend the Old Scholars' Fund in the interests of the Playgrounds, Science and the Museum, the Green-house and Lawn, the Shops and Manual Training, the Scholarships, the Improvements not designated; and the final report from the Centennial Memorial Fund Committee, announcing a total of seventy-two thousand dollars thus far subscribed. These were followed by an address for the Westtown Faculty by William F. Wickersham, the principal; for the Undergraduates, by Lucy M. Leeds, of the Class of 1901; for the Old Scholars, Albert T. Bell; and for the Committee, by one of its former members.

The inward ideal of Westtown life and training received just and discriminating treatment in these addresses, and a truly high and thorough standard of scholarship was upheld, subject to the one overmastering concern of all,—a guarded and faithfully inculcated religious education for our membership, as an important factor in the maintenance of our religious Society on its right foundation, and of the future Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in particular. The effect of the whole occasion seemed to be to bind all in a solid degree of enthusiasm for the good of an institution, of which each Old Scholar was encouraged to feel that he was a constituent and needed part.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS

UNITED STATES.—A message from the Chinese Emperor to the President, delivered to him on the 17th inst., contains the following: "We are extremely grateful to your Excellency for taking the initiative in the withdrawal of troops (from Peking) and for consenting, in the interest of friendly relations, to use your kindly offices between China and the friendly Powers who have been offended on account of the recent unexpected uprising in China. We beg that your Excellency, in the interest of peace and international good relations, will exert your friendly influence with the other Powers toward the complete effacement of all ill-feeling and the speedy determination on their part to negotiate for a peaceful settlement. For this we shall feel unbounded gratitude towards your Excellency, whose good offices we are now earnestly beseeching."

The President's reply to this on the 18th stated: "It has afforded me much pleasure to receive your Imperial Majesty's telegraphic letter of October 14, which has been delivered by your Majesty's Minister in Washington. I cordially share your Majesty's wish that there may be a peaceful settlement of all questions between China and the Powers whose interests and nationals have so grievously suffered wrong in your Majesty's dominions, and that the outcome may be the complete effacement of ill-feeling between them. The desire of this Government that such a settlement may be brought about speedily has been made known to all the Powers, and I trust that the negotiations may begin so soon as we and the other offended Governments shall be effectively satisfied of your Majesty's ability and power to treat with just sternness the principal offenders, who are doubly culpable, not alone towards the foreigners, but towards your Majesty, under whose rule the purpose of China to dwell in concord with the world has hitherto found expression in the welcome and protection assured to strangers."

Russia's determination to pursue a policy independent of the other Powers in China is regarded by Washington officials as a most important development.

The enumeration work of the Twelfth Census is completed and the enumerators are practically all paid. There were 53,000 enumerators and 297 supervisors. The cost of the enumeration will be about $1,200,000. The whole force of the Census Bureau is being concentrated on the work of tabulating the statistics already gathered. The report of the Census Bureau when completed will occupy eight volumes of 1,000 pages each.

The exploration party which went north on the steamer Corwin has returned, and reports the discovery of an immense field of coal near Cape Sabine, on the Arctic coast of Alaska. The grade is what is known as semi-bituminous.

Further conferences between the anthracite coal miners and their employees have taken place, and a satisfactory settlement of the question of wages is hoped for.

A notable feat of modern engineering is the driving of the Great Northern Railway tunnel through two and a half miles of solid granite in the cascade range. Boring was started at each end toward the centre, and so accurate were the engineers' calculations that at the meeting point the difference of alignment was scarcely one inch. This cutting through refractory material was accomplished in forty-five months by 800 men.

The position taken by the United States in reference to China has been in the highest degree gratifying to Russia. A prominent Court personage says: "His Majesty, the Emperor, never omits an opportunity of commenting upon the good spirit of Americans upon all matters in which we have come in contact. Then our relations with the United States Embassy in St. Petersburg are of the pleasantest, and his Imperial Majesty appreciates it very much."

Enormous contracts have been placed in the United States for locomotives, armor plate, warships, tubing for the Baku oil districts, agricultural implements and many products. All such trade is fostered by the friendly spirit which Russia feels toward the United States.

At the national election to be held on the sixth of Eleventh Month 10 parties will be represented by candidates for the offices of President and Vice President, viz., Republican, Democratic, Populist, Silver Republican, Middle-of-the-Road Populists, Prohibitionist, Union Reform, United Christian, Social Democrat, DeLeon Socialist.

The question of spontaneous combustion of hay has recently been investigated by one of the officials of the United States Weather Bureau, who states that fermentation within moist hay may raise the temperature to 374 degrees Fahrenheit, at which temperature clover hay will ignite.

The Trustees of the Board of Education have resolved not to permit in the schools of Chicago the use of a book of selected Bible readings. The selected readings were offered as a substitute for the Bible, which has been barred out by the Board for a number of years.

The Department of Agriculture has estimated that the hurricane of Ninth Month 8th, exclusive of the damage to farm buildings, machinery, &c., has caused a total loss of $5,000,000 in crops, trees and farm animals.

The State of Idaho has segregated 243,000 acres of land on the Snake River near Shoshone Falls, to be reclaimed by canals to be taken out of the river at the head of the canyon leading to the falls. The undertaking will cost $1,500,000. This is the greatest irrigation undertaking ever projected in this State, and one of the largest in the country.

The Kansas wheat crop this year is larger than was ever before grown in one State in a single year. The crop will aggregate 75,000,000 bushels, and is worth on the farms not less than $39,000,000.

The locomotive works of the United States last year turned out 2196 locomotives, valued at about $23,000,000. Of the total number, 480 were sent abroad.

The stamp canceling machine in use in the post-offices can handle from 40,000 to 50,000 letters an hour.

At a recent session of the Lake Mohonk Conference, the Commissioner of Indian affairs stated that there were 267,900 Indians, and 45,000 were provided with subsistence by the Government. He declared ration giving was demoralizing, but must continue until the reservation system was ended.

There are now 2,039 different rural mail routes by which 1,427,300 farmers' families have their mail brought to their doors at least once a day for six days in the week.

There were 366 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 28 more than the previous week and 18 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 183 were males and 183 females: 54 died of consumption; 26 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 13 of diphtheria; 12 of cancer; 11 of apoplexy, and 6 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 10c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.40 to $2.60; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.35 to $3.50; Western winter, straight, $3.45 to $3.60; spring, straight, $3.65 to $3.90; city mills, straight, $3.45 to $3.60.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 72½ to 73c.
No. 2 mixed corn, 44½ to 45c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 28 to 28½c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5¼ to 5½c.; good, 5¼ to 5½c.; medium, 4½ to 5c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4½ to 4¾c.; good, 4 to 4¾c.; common, 1½ to 2¼; spring lambs, 3½ to 6¼c.

HOGS.—Best Western, 7¼ to 7½c.

FOREIGN.—Sun-Yet-Sea the Chinese reformer, and other so-called rebels, have issued a manifesto to the local mandarins of the Yang-tse Valley, denouncing the gross misgovernment of the Manchu dynasty, and promising not to interfere with native converts.

China has submitted proposals to the Powers as basis of the prospective peace negotiations. It is understood that there are five distinct proposals made, and in European diplomatic quarters they are regarded to some extent as fair and reasonable. The most important feature of the proposal, perhaps, is said to be the fact that China recognizes the right of the Powers to insist upon guarantees of her purpose to prevent a recurrence of the trouble, and to demand reparation in the way of punishment of the responsible authors of the outrages, and a proper indemnity. But China does not propose to let the Powers have it all their own way and she, in her turn, is said to insist upon the withdrawal of troops.

An important agreement has been come to between Great Britain and Germany respecting the maintenance of the integrity of China, to which the assent of other European powers and of the United States is requested. One of its provisions is as follows: "Both Governments will not on their part make use of the present complication to obtain for themselves any territorial advantage in Chinese dominion, and will direct their policy toward maintaining undiminished the territorial condition of the Chinese Empire."

A message has recently been sent by the wireless telegraphy system from Boulogne, France, to Dover Court, a distance of sixty miles. The use of tall poles in the transmission of this message was abandoned, the wire receiving the message being elevated only four feet.

The Viceroy of India has said the famine had affected a quarter of the population of India, and that even now 2,000,000 people were receiving relief; that half a million deaths were traceable to the famine, and that the loss of the crops involved the loss of £50,000,000, plus some millions for loss of cattle.

A party of Harvard men, accompanied by Professor Delabarre, of Brown University, who have just returned from Labrador, report the discovery of a great mountain more than a mile in height, which the discoverers name Mount Eliot, for President Eliot, of Harvard.

In view of the presence in Europe of the plague, and the prominent part played by rats in spreading it, the Pasteur Institute in Paris has cultivated a coccobacillus which destroys rats and mice by wholesale.

Count Zeppelin's airship has made another ascent. It was steered against the wind and put successfully through various tacks and manoeuvres. It was then sailed in the direction of Immenstadt. The ship, after a short flight remained poised in the air for forty-five minutes, at height of 600 metres, and then safely descended. Another trial was made on the 21st, resulting in an ascent to the height of five-eighths of a mile, whence it slowly descended.

The steamship Empress of Japan brings news that typhoon at the close of Ninth Month was felt over the entire Japanese group. A vast amount of property ashore and afloat was destroyed, and there was heavy loss of life. Hundreds of houses were blown down, flooded or otherwise destroyed.

A despatch from Constantinople says frightful massacres of Armenians have just occurred in the district Diarbekir. The Mussulmans pillaged, outraged and killed during five days. Eight villages were entirely destroyed.

Booker T. Washington, President of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute for Negroes, announces that officials of the German Government have closed contract with his school to furnish students to introduce cotton raising among the natives in the German colony on the West Coast of Africa. On Eleventh Month 30 a party of students, fully equipped, are to sail.

NOTICES.

Bible Association of Friends in America.

The ANNUAL MEETING OF THE CORPORATION will be held in the Lecture Room of Friends' Select School, 1 N. Sixteenth St., on Fourth-day, Eleventh Month 7 1900, at 8 o'clock, P. M. Friends generally are invited to attend.

WILLIAM T. ELKINTON, Sec'y.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage will run trains leaving Philadelphia 7.17 and 8.19 A. M., and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when requested. Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., twenty-cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, Westtown Station or West Chester, Phone 85.

EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Sup't.

WILLIAM H. PILE'S SONS, PRINTERS
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, ELEVENTH MONTH 3, 1900.

No. 16.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,
No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,
PHILADELPHIA.

South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth.)

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

"CANNOT SPEND HER INCOME."—A statement is passing around that the queen of England has far more income steadily coming in than she can use. Of worldly wealth such income comes to few; but the income of Divine grace which is presented to all, so increases the using, that all obedient expending of seems ever to add more grace, keeping an abounding surplus ahead. It is possible to squander any income of grace by mere neglect; but we cannot spend it by faithful use without receiving "grace for grace,"—grace abounding for grace occupied. "For God loveth a merciful giver, and is able to make all grace abound toward you, that ye always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work" (2 Cor. ix: 8).

As Unknown, and Yet Well Known.

A thoughtful physician of Philadelphia, not a member of our religious Society, was lately conversing with, who has since expressed himself in better as follows:—

"The language of Quakerism is, I believe, a foreign tongue to most minds, yet I doubt whether any other form of faith and teaching is any more efficacious in really elevating the mind and heart.

"It is much easier to read prayers and listen to rhetorical discourse, than it is to look at the truth with a mind open to and searching for it, and willing to wait until it beams upon it.

"I greatly doubt whether the services and offerings emanating from our many churches are productive of any real advancement of the inner faculties. They would, of course, and possibly, sometimes they may turn the mind to a more refined and elevating sphere. I do not say this but I greatly doubt it.

"When one stops to think, it is appalling to realize how little the human mind is affected except by the grosser forms of thought and action; if an idea cannot be presented in physical shape, the average mind refuses to accept it, not, I believe because it cannot, but because it involves too much trouble and perhaps self-restraint."

That the language of Quakerism is "a foreign tongue to most minds" is a serious indictment of most minds, as being themselves strangers and foreigners to the things of the Spirit. Yet this is but a restatement of the apostle's saying, that "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned (1 Cor. ii:14).

What we would mean by "the language of Quakerism" would be the language of the Holy Spirit by his inspeaking Word. The hearing and following of this is the profession of Quakerism. And we hold that this language of the spirit is not really a foreign tongue to most minds; but that it may be said to all who are not past their day of that teaching grace which "hath appeared to all men," that "the word is nigh thee", in thy heart and in thy mouth," that is, the word of faith which we preach." A distinctive mission of our religious Society upon earth has been to call men's attention to this as no foreign speech, but one of which a measure and manifestation is given to all men to profit by. And they who so heed the intimate language of the Divine Word as to profit by it, become his sheep that know his voice and follow Him.

But evidently by the "language of Quakerism" the writer means the actual literature and religious utterances of Friends. These have, indeed, wrapped several spiritual truths and experiences in idioms peculiar to the province of our testimony. Amidst the oldness of their letter, the newness of the spirit may be found in undying dominion.* These modes of expression have been found refreshing and relieving to many minds of others, as from time to time their spiritual walk has reached the like experiences. But it is for lack of submitting to the experiences on the part of most lives, and for lack of spirituality in the prevailing religious teaching of churches, that our spiritual discourse may well appear to the multitude as a quaint dialect, or an unknown tongue.

* "With the controversies of these ancient worthies, or their manner of conducting them according to the spirit of their age, we have now, I apprehend, little or nothing to do. Neither are we called upon to imitate or defend the sometimes obscure and mysterious, or compared with that of the present day, almost absolute tautology of their style. One thing it may be well for us to remember, that from these voluminous works, abounding as they confessedly do, with great redundancy of expression, may be extracted an essence of as pure and sublime truth—if we except the Holy Scriptures and their authors—as ever fell from the lips, or flowed from the pen of man. So that, on the whole, I am inclined to believe the best apology for the writings in question, if indeed they need one, would be an attentive and unprejudiced perusal of them, when they would be found to be their best, and perhaps altogether sufficient expositors."—Jonathan Hutchinson.

As it is possible, however, that we ourselves, beside our foreigners, are responsible for a part of our obscurity to their minds, let us remember that language was not given to conceal or mystify thought or fact, but to make it plain; and that each generation understands best its own language; and it was a distinctive part of the ushering in of the more spiritual dispensation, to cause every man to hear its preaching in his own tongue wherein he was born. If Quakerism has a message to the men of this generation let it be rather the fault of their own unspirituality and not of our uncertain sound, that they do not hear.

The witness of the Spirit is the great certifier, to replace the uncertain sound by the certain message of a certain experience, sight or authority. Determined as messengers or servants to know nothing but Christ and Him crucified, we should be endued with a testimony or preaching which under the demonstration of the Spirit and of power, would be heard. Simplicity and depth will go hand in hand, and the common people, where not yet made obturate, will hear gladly the living truth in its simplicity, as of that which all hearts have in a measure witnessed, or heard whisperings of it as of no foreign tongue to their inward life. In a right dividing of the word there is a proceeding from the known to the unknown, commending it to every man's conscience in the sight of God. An appeal to the witness is of no foreign tongue, but a use of the unlocking key to further openings of the wisdom which is utterable most clearly "among them that are perfect," a wisdom of God, spoken to the less spiritual "in a mystery—even the hidden wisdom, which God ordained before the world unto our glory."

Due simplicity of teaching does not require a lowering of this high and holy standard. Adapting its language to the jargon of the multitude does not adorn the doctrine, but cheapens it. But the gospel truth maintains its highest dignity in a simplicity born of the Truth, and if it has its own way with the speaker, will speak to the condition of those whom it seeks to reach.

The Dukhobors and Legal Authority.

To the Editor of The [London] Friend.

Esteemed Friend:—The communication of W. Tallack in THE FRIEND of the 17th ult., while claiming to give nothing more than the opinions of Russian and other representative men of various European countries, may convey an erroneous idea to some readers of the loyalty of the Dukhoborts to legal authority. The Russian Government being upheld largely by force, it can consistently claim the aid of its subjects to supply the power by means of armed men for its support. Aside from Christianity, this may be a just claim from a political point of view; but when considered in the light of Christ's teaching it becomes a question of religious principle. As an autocratic power that Government combines a Church and all ecclesiastical authority with the civil and military administration, claiming from its people conformity to a worship, and rites in which those enlightened by the Spirit of Truth cannot participate. Thus is formed a company of persons who, from conscientious conviction, are antagonistic to the law to the extent of non-compliance with its requirements.

This appears to have been the position of the Dukhoborts. Their steady adherence to a course of non-resistance, and rejection of priestcraft and its attendant forms and superstition, placed them in opposition to their rulers, an opposition which was limited to a patient refusal to participate in the transactions which their consciences disallowed, a course widely different from the destructive violence of anarchism.

An incident related by W. F. McCreary, Commissioner of Immigration in the northwest territories of Canada, of which he was a witness, is a striking proof of the Dukhobors' fidelity to his profession. One of the fraternities was walking in the streets of Winnipeg when a drunken ruffian meeting him struck him with his fist in the face. The Dukhobor showed no resentment to this provocation; nor again when the outrage was repeated. The assailant was arrested on the interference of the Commissioner.

In the course of a visit to all the villages of these people in the northwest provinces recently completed, there was found ample evidence of their earnest Christian intention to hold fast the faith which has made them conspicuous confessors to the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus.

Thy friend,

JONATHAN E. RHODES.

CLEMENTON, New Jersey, 17th 9mo., 1900.

THE HAWK AND THE TERRAPIN.—A man in South Carolina was out in his cornfield one day when he noticed a hawk making peculiar circles, and concluded to watch it. There were high weeds just under the hawk, and the bird would descend within a few feet of the ground, make an unusual noise and then fly off. This was kept up for sometime, when finally the hawk lit in the grass and commenced fluttering. The farmer hurried to the spot and found the foot of the hawk tightly fastened in the mouth of a dry land terrapin. The hawk was killed, and its wings measured four feet from tip to tip. Many a man made to soar aloft in the upper world has been caught by the land terrapins of appetite and passion through his own folly. The hawk risked himself once too often in dangerous proximity to the terrapin's trap-like mouth. So men, knowing the danger of sin, but presuming on their wings, dally with evil temptations till they are caught and destroyed.—L. A. Banks.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Samuel Tuke—His Life, Works and Thoughts.

(Continued from page 118.)

The way in which Samuel Tuke met the doctrinal difficulties of some who withdrew from the Society sixty or more years since, brings out many expressions of heavenly and practical wisdom.

As these subjects remain perennially to engage the serious consideration of those who are vitally interested in and concerned to "hold fast a form of sound words" and at the same time to experience the substance of their faith, some extracts are made from his letters written about this time (1835-39).

The desirability of "holding the truth in an even balance" is nowhere more needful than in the supplementary relation between faith and works—both being equally essential to salvation.

The Protestant Reformation emphasized the Scripture declaration "The just shall live by faith" while Quakerism added its corollary, "Faith without works is dead." Samuel Tuke says "Salvation must be by faith; for without faith it is impossible to please God; and under the Christian dispensation it is by faith in Christ, the one Mediator, and the only propitiation for sin; but salvation is not uniformly spoken of in the New Testament as dependent on faith alone. Take, for example, that striking passage, Titus iii: 4-7. The whole work is there included. The foundation of all is the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man appearing."

"With regard to the proper encouragement and regulation of the ministry he wrote to one who withdrew from the Society owing to supposed suppression of spiritual gifts: "I quite agree with thee in the position that in a really healthy state of the Christian Church there would be a wide door open for the various services of the members. In fact that there would be amongst the members a true sympathy with the spiritual mind in each other, and that all the fruits which flowed from it would be acceptable. Whilst there would be no quenching of the spirit, nor despising of prophecy in however humble or unusual a form the gifts might appear, there would be a quick perception of individual deviations from a right spirit, and of those simulations which, to a greater or less extent, have been the usual accompaniments of a lively state of spiritual religion. There would be found checks wanted on the forwardness of the natural man who would mix (and think to improve) things heavenly with things earthly.

"There would be fathers and mothers not only to foster, but to check, and to many minds, in the early stages of religious experience, the latter is no less important than the former."

When writing to his daughters, Maria and Priscilla, on the subject of prayer (which was then as it is now) insisted upon by some as a regular duty, Samuel Tuke says: "It is far more important that the heart should breathe toward God its inmost desires than that words should be uttered. If the way of true prayer has in any degree been clogged by misapprehension relative to the influence of the Spirit the way has also, I fear, been much perverted by not sufficiently recognizing that influence as the true preparation for every act of the service, and by introducing systematic methods which I believe sadly interrupt the free course of the Spirit. . . . We may very rightly consider whether our minds are sufficiently awakened, our mercies and our wants, and the natural dulness of our minds may be stimulated by these considerations and meditations as well as by the devout reading of Holy Scripture."

To his sister-in-law, then about resigning her right of membership, he answers her objections to some doctrines of our early Friends, viz: "The more I investigate their writings and studied their character and the more I sought to be guided in the ways of truth, the more I became satisfied of these substantial points: First, as to the sound Christian principles, and secondly, as to the importance of those views by which they were distinguished from other Christian professors of their day." He vindicates the doctrine of the "Inward Light" admirably as the direct influence of the Divine upon the human spirit—"awakening, convicting, reproof, and, therefore, acting as a light in the heart which truly men do well to mind." As to the need of joining another sect in order to walk more closely with Christ he asks, "Is there any hindrance amongst us to thy entire dedication to God? Is thy access to Him closed by any human agency? and mayest thou amongst us love and believe in the Lord Jesus in sincerity?"

"We have never maintained that our worship is essentially a worship without vocal utterance, but only that vocal utterance is not essential to worship, and that no vocal utterance is acceptable but that which is prompted by the living power of God which worketh in both to will and to do his own good pleasure. But is not silence a likely preliminary to the prayer and praise of the heart, whether vocal or not? and though there may be much needless silence among us, Oh! who can measure or count the number of lifeless words which are uttered in other places! No one that I know of ever attempted to convert the heart by silence, though it might be more useful than some attempts which have been made.

His sentiments on the exercising of charity toward those who may differ from us is thus expressed. . . . "There is a low feeble spirit which, under the guise of charity would compromise truth; but there is also a harsh though earnest spirit which under the guise of zeal for the Truth would narrow bounds, circumscribe its operations, and which, in seeking to pluck up the tares, would destroy much of the wheat also. These states have ever been the Scylla and Charybdis of the church, and never has its course been more to be lamented than when it steers itself professedly by the point of strict unity. Thou wilt say there is a true line, and I fully admit it, and that the Spirit of Christ leads into it. In that line is found his holy firmness with his condescending gentleness, his ardent zeal with his still more intense love; but thou ve doubt not that a measure of Christ's Spirit is given to those who truly seek it, to enlighten and direct them, does not our observation of the history of good men, in past and present times teach us how much need we have of caution, lest something of our own bias mislead us? and never are we more in danger of being brown off our guard than when we seem to have a plain and important good before us; rich, for instance, as the unity of the church. The insidiousness of self cannot be too much borne in mind; and if in any degree a false fear of hurting a brother has let down the cause of truth amongst us, let us remember that there is an opposite error which it is equally needful to avoid. I do not think there is weakness (except so far as it belongs to the frailty of man's condition) in the keeping in mind that we are responsible to have our own feelings mixed with those from a better source; that we have a treasure of Divine things in earthen vessels, and that there are no cases in which we have more need to pause than when we are ready to say in regard of an honest-minded brother, 'Master, forbid him, for he goeth with us.'

Again we find Samuel Tuke addressing his daughter Maria on a vital subject, as she had opened the way for it, viz. "It is very possible to have a sentimental perception of the beauty of the Divine character of Jesus, and to present to the mind in the most lively way the tragedy of his suffering and death, and yet not be truly his disciple. The right appreciation of his character and his sufferings is, I believe, to be found in the humble path of dedication to Him; and what is the way of dedication that of yielding to the convictions of his Spirit? I know too well that the way to have faith weak is to be unfaithful, and I am sure that faithfulness to the convictions of his Spirit is the way to increase in faith, in knowledge, and, above all, in love. How soon times will come when to know that we do nothing to Christ will be worth infinitely more than all the world!"

(To be continued).

PAINTING HER OWN PORTRAIT.—"If I could paint such an old lady as that, so beautiful, so sweet, and lovable, I shouldn't mind being old," said a young girl the other day, speaking of a white-haired visitor who had just departed.

Well, if you want to be that kind of an old lady you'd better begin making her right now," laughed a keen-witted companion. "She won't strike me as a piece of work that was done in a hurry; it has taken a long time to do her what she is. If you are going to do that sort of a portrait of yourself to be shown to the world, you'd better be mixing the colors now."

The merry words were true; and, whether he willed it or not, the girl was already painting the colors for her portrait and drawing away by day the outlines of the mature wood which shall yet brighten or darken the eyes round her. Many a careless, selfish girl has in her inmost heart no higher ideal than to be "like mother" when she shall have reached mother's years; but in the meanwhile she content to be as unlike her as possible. It is as an idea that age brings its graces with it, that a beautiful character comes like a flower, naturally and without effort.

Girls, you are outlining your future and choosing its coloring now. The woman you wish to be must begin in the girl.—Forward.

"In Season, Out of Season."

A fashionably-dressed young woman sat in the parlor of a New York hotel waiting for her husband. She was alone, and her eyes were rapidly devouring the pages of a freshly-cut novel.

A small, white-haired man with a plain, sweet face, entered the room and stood for some moments unobserved, intently watching the reader; then suddenly going up to her, he boldly but courteously addressed her, rebuking her for her folly, and charging her to take up the holier mission God had purposed for her.

Angered by what she thought to be his impudence, then startled by the sternness of his message and held by the saintly illumination of his face, she sat without word or motion till he finished his appeal, and quietly left the room.

"Oh, Henry," she cried, as her husband entered, "there has been the funniest old man here you ever saw;" and she described and mimicked him with great gusto.

"Impudent old crank!" said the husband; "you should have ordered him out of the room. I am astonished that you should so far forget your dignity as to listen to his fanatical dribble."

"Henry—it is all true, every word that he said," cried the wife, suddenly throwing aside her mask of merriment and melting into tears. "He wasn't at all impudent, only brave—and—sincere. I can't forget what he said. I wish I could, but I can't."

So far from forgetting the message so unconventionally thrust upon her attention, she yielded to its call, and within a few months the eccentric but faithful and God-sent minister received into his little flock both husband and wife, with the reasonable belief that they had become humble and sincere Christians.

A Christian man was once on a journey that took him afoot through a village he had never before entered. As he passed along one of its streets his eye was caught by a carpenter who was shingling the roof of a house. Instantly the traveller felt a call to go up and speak to the workman on the subject of religion, and, fearing lest he prove disobedient to some "heavenly vision," he turned up the walk and mounted the ladder.

After the exchange of pleasant greetings the Christian began to inquire kindly concerning the carpenter's spiritual condition, but, strange to relate, this man who would have conversed freely and amiably on any other subject within the range of his intellect from thunder-storms to thistles, now turned upon his companion in great rage, firing off a volley of oaths and threatening to hurl him from the roof if he did not take himself off without further parley. Upon this the pilgrim, having lightened his conscience, bade the carpenter a friendly "good-bye" and went cheerfully on his way.

Many years after, this same man, while travelling through a city in western Maine, was hailed by a stranger who grasped his hand with the warmth of an old friend, and inquired earnestly;

"Don't you remember me?"

"I can't say that I do, friend," returned the other.

"Why, don't you remember some twenty years ago of travelling through the village of —?"

"Yes, I remember that very well; but I wasn't acquainted with anybody there."

"No, maybe not; but don't you remember going by a house with a man on the roof shingling? and how you went up and spoke to him and—?"

"Oh, yes," returned the other, "I never shall forget that; I think he was the maddest man I ever saw. Poor fellow! I have often thought of him, for I believe the hand of the Lord was heavy upon him at that very moment."

"Indeed it was," returned the stranger, "for I was that very man. I could never forget your face or your words. You haunted my workbench and my bedside, and your warning inquiry rang in my ears even in my sleep, till I turned from my wickedness and called upon God to have mercy upon me, and He did—even upon me. God sent you up that ladder. Wonderful to think upon! the great omnipotent One, with worlds upon worlds hanging on his hands, stooped to send you up a ladder to save me!"

"O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God," repeated the other with a radiant face. "How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor? or who hath first given to Him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of Him, and through Him and unto Him are all things. To Him be the glory forever. Amen."

F. B. D.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A MEDITATION.

Oh, how I would delight to find
A season of repose,
On meadow lands this side the banks,
Where death's dark river flows.
Here calmly wait the time that brings
The humble their reward,
And feel each anxious, toilsome step
Is ordered of the Lord.

As I awoke one morning recently, a little before daylight, which is my usual time to begin my morning rounds, and reflecting on my toilsome, isolated situation, far separated from my friends and the Society that I dearly love, and arranging some of the preceding thoughts in measured numbers, the following lines of John Newton, that I met with for the first and last time some thirty or forty years ago, were presented to the view of my mind with a portion of life and light, viz:

I asked for terrestrial rewards and renown,
I asked for the glory that blesses the brave,
I asked for the palm-branch, the robe, and the crown;
I asked and He showed me his cross and a grave.
Subdued and subjected at last to his will,
My hopes and my wishes I fain would resign.
Oh, give me a heart that can wait and be still,
And know not a wish nor a pleasure but thine.

There are mansions exempted from sin and from woe,

But they stand in a region by mortals untrod.
There are rivers of bliss, but they roll not below;
There is joy, but it dwells in the presence of God.

Ninth Mo. 10th, 1900.

William Taylor and the Infidel.

At one of the camp meetings of that season a man of mature age and commanding presence followed me from the stand where I had been preaching that morning, into the preachers' tent and sat down beside me; next to me on the other side sat Brother Willis, an able young minister. The stranger unceremoniously commenced a bitter tirade against Christianity and the Bible, and talked flippantly about the immutability of law, hence the impossibility of miracles. I sat quietly without a word of reply till he was through. He had raised more than a dozen debatable issues. Brother Willis was in a fidget, and said to me afterward, "I did not see how you could sit quietly and hear such a slanderous misrepresentation of God and his Gospel."

Willis was a gentleman, and would not interrupt the prater, as his address was directed entirely to me.

"Well, you see how I fixed him?" said I.

"I do, indeed; and I see that was just the thing to do."

When the fellow had ceased and silence ensued I said, "Well, my friend, there is one point on which we can agree."

In apparent surprise he inquired, "What point is that?"

"We mutually concede the fact that there is a standard of right, a law of righteousness, by which the conduct of human beings, both in their relation to God and to each other should be regulated. We may not agree as to the precise lines of its application, nor the source whence nor the medium through which it comes to us, but we do mutually agree that such a law exists, and that we are amenable to it."

"O, yes, I agree with you on that point."

"Then allow me to ask whether with undeviating fidelity through all the vicissitudes of your past life you have kept that law?"

He colored and coughed and tried to evade my point, but I looked straight into his eyes and said, "Have you?"

Then, after a pause of a few moments, he replied, "Well, sir, to tell you the truth I must admit that I have not."

"Then what are you going to do about it? You have been most positively asserting the immutability of law, and now you admit that you have been an habitual breaker of an immutable law. What can the law do for a law-breaker?"

I proceeded to show him that all human attempts to repair the breach by reformation or penance or compensation were entirely inadequate and irrelevant, and that if the Bible did not, through the incarnation, death, resurrection and mediation of the Son of God reveal a ransom and a remedy adequate to the demands of the case there was none. No human court can righteously acquit a guilty criminal, but, however incomprehensible the mystery, the fact is clearly revealed in the Bible that God can "be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus," and will freely forgive and acquit every poor sinner who will confess and forsake his sins, and receive and trust Jesus Christ as an all-sufficient Saviour. "As many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God." This free gift implies a Divine act of acquittal at the bar of justice, a Divine communication of the fact to the spirit of the penitent believer, and a Divine inward renewal of the heart.

The man sat quietly while I kindly opened up these facts verified in human experience. He finally said, "I have never experienced any such thing, and therefore can't believe that there is any such experience possible."

"You have no experience of life in California," I replied. "You have never been there, and conclude, therefore, that there is no such country in the world. I have spent over seven years in California, and testify to what I have experienced and know to be facts. Would you go before this great camp meeting congregation and contradict my statement of facts on the ground that you had never seen California and knew nothing about it?"

Just then the bell rang announcing the hour for the afternoon public service, and I bade my man a good-bye and took my seat on the preacher's stand. About half an hour afterward I felt a gentle jerk of my coat skirt, and looking round I saw my man close in the rear of the stand. The public service had opened, so there was not a word uttered by either of us, but he handed me a letter and turned away, and being but a passing stranger in that region I never saw him again. The letter read substantially as follows:

"Rev. Taylor—Dear Sir: Your convincing arguments have covered all my points, and your kindly spirit has quite overcome my foolish prejudice against God's truths. My wretched infidelity! I am ashamed of it, and do and shall forever abandon it."

Beneficial Bacteria.

So much is said of the disease-producing bacteria that people as a rule are apt to forget the large classes of bacteria that are of direct advantage to mankind. The chemical change in food which must take place to insure digestion is similar to that which bacteria produce in our food, hence it is reasonable to infer that inasmuch as the digestive organs are crowded with bacteria, these bacteria may assist in the digestive process. Experiments on chickens lead to the conclusion that this is so, besides this the useful bacteria furnish us with our vinegar; they probably develop the flavor of vanilla and chocolate; they furnish the "gamy" flavor of meats; they give the delicious flavor of butter; they give the characteristic flavor of all kinds of cheese; they account for the different flavorings of all kinds of wines, cider, etc. Altogether the field of the useful bacteria appears even larger than that of the deleterious, and no doubt we are now only at the beginning.

Prof. Norton says, in the "Popular Science News," "it should be borne in mind that microscopic life is in the main, beneficent to humanity; that the varieties associated with disease are comparatively few, by comparison with the others, and, that in the case of the bacteria that have been definitely identified with specific diseases, it has never been satisfactorily demonstrated that they are the cause, and not the product, in such cases. Although some facts are positively known in bacteriology yet the conclusions drawn from them are mainly conjectural, and in this, as in other fields, it is not at all unlikely that the next generation will see the present teachings thrown out, and a general recasting of theories."

Monsters Domesticated Anciently in Southern Patagonia.

The most remarkable discovery that has been recorded up to date regarding primeval men is announced on such authority as to be entirely beyond cavil or charge of sensationalism. It is that natives of Patagonia, savage or semi-savage, did, some thousands of years ago, keep in captivity and domesticate, for their meat and possibly for their milk, certain gigantic sloths nearly related to the extinct megatherium. To prove the fact, Dr. A. Smith Woodward, a well-known English investigator, and Dr. Moreno of the national museum of Argentina, have laid before the Zoological Society of London, specimens of the bones and hide of the animals, which were found in ancient stone walled stables unmistakably such together with great stores of cut hay, (the latter being obviously fodder for the beasts, the shoulder-blade of a man and implements of human manufacture.

The animal in question, to which the name "grypothorium," or "griffin-beast," has been given, was much like the megatherium, but only about half the size. It was about as big as two large oxen, measuring perhaps ten feet from the snout to the tip of the tail, and weighing three thousand pounds, maybe exceeding stupid and clumsy; it was so sluggish of movement that one might easily imagine a whole day expended in leading it to the water of near-by stream and another day consumed leading it back. It is probable, however, that water as well as food was brought to its pen. Certainly it is impossible to conceive of a domesticated brute more uncouth and strange. It was covered with long yellowish hair, considerable quantities of which were found in the "stables" aforesaid, together with such accumulations of droppings as proved its confinement.

Incredulous of some of the facts reported by Dr. Nordenskiöld, the famous naturalist and traveler, made a trip recently to Last Hope Inlet, in southern Patagonia, near which the remains were discovered, and investigated the matter for himself. He came back convinced bringing with him an additional piece of "grypothorium" hide, together with a few claws of the animal. Since then Dr. Rudolph Hauthausen, geologist of the LaPlata Museum, has made further excavations on the spot, and has obtained many bones of the beasts, which were in such a remarkably fresh state of preservation that they only very slightly discolored and had lost none of their gelatine appearance. Remnants of cartilage, dried ligaments, shrivelled muscles were found attached to them in some cases.

The reason for the excellent preservation of the remains was simply that the natives domesticated the huge sloths, built the pens for them (in this instance at all events) in a cavern, where there was an exceeding dry climate. Some of the bones were so white that they did not look as if they had been buried at all. Caves, as is well known, commonly afford conditions most favorable for the dry-keeping and safe-keeping of animal skeletons, much of the knowledge possessed by scientists respecting the earlier fauna of the earth has been furnished by these natural places of preservation. All of the material unearthed in this case has been obtained by digging beneath or of an enormous chamber, which seems to have been enclosed formerly by rude walls built of rough stones. The enclosure was in the shape of a stable or corral, in which the "griffin beasts" were confined, and in one corner of it was discovered the great store of hay, evidently cut by the natives for forage. . . . It was a short-legged, shapeless, ungainly creature, with four toes on each of its front feet and three toes on the hind feet. It fed on grasses and the leaves of trees, which latter were frequently uprooted, it being enormously strong, and one of its peculiarities was an arrangement of little bony processes put together like the stones of a pavement beneath its skin. These ossicles are irregular in shape and size, but in some parts were set in parallel rows and were symmetrical. They may have served to some extent the purpose of a coat of armor, the beast being incapable of running away and possessing no weapons of defence except its claws. Very likely the tiger already mentioned was its most deadly and dreaded foe. It will be remembered, perhaps, that some years ago, footprints of supposed giant men were discovered in the neighborhood of Carson City, Nev. They were very interesting until it was ascertained that in reality they were fossil tracks of the "mylodon," an extinct species of sloth slightly bigger than the "grytherium." The footprints had been made mud thousands of years ago, and the mud had hardened into rock, thus preserving them. There seem to have been three species of giant sloths on this hemisphere in ancient times. One, which was much the largest, now known as the megatherium, ranged from Patagonia as far north as Virginia, though occurring in the United States only in a small tract from Florida up. Another was the "mylodon," which ranged from Patagonia up through our western States into Oregon. Finally there was the "grytherium" which appear to have been exclusively South American. These beasts were much like modern sloths, except that they were of enormous size and had long tails. If, as would seem to be the case, the primitive Patagonian succeeded in domesticating one species of the mighty brutes, it was certainly a wonderful achievement. Apparently they utilized both the hair and the hide for some purposes, but there is no evidence that they tanned the leather the pieces found in the cavern near Last Hope Inlet showing no signs of such a process. Rene Baehre in Boston Transcript.

THE USE OF TRACTS.—A man stepped into a horse-car in New York not long ago, and before taking his seat gave to each passenger a little card bearing the inscription, "Look to Jesus when tempted, when troubled, when in danger." One of the passengers carefully read the card and put it in his pocket. As he left the car he said to the driver, "when you gave me this card I was on my way to the ferry intending to jump from the boat and drown myself. The death of my wife and son had robbed me of all desire to live, but this card has persuaded me to begin life anew. Good-by, and God bless you!" We adore the kind of Providence that led Philip to cross the path of the Ethiopian at the very moment when he was needed, but we forget that the like thing occurs every day. There is no such thing as chance in God's world, and those who seek to be led by the Spirit often find themselves messengers of mercy to some weary soul.—Parrish Visitor.

Some Account of the Early Experience and Subsequent Travels of Ruth Newlin.

(Continued from page 116.)

As time passed on I allowed my mind to be more taken up with temporal things and often felt condemned for the same. Yet I tried to console myself that I was young and that many older than myself did not seem to be so watchful, that I might live to be old, and there would be time enough to think about religion in time to come. So little by little I gave way to listen to the grand deceiver of mankind. So much so that I did not care to look over the day when I retired at night or keep a very close watch over my words and actions. I was naturally a lover of merriment which would be called innocent in the eyes of the worldly-minded. Yet I was so followed up by Divine goodness that after spending an afternoon in company with light and frivolous conversation I felt so heavy-hearted I could not enjoy myself, and wished to be alone to bemoan my condition and my disobedience to Him who had dealt so mercifully with me and was yet striving with me to bring me nearer to himself. As his mercies were not sufficient to break my stubborn will He was pleased to send the rod of affliction. I was taken down very suddenly with winter fever in a severe form, and was soon alarmingly ill. My mother said to me that I was very sick and asked if I felt ready for death, if that should be my portion. I said I had not been as thoughtful as I should have been, I had been too thoughtless, and laughed and talked too much. From that time I became very anxious about my soul's salvation both night and day.

I could acknowledge that in days past and gone the Lord had spoken peace to my now troubled, tossed and disconsolate soul, and that He had not forsaken me, but I had lived in forgetfulness of his great mercy to me, a poor unworthy creature. For some time I was very anxious to get well, for I knew I was not fit for Heaven and happiness. I resolved that if my health was restored, I would endeavor to live nearer than I had done. Thanks be to the ever adorable name of my God; after I had suffered enough for my transgressions He was pleased again to speak peace to my almost, as I thought, lost soul. Yet even then I could not unreservedly say, "Not my will, O Lord, but thine be done." I had faith to believe He would not take me out of the world in an unprepared state. I soon began to recover and in a few weeks was restored to nearly my usual health, for which I felt very thankful; and was still favored with a calm and peaceful mind. The time had now almost arrived that I expected to be joined in marriage with Phineas Newlin, a brother of Ruth Mendenhall, whose acquaintance I had made while living with her. One day she called me to her bedside and said, "I want to tell thee what I have been thinking about for some time past, and it has made such an impression on my mind, I think it right to tell thee. I feel like it will be right some day for Phineas and thee to take each other in marriage. I shall not live to see it accomplished, but leave this much for thee to think about."

I was so astonished I had no reply to make for I knew she had no outward evidence that it would be so. A similar impression had been very unexpectedly made on my mind some time before, which I was sure was no imagination of my own getting up. He also had the same impression, and I never could call it in question but that in Divine Providence we were called together, although he was so soon taken from me and many trials strewn my pathway. Our marriage was accomplished Fourth Month 14th, 1842, at Mill Creek Meeting, in Hendricks Co., Indiana. A remarkably solemn feeling came over my mind just as I uttered the last sentence in the ceremony. "Until death shall separate us." And I thought afterward, "No wonder, for the time was short till death did separate us"—only nine years, four months and fourteen days.

We were now very happy, believing that what we had entered into had the Divine approbation. But, O, how soon did my affections run more on the gift than on the Giver, my great Deliverer, who had rescued my soul in distress and had bestowed so many favors on me. I also began to conclude I would take a little more liberty in dress and be more like those I now associated with. With very little exception I had always been satisfied with the privileges my dear parents thought best to allow me. And, too, I often thought I ought to be an example for the younger children, and by so doing make the burden lighter for them who had endeavored to bring us up in a manner becoming members of the religious Society of Friends. But now I thought I was some miles away from them, perhaps it would not be noticed so much by them.

So I gave way little by little, until I lost the sweet peace and favor of God before I was fully aware of it. The things of the world had gained quite an ascendancy over me. I do not believe religion consists in dress, but I do believe it is often as a hedge around us, especially in our youthful days. And as I gave way in this respect, a door was opened for departure in something else; so I became very indifferent about religion or good reading. I would go to meeting on First-day, but would much rather stay at home in the middle of the week and work, and sometimes I did. My husband was a religious young man, and had been much concerned about his soul's salvation since his thirteenth year. He would say, "let us go to meeting together, and I believe we shall lose nothing by it." If I did not go he would go alone, and then I would feel sad because I had not gone, but consoled myself that when we had more of the comforts of life about us I would then try to be more faithful in the attendance of meeting.

So time passed on and when I did go I felt that I was like the door on its hinges: I went and came the same. So full of idle thoughts, wandering hither and thither, and when we came home on First-day if we did not have company I would rather have taken up some work to do than hear my dear husband read in the Bible or some other good book, as was his practice to do, for which I at that time had lost my relish. I was very careful not to let him know my feelings, for I knew it would grieve him. It seemed to trouble him that I had altered my dress, and he asked me how it was that I could be satisfied with it when I had discouraged him from changing the cut of his coat before we were married. I felt it was a kind rebuke, and if I had not already worn some of the other kind, I would have gladly changed back to my former dress. But I feared the remarks of others too much to do so.

One day when alone I was unexpectedly reminded that I had not kept the covenant I had made with my Heavenly Father when I was so low with the fever, notwithstanding I had been restored to good health, and a kind companion given me. I had not endeavored to live near Him as in former days, but had let the things of time have the uppermost seat in my heart. While in this condition I was assailed with a great temptation: that I could not keep my vows and it would be better never to make another, and the longer I lived the greater sinner I would be. So the best thing I could do would be to take my own life. This seemed so awful I trembled at the thought, yet I concluded it must be so. I dwelt upon it day and night until my appetite was gone and sleep departed from me. My husband tried to cheer me, but I told him he could do nothing for me—that I should be better in a few days, but instead of getting better my mind became more clouded, yes, blind to all good. And the suggestion was often presented to my mind, that the longer I put it off the worse it would be. I had no strength, no faith, no desire to call upon the Lord for help. I seemed to be left to the will of the tempter. My pen cannot describe one-half the anguish of those dark days. One First-day, after we returned from meeting, my husband as usual got the Bible and read aloud, while I cleared away the dinner. I knew but little of what he read. My thoughts were foreign to the precepts of the Bible. The temptation was presented with double force, to commit the contemplated deed while he was busy reading and would not miss me until all would be over. Never thinking that the horrid deed would be the worst sin I ever committed, and then there would be no chance for forgiveness. It makes me shudder to this day when I remember how near my poor soul was captivated by the grand deceiver of mankind, a liar and the father of lies. Holy Father, I thank thee for thy great mercy to me in that trying hour, that thou didst not suffer the devil to overwhelm, but set bounds to his evil design. After I had prepared myself with a hank of flax thread of my own spinning, O, I thought if I only was as happy as when I spun that thread. Then the thought came that I never could be again. I stepped to the door but turned to take a last look at my husband, who did not notice what I was doing. Just then some young Friends and relatives came in to spend the evening with us. I could not be cheerful as on former occasions, and they inquired if I was sick. I did wish I could be clear of such a great distressing cloud. By little the temptation wore off for a few days, then returned with as much power as before.

My husband was quite a distance from the house plowing, when it occurred to me that now was the best time I would get.

I tried to reason it away; it would be such a dreadful shock to him. But the enemy told me that I was not getting any better and time was passing and it was no use for me to try any longer, for I was getting worse all the time, and now was the time. I shut the door and started toward the stable, when I heard a noise and looking around saw my husband coming. He said he was so uneasy he came to the house to see if I was sick, and insisted on knowing what was the matter, I looked so pale. I declined telling him, thinking it would distress him so; when all at once my eyes were opened to see that it was all the devil's work, and that there was still a chance for me to be saved the same as other sinners. God had permitted all this to come upon me because of my unwatchfulness and almost forgetfulness of his great mercy, which so contrited me that I burst into a flood of tears. But for Divine interposition in that hour of extreme danger, I should have been lost forever and ever.

(To be continued.)

"The Bravest are the Tenderest."

It is remarkable how many great men have been noted for their interest in birds and beasts. We have seen how devoted Scott and Dickens were to their pets. Daniel Webster's dying request was that his beloved cattle might be driven by his window, so that he might see them once more. Abraham Lincoln often went out of his way to do a kindness to some weak or suffering creature. A great German poet so loved the birds that he left a sum of money with the request that they should be fed every day on his grave.

Thoreau, who has written many beautiful books about nature, had a great love for the little wild creatures of the woods, and they in turn loved and trusted him. "Even the fishes came into his hand when he dipped it into the stream. The little mice would come and playfully eat from his fingers, and the very moles paid him friendly visits. Sparrows lighted on his shoulders when he called them; the phœbe-birds built their nests in his shed, and the wild partridge with her brood came and fed quietly beneath his window.

"After he had lived two or three months in the woods the wild birds ceased to be afraid of him, and would come and perch on his shoulder, and sometimes on his spade when he was digging."

Amiel, a great French writer, said in his journal: "I have just picked up on the stairs a little yellow kitten, very ugly and pitiable. Now, rolled into a ball on a chair at my side, he seems perfectly happy, and asks for nothing more. He followed me from room to room as I went to and fro. I have nothing for him to eat, but a look and caress satisfy him, at least for the present.

"I have been told that weak and feeble creatures feel happy near me. I know that this is true, but I take no credit for it. I know that it is a gift. With a little encouragement the birds would nest in my beard.

"This is the true relation of man with the weaker creatures. He would be heartily adored by the animals if he were not a tyrant. So that all unnecessary murder and torture are not only cowardly actions, but crimes. A useful service imposed on the animal world demands in return protection and kindness. In a word, the animal has claims on man, and the man has duties to the animal."

Francis of Assisi not only cared for the birds and the harmless creatures of the field and woods, but he is said to have fed a fierce and hungry wolf until it followed him like a dog.

Some years ago, General David S. Stanley of the United States Army, was leading force across the plains. He was laying out the route for a great railroad. There were two thousand men, twenty-five hundred horse and mules, and a train of two hundred an fifty wagons heavily laden.

One day the general was riding at the head of the broad column, when suddenly his voice rang out, "Halt!"

A bird's nest lay on the ground directly in front of him. In another moment the horse would have trampled on the nestlings. The mother bird was flying about and chirping in the greatest anxiety. But the brave general had not brought out his army to destroy a bird's nest.

He halted for a moment, looked at the little birds in the nest below, and then gave the order, "Left oblique!"

Men, horses, mules and wagons turned aside and spared the home of the helpless bird. Months, and even years after, those who crossed the plains saw a great bend in the trail. It was the bend made to avoid crushing the bird's nest. Truly, great hearts are tender hearts, and "the loving are the daring."—Parish Visitor.

AN HONEST BARGAIN.—"It is naught! it is naught! saith the buyer: but when he is gone his way, then he boasteth." The Wise Man knew the way of the world; he had stood in the market-place and watched the hard bargains made. He had seen good stock or wares depreciated solely for the sake of getting below its true value. The same spirit still often rules the dealings of commerce. But it is not always so. The following story illustrates the honest way of bargaining, treating the other party as you would have him treat you.

Two Friends, who lived at a distance, happened to meet, the one inquiring after the other's health, was answered, "Pretty well, but a little tired with riding; my horse goes rather roughly; he is hardly fit for the saddle, and I believe I must provide me another."

"What dost thou use him for in common?"

"He is a good cart horse."

"Well, I have an easy-going saddle horse and want a carriage horse; perhaps it will suit us both to exchange."

They then had out their horses, and at last agreed to exchange. Some months after the occasion bringing them together, they renewed their dialogue.

"Well A., how dost thou like thy horse?"

"Why, so well that I thought I had deceived thee, and have brought £5 in my pocket which I desire thee to accept, as I believe it to be about the difference in their value."

"Surprising! Why I had the same thought of thine, and have actually brought the same sum to offer thee, supposing the advantage to have been all on my side."

After indulging in a little pleasantry on their curious coincidence, they concluded to keep their bargain, and each to take back his own money.—London Friend.

Whoso trusteth in the Lord happy is he.

For "THE FRIEND."

LINES

Memembrance of Margaret Hutchinson, an Aged Minister, who Died in the Autumn of 1849.

Safe on the golden sands ch floor the beach of Paradise, while we,
 n struggling spirits and uplifted hands,
 Are out at sea.

A kind, natural face,
 aged form that every Sabbath day watch to see in its accustomed place,
 Are gone away.

But not forgot. The chord
 y bound the old and young, was childhood's tie ened by warm caress and gentle word,
 Never to die.

In thy old gallery seat,
 Pastor of the flock! we see thee still;
 step, thy look, the grasp we loved to meet,
 Our memories fill.

And all thy tender care
 t the wandering ones, thy spirit meek, arge compassion, even first to spare
 The blind, the weak.

And when, too oft, we came orship with a full and busy heart, life's bright pictures and its pleasant hum,
 Too hard to part,

We miss thy trembling words,
 world-bound spirit that could gently raise,
 g to higher thoughts its inmost chords,
 And hymns of praise.

Earnest, and plain, and few;
 listened, touched with their heart-tendering ower, ured the father's waterings anew
 Of seed and flower.

Pure tricklings of the stream for healing from the Eternal Throne, ily saw the Gospel's crystal gleam—
 Naught of thy own.

We miss thy loving heart.
 ound its vent in kind words and good deeds,
 ed in those heavenly places, where, apart,
 The Christian feeds.

We miss thy noiseless worth asked no notice, and we softly lay ction, to our souls, while "earth to earth," Sadly we say.

Oh! when the heart lies still,
 the eye closes; and the lip is cold,
 the outgoings of an obedient will
 Its sounds have told;

The memory, then, how sweet,
 rom the living lip but kindness fell,
 ords of love, learned at the Saviour's feet,
 Or Sychar's well.

E. LLOYD, JR.

enth Mo. 1849.

There is Time Enough Yet.

es McAllister, for some years a mission-Africa, relates the following incident happened when she was about seven
 of age:

he preacher took for his text 'There is ough yet.' I have forgotten most that ; but one story he told I have never ten. He said that in a certain place a boy and girl lived, with their mother, ear the sea; and one day the children
 l of their mother to let them go down to side to play. She let them go, but told them they must not stay too long, as the tide would be coming in and they might be overtaken and drowned.

"They went down to the beach and found an old man sitting there. After they had played for a little while they said, 'We must go home.' But the old man said, 'There is no hurry; there is plenty of time yet.' So the children went back to play, but after a short time said again, 'Well, it is time to go now.'
 But the old man replied, 'You need not hurry.' 'O,' they said, 'but our mother told us not to stay long on account of the tide.
 We would better go now.' 'Yes,' said the old man, 'but there is plenty of time. There is time enough yet to have another good play.'
 So the children went back to play, and the tide came rushing in, and they were both carried out to sea and drowned.

"By this story the preacher showed what God meant when He said that now was the time to seek salvation; not by saying 'Don't go home,' but just 'There is time enough yet.'
 God had warned us that there was danger, and the Holy Spirit was drawing our hearts to himself; and it was for us to decide whether we would give Him our hearts now, while we were young, or listen to the devil and be lost.
 That very afternoon I decided that I would give God my heart, for there was not 'time enough yet.' Then and there I yielded my heart to God, and from that time I sought to do God's will."

For "THE FRIEND."

The Reward of Leisure.

Leisure is the reward of labor. Restful competence follows years of toil, evening's repose a day of work, and summer holidays are earned by months of struggle. But rest brings refreshment, calmness, strength—power to labor more and better, to reap richer fruits from labor. The reward of leisure is more work.

The summer holidays of 1900 have come and gone. Before their coming the school year of 1899-1900 of The Friends' Freedmen Association had closed, and Friends have since had time to ponder upon what has been done and what remains to do.

They will remember the good results, the large school maintained, the farm improved, and will wish for no less from the year at hand. They will have been strengthened to desire even more. One of their desires (though still in embryo) has shown a sign of form and movement.

A Friend has offered $1000 toward an Industrial Building. For $3000 more we believe one can be erected and equipped. Such a building is most desirable. It may be called, in the phrase of to-day, "a paramount issue."
 But if "paramount," another is more "immediate."

The immediate issue is the need of prompt cash,—cash for current monthly salaries and winter expenses. Last year left the Association penniless.

At the large Annual Meeting of the Association, held at Twelfth Street Meeting House in Yearly Meeting week, much interest was evinced, and the Executive Committee for the present year were directed to spend on the account of the Association $1875 for carrying on the school. The Board have, in consequence, employed the teachers over again, and are confronted with a monthly list of salaries and expenses of $312.50. Last year left us penniless.

Dr. James E. Rhoads once nobly called The Freedmen's Association "A part of the Christian work of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting."
 Could not every member thereof, interested in this work, be willing to forward to our Treasurer, with their own contribution; at least another from some Friend whom they may be able to interest in the good work? We trust that our old stand-bys among Friends who have come up from summer holidays will "not be weary," but will rejoice "in well doing," and that Friends everywhere throughout the Yearly Meeting will quickly rally to support the Association.

William S. Vaux, Jr., 515 Stephen Girard Building, Philadelphia, is Treasurer of the Association.
 RICHARD WOOD.

Notes from Others.

HIGHER EDUCATION HALTED FOR EDUCATION IN LOWER MORALS.—When we heard the report away from this borough that the public schools had been closed on account of a horse race, we said it could not be true, but later the sad truth was confirmed, and we record it in these columns with shame. It simply shows how such low-grade and dangerous amusements stealthily lead the unwary, until the future stability of morality and Christianity in this borough are now seriously threatened.

This breeder of iniquity was launched under the gentle term of "Gentleman's Driving Park"—no money to change hands; oh, no; and thus the serpent got his head in, and gradually more, until now he is in tail and all, and it is horse-racing for money. One man lost one hundred dollars that his family badly needed; and we don't know how many more fared the same.—Chester County Times,
Parkesburg.

John Hay, United States minister to London under President McKinley, and formerly one of the editors of the New York Tribune, says that there is no help from alcoholic stimulants in literary work temporarily or on occasions requiring unusual effort or at any other time, and he agrees with James Parton and Sydney Smith in their testimony against alcoholic stimulants for literary workers.
 In answer to the question whether drinking among literary men was increasing, he replied: "'No; it is decreasing, so far as my observation goes.'"

THE ONLY "CHRISTIAN DAILY."—What is said to be the "only Christian daily newspaper in the world" is to be found in Montreal, where it was established over half a century before the author of "In His Steps" painted the imaginary difficulties of such a journal. The Christian Commonwealth, London, thus speaks of it:

"The Montreal Witness has been in existence for fifty-four years, and has now a constituency of 200,000 readers. It has from the first refused advertisements of strong drink, tobacco, theatres and quack medicines, and thus sacrifices at least £10,- 000 a year. And yet it is a splendid success. The paper was originated as The Weekly Witness by a sturdy Scotch Christian and temperance advocate, John Dougall. His son, John Redpath Dougall, persuaded him to convert it into an evening half-penny organ. This son has carried on the traditions of his father. He refuses all business alliances with Belial, and allows no space to theatre and sporting gossip. He has made foes in plenty, and attempts have been made to blow up his works with dynamite. To his sturdy character is ascribed the fact that none of the Canadian dailies issue Sunday editions."—Literary Digest.

WAR KILLS OFF THE STRONGEST MEN.—War is the greatest agent in the degeneracy of the human race. The men who go to war are selected from the best physical types of nations, and who can tell how much nations lose by the loss of these men without descendants? The great civil war, in which more than 1,000,000 Americans fell, was a tremendous set-back to this country. Many once great families are no longer prominent. Their men fell in war.

A certain resolute statesman, says "war is strengthening." If war is so good and has such beneficial effects as he would have us believe, why should we allow any of these good effects to get outside this country? Why not have a little civil war of our own between Illinois and New York, two States which seem most affected by peace? . . . War is not a factor in growth; it is simply an outgrowth of barbarism. The remedy for human ills comes in peace.—David Starr Jordan.

It is recorded as an evidence of the energy of the Methodist Church in the Philippines, that it already has three churches organized at Manila. One is of English-speaking members, and numbers fifty; one is of Filipinos, and numbers two hundred, and the other is Chinese, and numbers five members. The sale of the Bible and Testament is progressing at the rate of a thousand a month.

"The highest conception that has ever entered the mind of man is that of God and the Father of all men—the one blood—the universal brotherhood. It was not evolved, but revealed. The natural man lives to be ministered unto—he lays his imposts upon others. He buys slaves that they may fan him to sleep, bring him the jeweled cup, dance before him, and die in the arena for his sport. Into such a world there came a King, 'not to be ministered unto, but to minister.' The rough winds fanned his sleep; He drank of the mountain brook, and made not the water wine for himself; would not use his power to stay his own hunger, but had compassion on the multitude. He called them He had bought with a great price no more servants, but friends. He entered the bloody arena alone, and, dying, broke all chains and brought life and immortality to light."—Er-President Harrison, in the Missouri Council.

Although the population of England increases at the rate of about 300,000 a year, the number of First-day schools is everywhere decreasing. The London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian writes: "In the Church of England they have fallen off by 7,000. The Baptists report a decrease of 7,000, the Calvinistic Methodists of 4,200, the Presbyterians of 1,200, the United Methodist Free Church of 3,000, the Free Church of Scotland of 4,300, and other denominations complain of similar losses. The figures given show a decrease of 32,000 in one year."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS

UNITED STATES.—A Washington despatch says it has been definitely decided that the foreign Ministers in Peking shall conduct any negotiations that may be necessary with the Chinese government, in place of confiding these to slow moving commissions to be sent from each country to Peking.

There is reason to believe that the diplomatic efforts of the Administration are now being devoted to obtaining a general agreement from all the Powers, guaranteeing the integrity of the Chinese and the preservation of the open door.

Washington advices state that the great nations of the world are practically in accord as to the indemnity demands to be made on China, and that the amount agreed upon is $200,000,000, the largest sum ever demanded by one nation from another. It is expected that China will agree to the punishment of the guilty leaders in the late insurrection.

The strike of the miners in the anthracite coal regions of Pennsylvania is believed to be practically ended. The operators' offers of an increase of ten per cent. in wages and the abolishment of the sliding scale having been accepted by the miners. It is said the increase will amount to about $4,000,000 a year in wages more than the anthracite employes formerly received. This estimate is based on the total wages earned by the miners last year."

In the New York Central Railroad service twenty years ago the aggregate proportion of men discharged for drunkenness was twenty per cent., but now it is said with 30,000 men in the employ of the company less than one per cent. is dropped from the rolls for that cause.

Until the boundaries of the United States are changed, the geographical centre will remain in northwestern Kansas, near Hill City.

The number of postage stamps printed last year is stated to have been 4,026,452,574.

On Tenth Month 1st there were in the Philippines 71,528 American troops of all grades. About 25,000 of these are to be withdrawn during the next six months, and, it is given out at Washington, that the more than 45,000 men who will be left on duty will be only enough to hold Manila, leaving the rest of Luzon and the other islands in control of the natives.

In an address to the citizens of Philadelphia the Committee of One Hundred says, among other things: "Misgovernment under the present Administration of our city affairs surpasses all previous experience." "Philadelphia continues to be notorious for corrupt politics."

During the season just closed thirty-four sealing schooners took 16,000 skins in Behring Sea. The spring schooners took 16,517 skins, bringing the total for the season up to 32,517. Only 55 branded seals were killed.

Among leading South and Central American diplomats in Washington, consideration is being given to a plan for establishing an International Court of Arbitration similar to The Hague tribunal, but having jurisdiction over countries of the Western Hemisphere, and with headquarters probably in Washington.

Women have the right to vote for Presidential candidates in Colorado, Utah, Wyoming and Idaho.

The gold in the United States Treasury on the twenty-sixth of Tenth Month amounted to $451,477,404, the highest point ever reached.

The number of miles of new railroad constructed in 1899 was 4528.51, as compared with 3199.12 miles in 1898 and 2161.16 miles in 1897.

A remarkable fall in the prices of manufactures in nearly all of the great classes is shown by the official figures of the Treasury Bureau of Statistics. Comparing prices at the beginning of the Tenth Month with those at the beginning of the present year, a fall of from ten per cent. to forty per cent. is shown. While nearly all of the figures relating to manufactured articles show a reduction. Nearly all figures on prices of farm products show an advance during the same time. Among these are corn, wheat, barley, cotton, cotton seed and hogs.

"There have been filed 34,000 claims for pensions on account of the Spanish-American War up to Tenth Month 22nd.

Statistics show that the total number of pupils in all schools, elementary secondary and higher, public and private, for the year ended Seventh Month 1, 1899, was 16,738,362, of which the number enrolled in the common schools, elementary and secondary, was 15,138,715.

The population of the State of California is 1,485,053, against 1,218,130 in 1890. This is an increase of 270,923, or 22.9 per cent.

Massachusetts has the largest number of cities of 25,000 inhabitants or upwards, namely 20, and is followed by Pennsylvania, with 18, and New York, with 12.

There are now about 64,000 men in the regular army and 33,000 in the volunteer regiments—a total of some 97,000 men. In the Seventh Month next, unless legislation to the contrary is enacted, it is to be reduced to 27,000 men.

There were 396 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 30 more than the previous week and 54 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 206 were males and 190 females; 46 died of consumption; 43 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 14 of diphtheria; 17 of apoplexy; 10 of cancer, and 7 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 9 $\frac{3}{4}$ c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR. Winter, super., $2.30 to $2.50; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.30 to $3.45; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.60; spring, straight, $3.65 to $3.90; city mills, straight, $3.40 to $3.60.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 70 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 70 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.
No. 2 mixed corn, 41 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 44 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 28 to 28 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.; good, 5 to 5 $\frac{1}{4}$ c.; medium, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.; good, 3 $\frac{3}{4}$  to 4c.; common 1 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 2; spring lambs, 3 to 6 $\frac{1}{4}$ c.

HOGS.—Best Western, 7 to 7 $\frac{1}{4}$ c.

FOREIGN—A preliminary convention between China and the combined Powers has been proposed by Prince Ching and Li Hung Chang: "Article 1 says that laying a settlement on the Legations of foreign Ministers is high offence against one of the important principles of international law. No country can possibly tolerate such a thing. China acknowledges her great fault in this respect, and promises that it will never occur again. Article 2. China admits her liability to pay an indemnity for the various losses sustained on this occasion, and the Powers each appoint officials to examine and present all claims for a final consultation and settlement. China asks when peace negotiations begin an armistice shall be declared."

Peace negotiations are said to have been begun in Peking. Commissioner Reckhill will act as adviser to the Minister Conger in the proceedings.

Two prominent men in China, whose lives have been demanded by the European powers, have suffered death at least by his own act. The Chinese commission announces that the Imperial Government will punish the guilty leader of the Boxer outbreak.

According to official reports at Canton, all the rebels in the Hui-Chow prefectures are still holding out, slaughtering isolated bodies of imperial troops.

It is feared that during next winter there will be a terrible famine in North China. Winter will soon set in there, and fearful suffering is almost sure to occur as a consequence of the operations of the allied troops. The food resources of Peking and vicinity are even now practically cut off, and the Chinese are suffering for subsistence.

A recent despatch from Pretoria says: The Transvaal was proclaimed a part of the British Empire, the proclamation being attended with impressive ceremonies. The Boers continue a guerrilla warfare.

Turkey has been taking a census, and finds that the number of Mohammedans in the world is 196,500,000. Of these 18,000,000 are in Turkey in Europe, 99,000,000 in Western Asia and Hindostan, 20,000,000 in China, 500,000 in Northern and Northeastern Africa, and 3,000,000 are scattered in other parts of the world.

The remains of an ancient galley have been found four feet below the surface at Tottenham marshes during excavations for the new reservoirs of the East London Water Company. It is supposed to have belonged to the Danes, who were defeated by King Alfred in 894 A. D.

RECEIPTS.

Unless otherwise specified, two dollars have been received from each person, paying for vol. 74.

James Hobson, agent, Ireland, £6 12 shillings, and £1 for Daniel Alesbury, vols. 74 and 75, and 10 shillings each for Henry Bell, John Douglas, Charles E. Forster Green, Frances Green, T. M. Haughton, Pearson, Henry A. Uprichard, William White and P. Duguid, Scotland, and 12 s. for Susan Williams, 2 extra papers, &c.

Remittances received after Third-day noon will appear in the Receipts until the following week.

NOTICES.

Public Meeting Landowne, Pa.

A meeting for worship is appointed by authority of the Chester Monthly Meeting, Pa., to be held in the meeting house at Lansdowne, Pa., Fifth-day evening, the 15th inst., at eight o'clock.

Bible Association of Friends in America.

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE CORPORATION will be held in the Lecture Room of Friends' Select School, N. Sixteenth St., on Fourth-day, Eleventh Month 1900, at 8 o'clock, P. M. Friends generally are invited to attend.
WILLIAM T. ELKINTON, Secy.

DIED, on the twenty-seventh of Ninth Month, 1900, her home in West Branch, Iowa, ANN D. LEECH, wife of Thomas Leech, in the eighty-first year of her age; she was a highly esteemed elder and member of Hickory Monthly and Particular Meeting of Friends. She had a life-long membership of the Society, and was firmly attached to its principles and testimonies as held by early Friends of which her general conversation and departmental evidence, as of one dwelling in the fear and counsel of the Lord.

—, in West Chester, Eighth Month 10th, 1900, ANN TAYLOR, wife of the late Thomas B. Taylor, in the eighty-fourth year of her age; a beloved member of the Birmingham Monthly Meeting of Friends.

WILLIAM H. PILE'S SONS, PRINTERS
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, ELEVENTH MONTH 10, 1900.

No. 17.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,
No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,
PHILADELPHIA.

South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth.)

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

Mighty works are wasted energy on unbelief. "Trusts" of men cannot degrade labor where Christ is elevating the laborer; nor can they where their members also are animated by his spirit.

If any man's work have not the spirit of Christ, it is none of his. If it have his spirit, it is all his, whether called secular or sacred.

A PROGRESSIVE LOT.—It is observed by the "Sword of Truth" that "Lot pitched his tent toward Sodom. It was his choice. But by the time the angels came to visit and to warn him he was already in Sodom, and his family was greatly attached to and influenced by Sodom. Lot was progressive, but he progressed Sodomward."

VOTING STILL AVAILABLE.—This we write, I may safely say, in advance of the election. At the first vote cast in Congress for a war with Spain was "the beginning of sorrows," whatever profession of ending other wars by unholy means. To "do evil that good may come" brings to a nation, as to a man, the verdict that its "condemnation is sealed." And whether mammon and material prosperity be now rampant, as some hoped, or the launching of class strife be more than imminent, as some feared, there is occasion for one form of voting still to be due from every Christian heart—a vote from which neither male nor female is disfranchised—the vote of frequent prayer cast before the Throne of grace, for our country's welfare under the guiding hand of mercy. "The effectual, fervent prayer of the righteous availeth much."

Because it May be, Therefore it is. Cheap logic is cropping out upon the surface to justify a practice hitherto rather secretly in vogue among many under our name; not among approved ministers of our own kindred Yearly Meetings) of practically composing their sermons in advance; also, more openly, of prescribing a stated order of times when vocal prayer, or praise, or preaching shall be produced in a devotional meeting. This, instead of placing our times in the hands of the "Head over all things to his Church," places the determining power in man's pre-arrangement, making a free gospel ministry under such restrictions impossible, if it be true that "the word of God is not bound." A free gospel ministry implies a freedom not to speak, as well as to speak. But a set engagement to preach at stated times is bondage to any gospel ministry. No amount of pay can justify it. We have several times in conversation been met by the question, "May not the writing out, or otherwise pre-determining of a sermon for any given occasion, be accompanied by the inspiration and help of the Holy Spirit?" Granting that it may be, what right have we to preach except under a sense that it is so authorized? Any of the ministry of the pulpits of other denominations would thus be in order in Friends' meetings, if it is sufficient to say the Holy Spirit may have helped in the preparation of some of their sermons; or may be present in some stated exercise, as well as in one that has waited for his authority. Our worship professes to stand on a surer foundation than a may-be or guess-work. It stands on the immediate witness for truth, the communion of his inspeaking word, life and authority. It is not enough that the words we use were once inspired in another, or in our own heart. It must be by a present inspiration that they are recalled or used as preaching, praise or prayer, if their message is to minister life among hearers, or be regarded as authorized through the speaker.

One of our ministers says that he carried a concern for twenty years, before the divine opportunity was opened to deliver it. That length of preparation was no disqualification. We do not discredit the divineness of a preparation of heart merely because it was previous, but we object to previous or to instant preparations that are self-made and self-determined by the professed preacher for any stated day or hour, on no better authority than the assumption that the Spirit may indite some of them. No professional padding of such essays with fruits of intellectual talent in best religious form or doctrine, though it may disguise it, will quicken or redeem the skeleton of a sermon from being a skeleton still.

"If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God. If any man minister let him do it as of the ability which God giveth." Lest thou "speak thy own words and think thy own thoughts in God's holy day."

The Last of the Christians.

I had been traveling in northern Europe, amid the snows and pine forests of Russia and Finland, and had gone south through Sweden to Denmark. From the shores of Denmark I could see the faint outline of the Swedish coast across the blue waters of the Baltic. It was springtime, and the great beech forests for which Denmark is celebrated had just burst into leaf, and were clothed with the tender green of foliage transpierced with sunshine, and presenting a spectacle of exceeding loveliness. Not far from one of these forests a great and busy city was spread out by the sea. The roofs and steeples of the churches rose high above the picturesque mass of its houses, while the streets were crowded with a gay and pleasure-loving people. I fear from what I heard that church edifices there were like the beautiful empty perfume bottles one sometimes sees, from which all the fragrance has long since departed. Socialism and skepticism were rife among the masses of the city whose alienation from religion in all its forms was only too notorious. But there remained in the city one man in whom even the skeptics and socialists believed—a quiet, gentle man, who said little, but did much for the relief of the poor, the suffering, and distressed. They called him "the last of the Christians." As I expressed a desire to become acquainted with him, the friends with whom I was staying arranged for an interview. He was a rich man, living in the neighborhood of the city in the utmost plainness and simplicity, who had converted his mansion, surrounded by pleasant gardens, into a home for persons recovering from illness. Only such as could not afford to pay for their board and lodging were received, and these were housed, fed and nursed free of charge, the owner of the mansion living among them, eating at the same table with them, and ministering to their physical and spiritual wants with the utmost kindness, as if indeed, he were a servant in the establishment rather than the master of the house.

My friend told me that his liberality to the poor in the city was so great that none who needed help were ever refused. His whole means, and all his time and strength, were consecrated to this beautiful service of others. It may be imagined that I looked at him with peculiar interest. He was a man of about forty years of age, slight in build, with an intelligent, kind, serious aspect, gentle in manner, rather reticent, but when drawn into conversation, brightened with sympathetic feeling. He was entirely free from all pride and affectation. No hedges seemed to grow around him, no barriers in the way of intercourse with his fellow-men. I looked round his roomy house. The hall was full of the hats and coats of the patients who were enjoying their evening meal in the dining-room, whose windows were stocked with plants, and opened on the pleasant lawn. The patients seemed to be men and women of the so-called humbler classes, and an air of quiet enjoyment pervaded the place, which made it difficult to believe that the guests were people recovering from illness. Some little children were among them, and received a considerable share of loving attention. There was a harmonium in the room, and at evening prayers the place was crowded with a company of people whose looks expressed their sense of freedom from care and worry, and their appreciation of the peaceful repose of this Christian home. I noticed that the master of the house went about among them in the quiet, business-like way in which a gardener attends to his plants, as he gently moves along when he is watering them in a green-house. There was no hurry or flurry—just wise and needful ministrations, and a busy, watchful attention to every want.

The next day I had a long talk with this remarkable man, and tried to ascertain what were the Scripture passages which most deeply influenced him. I found that they were the Gospel narratives describing the life of our Lord and his practical teaching. He pointed out with serious emphasis the words, "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things I say?" and the precept, "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven. As we read together these and other similar sentences from the Master's lips, I felt I touched the spring which fed the beautiful life-service I beheld. So this was the man the skeptics and socialists called 'the last of the Christians.'" Thus by this name did they unwittingly acknowledge the grace and purity of the religion they rejected. Thus did they express their judgment as to the character and worth of the mass of religious profession by which they were surrounded, their sense of the fact that it had lost its truth and reality; thus did they confess, however, that the Spirit of Christ had not wholly left the world, that there was still one in their midst who possessed and exemplified it. "The last of the Christians?" Was he the last? Of course not, but these men called him so. What did they see, and what did they fail to see, to lead them to give this man such a name? In the churches they saw well-dressed people and heard good words; but here they saw a plain man doing good deeds. Here was the clear shining of a Christian life. This is what is wanted: more genuine followers of Jesus Christ, of the power of whose great example we read: "the life was the light of men." In this age of profession and preaching, of books and churches, what is most of all needed for the enlightenment and Christianization of an unbelieving and alienated world is just "living epistles, known and read of all men." Regions Beyond.

THE full beauty of the smallest leaf—its living green, its wonderful tracery, its exquisitely-formed tissue—can be seen only when the sunlight shines through it, transfiguring every part. So the full beauty of every life can never be developed until the sunlight of God's grace shines through it, and transfigures its smallest details.

Samuel Tuke—His Life, Works and Thoughts.

(Continued from page 123.)

As the educational interests promoted by the Tukes, in and about York, have been mentioned in an earlier paper of this series, it is thought the reader might be interested to enter more particularly into Samuel Tuke's labors as an educator, few taking a more active and prominent part in the effort to secure the blessings of a "training, both of the heart and mind, for all the duties of life and for fitness to enter into eternity."

He co-operated with the British and Foreign School Society, supervising the schools of that society in his own city, and advocating its principles for adoption throughout Great Britain. A school for poor girls, next to his own home, was entirely supported by him, his daughter sharing the care of it.

"It was, however," says Charles Tylor, "to the improvement and progress of education in his own Society, that he directed his chief attention." He had been one of the founders of "Bootham" and "The Mount" Schools, both opened about 1830, at York, for the children of Friends and had taken a full share of the management of Ackworth School. In connection with the latter Institution, he was one of the founders of the Friends' Educational Society.

"It was at the gathering of this Association, held at the times of the Ackworth General Meetings, during the 'forties, that Samuel Tuke, its president, delivered his luminous exposition of the philosophy of education. These expositions were largely deduced from the facts elicited by his own historical researches, and now, after the lapse of many years, remain eloquent reminders that man cannot be put into an educational lathe to be turned out like a piece of furniture; that whilst schools have their service of exceeding value, and whilst teacher's labor is one of the noblest of professions, yet to parents is given in the Divine economy an influence which cannot be delegated to anyone. The historical facts are of singular interest and significance; the philosophical reflections display an intimate knowledge of the human heart, and are expressed in nervous English."*

Samuel Tuke wrote five papers on the "Past Proceedings and Experience of the Society of Friends in connection with the Education of Youth," 1843 of which the following are a portion of the concluding paragraphs:

"The judgment now appears pretty much fixed in the Society, that the boarding-school system, conducted as ours now is, has on the whole a decided advantage over that of village or town day-schools. But the boarding-school is to be considered as the ally of, not the substitute for, parental education. We believe, indeed, that this idea needs to be more fully received, and that parents need to feel still more than they do that they are the chief educators of their children, and that it is but a small portion of that great work which can be devolved upon the masters and mistresses of our schools.

* John S. Rountree in Friends Quarterly Examiner, Fourth Month, 1895.

"The charge of instructors is, indeed, a very weighty one. The years which are spent in school include one of the most important periods of life; body and mind are expanding, the will strengthens, the passions unfold, judgment is still weak. The least part of education at this period, important as it is, the mere communication of knowledge. The formation of right habits, intellectual and moral, the fixing in the mind of Christian principles of action and the subjection of the will, are of infinitely more importance to the welfare, we might say, to the greatness of the future man, than the largest accumulation of art and science. Well may we inquire: Who is sufficient for these things? And we are bound to answer, that with man it is impossible, but with God all things are possible and the meek and humble follower of our Saviour in this noble calling will not want a portion of that heavenly wisdom, which, though in its operation, it be often less striking to outward eye than that which is merely human, works in harmony with Divine grace, and has power in it which is seen in its ultimate effect. Faith, hope, love, must be the sustaining waters of the Christian instructor.

"To recur, however, to the parent: we believe that the character of the future man is often laid in very early life. Education begins in the cradle, and every action and circumstance which occurs in the presence of a child, has a share of influence on his future character. The gentle restraints by which the mother controls the little obstreperous infant, her sweet smiles of love, her reproving eye, induce habits, thoughts, feelings, in the little pupil, and are the earliest, and perhaps the most precious, lessons of our lives; they who think, or act as if they thought, in infancy has only to be fed and to be pleased and that it is no time for moral training, to commit an error which perhaps no future life may be able to remedy.

"Not less important is the work of training in the subsequent stages of childhood. An opening mind is very sensible of impressions from without, and is the subject of strong internal tendencies within. The germs of that constitute man are shooting forth. If the evil passions are not restrained, they gather strength with the years of the child. Much more, however, is to be done by example and by a steady gentle rule in regard to conduct, than by didactic lessons. Above all it is important to cherish that tender feeling which offends its heavenly Father, which is often found to prevail in the very early period of life, and which is greatly encouraged by instruction in Divine things, and by the example of those who are walking in the fear of God. On the other hand, the early touches of Divine grace are liable to be dispelled by a course of bad conduct; the child's mind may be discouraged and hardened; and thus, it may be said, in the way of the Lord, in that rectification of the heart which is alone of Him, is obstructed and prevented.

"The work of education is undoubtedly very extensive, and includes in its perfect exhibition arts which all do not possess; but really the Christian parents, sensible of the responsibility of the trust reposed in them, alive to the ence of surrounding circumstances upon the minds of their children, aware of the inward motions of sin which are ever springing up, and seeking for Divine help from day to day to curb and repress them, have the power to exercise the most important part of the great art of framing an immortal being. They cannot be ignorant, from their own experience, of the Divine ways; they have in their hands the Holy Scriptures, in which the hatefulfulness of sin in the Divine sight, and the true remedies for all the evils of our fallen nature, are clearly set forth; these, especially in the history of the lowly Jesus, and in the message of mercy to man through Him, are 'milk for the babes,' as well as 'meat for those of riper years.' There are represented the best precepts of human action; there is exhibited the only perfect example of godliness in the human form; and there are to be found the gracious promises of Christ's spiritual presence as the observer of the heart, the reprover of sin, and the sympathizing helper of his children. These things carefully and freely impressed upon the youthful mind, the firm, steady, but gentle repression of evil action, the example of a truly Christian walk, the prayers of a fervent spirit, constitute the means by which, under the Divine blessing, the great work of right education is to be mainly carried on; and in this work we believe they will have the largest measure of success, who, however small may be their natural talents, or their attainments, know most of the abjection of self to the Divine law, and in whose hearts the love of God in Jesus Christ is most abundantly shed abroad. Yet we fear there is great tendency in the present day, to more superficial system, to methods which do more upon the surface, but which do little to invigorate the understanding and inure it to habits of patient labor, or really to rectify the will by the establishment of new principles of action in the heart."

It was almost with prophetic vision that Samuel Tuke wrote to Josiah Foster, sixty years ago, concerning the probabilities of the Romish Church extending its baneful influence in England, viz: "Laudism is growing very fast in the Church. I believe it will be rife, if not rampant, by and by, and that the Church of England will have a heavy shake.

"It is surprising what things we hear nowadays in Society and read in books and newspapers from men who, ten years ago, would have repelled them with indignation. The question of church imposition, yea or nay, has to be tried, and in England, too.

"Probably the men of whom I am speaking are not quite prepared for the utmost coercive measures; but their principles lead to, and I do not think that anything but the want of power will prevent their resorting to the utmost coercion, to persecution.

"They may be said to constitute a moral pestilence, directed by a hand which brushes away all paltry barriers and preventions which man has raised, as a storm would do a spider's web. Man will have a religion. The color or dress may depend upon the taste of the day; but the essential form of all false religions is the same; it is always cruel. Happy it is that moral as well as physical evils are under the control of an Omnipotent Being, who can say to them when they have accomplished the work to which they were sent, 'Hitherto thou shalt go and no further, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed.'

When we consider the present ritualistic movement which threatens the strongholds of Protestantism on both sides of the Atlantic, it becomes all, who appreciate the essential need of maintaining, inviolate, those spiritual conceptions for which our forefathers in the Truth suffered so much, to be alive to the aggressive efforts of this movement.

It is instructive to read what Samuel Tuke says in regard to usual missionary effort, viz: "I cannot avoid thinking there is a strong feeling pervading the Society increasingly, that the great work of the world's regeneration is to be effected by human planning and combination, and that methods which we cannot altogether approve as truly Christian are allowable and necessary in these great plans of moral improvement, the end sanctifying the means.

"The distinction which is made in respect to these efforts and those of a decidedly religious kind, the one as requiring spiritual guidance and the other as not requiring it, is, I think, not sound. "May not each individual be privileged to know what is fit for him with reference to his spiritual health; and is not the part we take in public affairs, and in association with others for good objects subject to this direction and guidance?"

The Annual Monitor, containing so many excellent obituary notices of departed worthies, was edited by Samuel Tuke in the 'forties, and his thoughts are clearly set forth in the preface, viz: "If the life have not borne evidence of the renewed man or there has not been that godly sorrow which worketh repentance not to be repented of, there is, we apprehend, little dependence to be placed, either on the belief of the doctrine of Christ's sacrifice, or on any peace, quiet, or resignation, which any may have experienced in the prospect of death."

In no line of reading was he more at home than when reviewing the literature of our own Society—a literature as valuable as it is unique for spiritual experience.

In a letter to his daughter Maria, dated eleventh of First Month, 1846, Samuel Tuke says: "I would not be sorry if some of our old controversial works had, when they had served their day, been buried with their authors, as the warlike implements of heroes were wont to be; but speaking of the writings of the early Friends generally, and especially their memoirs, I believe they have not yet finished their service, and will long form an important part of the history of the Lord's dealings with mankind in order to bring them under his perfect reign. Rightly used, too, I believe those writings are valuable waymarks and checks against that sliding back to which we are so prone. One must acknowledge that the history of the Church has been too much like that of the rolling of the stone up the mountain, often sticking fast at the point to which extraordinary efforts had urged it, and perhaps, still oftener, receding from the point attained.

"Yet the former is a better starting point than the latter, when a renewed energy is found to put the shoulder to the work; and so, lamentable, as it is, to see men content to lie down by the deeds of their fathers without seeking for their living energy. I think it would be much to be regretted if their staves, fixed deep in the hill, were pulled up and thrown away."

(To be continued.)

Starfish and Oyster.

The oyster when at home lives in a hard lime shell which nicely protects him from the attack of enemies. Man, with his tools, can open the shell and remove the soft animal, but besides man the oyster has few foes. Oddly enough, his greatest foe is not, as might be expected, an animal with powerful jaws and strong teeth, but one wholly without jaws. It is the common starfish, so common everywhere at the seashore.

Now, the starfish is a soft, flexible creature, very sluggish, seemingly helpless and utterly unable to attack such an animal as the oyster. Its mouth, which is in the centre of the disk, has no teeth or jaws. How can such a helpless creature open the formidable oyster shell and get at the animal concealed within?

Its method of doing so is odd enough. It first clasps the oyster in its arms, wrapping its five arms around the shell tightly. Having thus seized the oyster, it quietly waits. Just exactly what happens next even our scientists do not exactly know. The two shells of the oyster are held together by a hinge which is opened by a spring. The spring is so adjusted that the shells will be pushed open unless they are held together by the muscles. Some scientists tell us that, after the starfish has held the oyster for awhile, the oyster opens its shell in order to get food, and the starfish, that has been waiting for this, now injects into the shell a little reddish liquid. This acts as a poison, paralyzing the muscles, and thus making it impossible for the animal to close its shell. Others tell us that the process is simpler, and that the starfish simply holds the shells tightly together until the oyster is smothered. As soon as it is stupefied by the suffocation the muscles relax and the shell opens.

Whichever of these two accounts is true, it is certain that after a little the oyster shells fly open. Now comes the oddest feature of all. The stomach of the starfish is very large and elastic, and it is now thrown out of the animal's mouth much as one would turn a bag inside out. This stomach is then thrust within the oyster shell, and wrapped around the soft animal, beginning at once to digest it.—H. W. Conn, in St. Nicholas.

Look at the wonderful manner in which God our Father has contrived a supply for the thirst of his children in hot countries. He has placed amid the burning sands of Africa a plant whose leaf, twisted round like a cruet, is always filled with a large glassful of fresh water. The gullet of this cruet is shut up by the end of the leaf itself so as to prevent the water from evaporating. In the same hot land God has planted a great tree, called Boa by the natives, the trunk of which is of great size and hollowed like a cistern. In the rainy seasons it is filled with water, which continues fresh and cool in the greatest heats, by means of the tufted foliage which crowns its summit. In some of the parched and rocky islands of the West Indies there is found a tree, called the Water Liauno, so full of sap that if you cut a single branch of it as much water pours forth as a man could drink at one draught, and it is perfectly pure and good. Is not God a loving Father thus to provide for his children?—The Quiver.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

THE MESSAGE THAT NEVER CAME.

A stranger on an unknown road,
I passed a home where stood
One gazing in a look that showed
He missed a lacking food.

I learned of him my proper course,
Then felt a debt was due,
To name the road to best from worse,
The highway found by few.

The life and vision sent I choked,
And trod my weary way.
Oh, how was light and peace revoked,
For many a dreary day!

And now when'er I pass that fence,
I see a lonely, leaning frame
Awaiting there with hungering sense,
The message that never came!
OFF NANTUCKET, Eighth Month 21st.

Do You Believe in War?

Yes, I do, providing it is war of the right kind—I believe in a righteous, holy war against sin, the world, the flesh and the devil (Rev. xix: 11). "But I mean fighting, you surely do not believe in that," yes, I believe in fighting, a real fighting of "the good fight of faith" (1 Tim. vi: 12), using a sharp sword, too, "the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God" (Eph. vi: 17), and I believe in bloodshed also—that precious blood of the lamb, which was shed for you and me (Luke xxii: 20). Likewise I believe in the suffering consequent upon this war—knowing that we are joint heirs with the captain of our salvation, Jesus Christ "if so be that we suffer with Him, that we may also be glorified together (Rom. viii: 17), "because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that we should follow his steps" (1 Pet. xli: 21). Yes, and I believe also in the eternal hatred engendered by war of this nature, for when "it is finished," we shall hear from the lips of the great Judge, the words, "blessed art thou, for thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity," yea, "thine own lips also," "enter thou into the joy of thy Lord" (Heb. i: 9; Luke xiv: 23). And again, I believe in the destruction and havoc wrought through war, for these enemies who war against righteousness, "shall be punished with everlasting destruction" (2 Thess. i: 9), and their leader together with themselves shall yet hear the awful sentence "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels" (Matt. xxv: 41).

On which side are you fighting in this war?
—Arthur W. Dove, in N. C. Friend.

How incalculably much is lost by failure to recognize prayer as the opportunity for communion, as of sons with the loving Father—for absorption, during however brief a space, into the Divine nature, whence to emerge with spirits chastened, purified, unburdened! Joy in the mere prayer of mendicancy we shall not know; but there is joy unspeakable in the prayer of fellowship.—The Examiner.

Some Account of the Early Experience and Subsequent Travels of Ruth Newlin.

(Continued from page 126.)

For some weeks I went to meetings regularly as they came in course, and my mind was clothed with more peace than for some time before. In this state I grew more easy until I again lapsed into unwatchfulness, and let my mind out on the perishing things of this world, and concluded it was not necessary to attend meetings so strictly in the middle of the week when there was a press of work, and I pleaded excuse that we were just setting out in life, and by being industrious we might get a comfortable living, and then I would take more time to attend meetings; forgetting the injunction of our blessed Lord, "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all things necessary shall be added." O! it is wonderful, how the Lord, in great mercy did bear with me. When I think of the many deliverances of my life, of both body and soul, I feel that I never can be thankful enough to Thee, my only Saviour and Redeemer.

Notwithstanding all I had to make me a penitent child, I tried to ease my convicted conscience by reasoning thus, Other young people are not as careful as seemed required of me, and my dear husband was so faithful in the discharge of duty, that would suffice until we had more of the comforts of life around us. His kind, persuasive language lingered with me when he was gone. One day he had only been gone a few moments when I heard a noise, and on looking out saw one of the most distressing looking human beings I ever beheld at the gate, trying to get into the yard. I was greatly alarmed, being young and timid. O! how I did wish I had gone to meeting, then he would only have found the house. But now I was in it, and I did not know what to do. I walked the floor, trembling every step with strong inward cries to my heavenly Father not to permit the awful looking man to come into the yard, promising that I never would stay at home from meeting to work again. And this covenant by his help I have been able to keep. Never one time have I felt I wanted to break it under any circumstances. The dreaded creature did not come in but lingered near until I suppose he saw my husband coming, then went away. There was my tub of apples I had expected to pare, untouched. I repeated my story and of my resolve never to stay at home to work any more. We mingled our tears together. This, the fifth of Sixth Month, 1832, I can say my promise is yet unbroken. When affliction has been my lot many months together, and I was not able to meet with my dear Friends at the place of public worship, I have been comforted in looking back over the past, when I was able to go, that I did so, often under considerable difficulty, and felt to receive a blessing, and at times untold peace was my reward.

Now as I was more fully given up, I was favored with desires to be more watchful over myself, and by so doing I gained some spiritual strength. Some months after this I felt an impression that I should be called to a service of a public character. I often had sweet, refreshing seasons from the presence of the Lord, in which it was given me plainly to see the work He was calling me into. O! my unfitness and unworthiness for such a great and important work. I begged to be excused; I thought I should be willing to serve Him in any other way He might call me into, if I could be released from the concern of speaking in public. Sometimes the weight was so great that if the Lord had not made bare his arm of power, I should have sunk into despair. Some of my Friends often spoke a word of encouragement, but that did not remove the concern or do the work. I had no liberty to divulge the Lord's secrets to any one, not even to my companion. Yet he seemed to have a sense of my condition, and sympathized with me in my deep wading and plunging along in the mire and thick clay, until life itself became a burden, and I could have freely given it up if that had been the sacrifice called for.

Oh! how great a monster self is; and I do believe all will find they cannot serve the Lord acceptably except the stubborn will is slain, and all brought into subjection to the law Divine. Then, and not till then will they experience his yoke to be easy and his burden light and find true rest to their weary souls.

In the year 1844 I seldom sat a meeting through without feeling something of a weight or concern on my mind, yet my unfitness was so great, I was not willing to think it ever could be possible for me to tell to others what the Lord had done for my soul, and of his grace mercy to just such sinners who were willing to forsake their sins and seek the Lord while He may be found, and call upon Him while He is near to hear the cries of a penitent sinner, and whose all penetrating eye is over all his works. Sometimes Scripture passages were brought so clear to my recollection that for fear of having to express them in the meeting, I would shake until it was noticed by those sitting by. Sometimes a sentence or two were presented, appearing as if it might be Scripture, yet I had no recollection of ever seeing it, and when the meeting ended I was filled with doubts and fears. Every time I looked for the passage I found it. Often on just opening the Bible my eyes would rest on the same. So I often thought I was another doubting Thomas, only more so.

Just now I feel like relating a little of my experience on the subject of singing. When I had one little babe I often indulged in singing to him the hymns I heard in the meetings of other denominations, held where I was to work.

I was in such a practice of singing them would do so almost without being aware of it.

Once when thus engaged, I heard a voice as plain as if some one had spoken, "Walk the golden streets of the new Jerusalem. Thou art not fit to die." I was struck with awe at what I had been doing and what I had heard, for I knew it was the very truth. When my tongue and lips were uttering the words of that hymn my heart was far from it, and it was not the desire of my soul, for my mind was on the world and not acceptable to the Creator. I believe there are thousands who sing hymns as thoughtlessly as I did. As many days of old, "This people draweth nigh to me with their lips while their heart is far from me." What mockery it is.

Although I am going back in my narrative

I wish to relate another occurrence which took place the following winter. A neighbor who had been an invalid, died suddenly. Death so near us seemed to be a great terror to me, feeling I was not at all prepared for such an hour. Some of her neighbors and even her own husband had expressed doubts about her sickness being of as dangerous a character as she thought it to be. They said if she would get up and go to work she would be better. But she told them she should die, and when it really proved so, they exclaimed, "We will never say so of another poor creature." I felt like leaving this as a warning to all not to judge of the afflictions of others, for surely they need our sympathy instead of censure.

In the spring of 1844 we moved to a place more remotely situated, which I felt was good for us. More retirement and time for reading and meditation, but the farm proved to be wet, and we traded land with a man eighteen miles away, at Spring Meeting.

His wife was afflicted, and wanted to live nearer father, Eleazer Bales. She died not long afterward; we were well pleased with our new home, often feeling thankful to kind Providence for the many blessings bestowed on us poor unworthy creatures. Plenty of food and clothing, good health, a pleasant meeting which was mostly held in silence. The best of meetings when it is a live silence. Soon after we moved, I became very uneasy about the way I dressed, especially my full bordered cap. It was such a very great cross to wear a plain one that I went to meeting without any for some time. I felt that I could not wear such as I had worn any more. Sometimes I could say, "The spirit is willing; but the flesh how weak!" I did not want to be deceived and often queried, "Am I getting too strict?" Having learned some of the snares of the great deceiver in time past, I often craved to be able to do right in every thing. So, after some days of struggling for the right and against the wrong, I saw clearly that it was my duty to wear a plain cap, and keep to the same. I did so and my reward was sweet peace, and in addition the approval of my dear husband. This within itself, was a small thing, yet to me it was a great trial to appear among those of my own age in plainer clothes than they. I often desired to be led aright in all things and to be helped to guard my conversation that I might not offend my dear Saviour, and was favored with peace that this world cannot give neither can it take away.

We all had the enjoyment of good health for more than a year, except that my dear husband had a catarrh in his head, with which he suffered extremely for six weeks. In the spring of 1845 I had a long and severe sickness, in which my life was despaired of. When the doctor told me there would be a change within three days for better or worse, it did not alarm me, but casting myself upon the Father of all our sure mercies, I felt a sweet calm. After three days the disease began to yield to the treatment. I recovered sufficiently to be able to attend our Yearly Meeting, held at Richmond, Indiana, near one hundred miles away, at fall. I went as one that was hungering and thirsting after righteousness, desiring the sustaining food for the soul above everything else in this world. And I can say to the praise of my heavenly Father, that my empty soul was filled to the full of his loving presence.

One night at our boarding place, after Scripture reading, my heart was filled to the overflowing, yes, like unto a vessel wanting vent.

The power of the Lord was so upon me that I trembled and shook. An aged Friend present spoke very encouragingly to some whom he felt the Lord was calling into service. So great was the power over me at that time that I could have exclaimed, "I am the one." But the magnitude of the work appeared so great for one so poor as I felt myself to be, and the fear that I might bring dishonor on the truth, caused me to sit trembling till the sitting broke up. I soon left the room to relieve my feelings in a flood of tears. A dear young woman followed me out and said, "Ruth, I believe thee had something for us to-night. How I do wish thee had spoken what was on thy mind, for I believe it was for me." This I could not deny. Some years afterward she became a minister. I believe the Lord had great compassion on me. I suffered for the night, imploring Him to strengthen my faith; yet I felt I could easier have given up my natural life, if that was what was required, than to be called to tell to others what the Lord had done for my soul. I returned home after meeting ended, feeling glad I went and somewhat strengthened in the inner man. Yet I believe I should have received a greater reward of peace, if obedience had kept pace with knowledge.

(To be concluded.)

BISMARCK ON THE EVILS OF ORATORY.—After the deluge of campaign oratory to which the country has been subjected, many will be interested in reading what Bismarck had to say on the orator, and the degree of influence that should be allowed him in the affairs of a nation.

"Eloquence is a gift that at the present day exercises an influence disproportionate to its value and is estimated beyond its real worth.

A good speaker must be a poet, approximately, and may not therefore restrict himself with mathematical precision to the truth. He must know how to goad, incite; must be easily inflamed in order to be able to inflame others; but I think that a good speaker could seldom be a good whist-player, seldom a good chess-player, more seldom a reliable statesman. The element of good nature must predominate in him, not that of sagacity, and I believe, indeed, that strictly in conformity with the physical constitution of man a good speaker and a cool judge may never be found united in the same person. I remind you of all the qualities of Mephisto, of the courage of the lion, of the speed of the stag, and you remember that all these were never found combined in one body; and so eloquence may be seen dangerously overshadowing intelligence, sufficing for the crowd without opinions, but a man of keen deliberation, capable of sure, exact consideration, the man to whom the conduct of large and important affairs is confided with satisfactory results, can hardly be what is called a good speaker. Whether one of the results of the present development of our civilization may be a remedy for this evil of eloquence, I do not know; but the fact that the evil is recognized is already a half remedy."—Literary Digest.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

THE CHRISTIAN PILGRIM.

Simply trusting in the Saviour

To supply his daily needs;

Only going at his bidding

Wheresoe'er his Spirit leads;

Caring not for worldly pleasure—

Idle ease, or languid leisure.

When the way is dark and gloomy,

Praising God for floods of light

Which shall burst upon his vision

In the morning of the night—

O, the wealth of heart-felt praises

That the earnest Christian raises!

Thus he goes upon a journey

To a kingdom of renown,

Where the least may be the greatest,

For each servant wears a crown.

Then, O hasten, time, in flying!

For that city he is sighing.

E. NEWLIN STOUT.

Strikes Not Invited.

A few years ago a pamphlet on the best methods of settling the difficulties between capital and labor fell into the hands of D. N. Burke, who was at that time United States Consul at Malaga, Spain and led him to write an account of two cotton mills that stood side by side in that city. For forty years one of them had been distracted by strikes, while in the other, employing about 2,000 operatives, for all that time there had been harmony and mutual confidence between employer and employes. In a letter to the "American Humane Educational Society," he writes:

"How, during all these years, in which so many changes have taken place, has there been no strike, no grumbling, no unrest, no complaints, no whisper of discontent? Have higher wages been paid in this mill than in the other? No. Have the hours of labor been fewer? No. Has the work been less laborious or fatiguing than in the other? No. Is there a different class of persons employed in this mill than the other? No. It is simply this: Don Carlos Larios, the owner of the mill and the employer of the operatives, has applied the law of kindness to his employees. He, in fact, substituted the law of kindness for the practice of greed. If an employee was sick, he sent a doctor to look after him and paid for the necessary medicines. In case the employee's illness continued, he paid on recovery the wages the person would have received had he or she been at work during the time. In case of the death of the employee, the wages went to the family of the deceased, and besides, if the circumstances of the family were such as to require it, he defrayed the expenses of burial. When his operatives married, he helped to "set them up" in housekeeping by presenting to the married couple several household articles which are indispensable for those entering such a state. Extraordinary diligence and care on the part of the employee in his or her work, or greater activity displayed by an operative, was duly recompensed in some way at some time by the proprietor of the mill; and every operative being aware of this sought to do his very best"—Our Dumb Animals.

To this we add the following from "Social Service": "Capitol, labor and conscience, with the knowledge that we are our brother's keeper, must eventually bring all right-minded employers to the conviction that the personal welfare of their employees will assuredly be financially profitable in their business relations, as well as the satisfaction to their consciences in having ameliorated and benefited their fellowman"

Family Discipline a Century Ago.

Little Johnnie was an only son and the pet of his older sisters, as well as the joy and pride of his parents, and indeed of the whole parish. He was almost invariably remembered in the generous gifts brought to the parsonage, and a cake and a big red apple or a saucer of pumpkin pie was almost sure to be brought for "Master Johnnie."

When he was about four years old he was invited with his father and mother to spend the day with some wealthy parsonage, who had also an only son about Johnnie's age.

It was a grand dinner and other distinguished guests were there. But Henry, unlike his little visitor, was accustomed to rule his household. The pudding was very nice and according to the prevalent custom was placed upon the table at the beginning of the meal.

"I want my pudden" vociferated young Henry. He was hushed for a time with lumps of sugar and a good deal of cajoling. But the family could pay little attention to their guests. It soon became, "I will have my pudden." With cries and kicks he soon let himself down from his high chair and lay upon the floor and screamed. This could not be borne and the mother hushed the cries with, "There, there, Henry! Be a good boy and don't cry anymore and you shall have your pudding." His plate was filled and quiet was restored.

Little Johnnie looked on with wonder and evident admiration. Here was a hero and a conqueror, his thoughtful face seemed to say, though he did not put it in those words. The next morning at breakfast Johnnie didn't want his usual porringer of nice bread and milk. He wanted something which he knew he had not been allowed to have. With a little fear and trembling he declared "I will have it." His parents looked their astonishment, but watched the game. Presently he too kicked and screamed, and then scrambled down from his high chair and lay upon the floor in the most approved fashion.

His mother rose calmly from the table, took Master Johnnie by his head and heels, carried him to an adjoining room and laying him upon the floor said, "I thought we brought our little boy home with us last night. If we made a mistake and brought Henry we will leave him here till they send for him." She went out and shut the door. Johnnie pounded on the door and kicked and cried for a few minutes.

Then all was still. After a time there was a tiny, timid knock. "Who is there," asked the mother. "It is your dear little boy, come back again."

Johnnie was in his mother's arm, sobbing his sorrow and asking to be forgiven, and as he told us himself in his old age, "It was the first and the only time that I ever tried to manage my mother." Sarah French Abbott.

The Dukhobors.

Joseph Barcroft, of Cambridge, in the London Meeting for Sufferings, told of his recent visit to the Dukhobor settlements in Canada. These emigrants are now planted out in villages over a district embracing 2,500 square miles. He had been in about half these villages. The majority of the cottages had two rooms, large and a small, and are built of wood, but otherwise not unlike the cottages of Ireland or Scotland. In many cases more than one family would be in the one cottage, where the men were away either working at a distance or in exile in Siberia. Some of the villages are organized on a communal basis of property, others on an individualistic. So far as experience yet shows, there is little in favor of either as superior to the other in outward prosperity. In most there is still poverty; but in certain areas this is not destitution. The most backward district is that of the Cyprus emigrants, who seem less pushing and enterprising, or else have had circumstances more against them. The great question now, however, is that of education. The real aim of J. Barcroft's journey was to ascertain how far there is an opening for educators if these were forthcoming. He visited a colony of seven villages where two women Friends had lived for a couple of months, and for a month one of these had held a school. It was opened on the basis of a teacher who spoke no Russian and some forty scholars who spoke no English. Yet at the end of four weeks a number of the children, both boys and girls, could understand and read and write easy sentences in English, could do simple multiplication fairly, addition less readily, and subtraction rather faultily. His impression was that neither the teacher nor scholars were backward, and that there is material well worth educating. The Dukhobors have especially good memories, due perhaps to the habit of committing so large a part of the Psalter to memory. He found other colonies also anxious for the opportunity of learning English.

The heavy burden upon even the most backward colonies is largely due to the lack of education, and consequent inability to understand their relationship to others. This burden could be relieved if some would take the trouble to educate them. He did not profess that education alone would cure their ills, but it would open the way for that knowledge of their neighbor which would broaden their lives in every way. Are there any in this country who will help to bear the burden of these poor people? In conclusion, he could testify from his own experience to the fulfilment of the promise, "Commit thy way unto the Lord, and He will bring it to pass."

John Bellows repeated that what is wanted is one or more Friends who would take up this work as a real religious service—some young women Friends, perhaps, who would go and train a few Dukhobor girls to become teachers amongst their people. They are, however, so suspicious of Government influence that they will not accept State assistance even or education.

M. A. Marriage Allen hoped Friends would feel this service laid upon them. She knew from experience in Cyprus that the children are not backward in learning, and has still the names of some boys who seemed to show capacity for being teachers.

Samuel Rogers, of Toronto, said the Canadian Government is really desirous to help the Dukhobors, and to that end anxious they should learn English.

The Title "Society of Friends."

To the Editor of the [London] Friend:

Dear Friend:—Thy correspondent "Enquirer" has opened up an interesting question. I send herewith such information as I have ready to hand on the subject, and perhaps other correspondents may be able to follow it up.

George Whitehead, in his "Christian Progress," speaking of the year 1654, uses the term "Friends" repeatedly, and it was used at a very early date by George Fox and others. The Yearly Meeting's Epistle of 1682 begins "Dear Friends and Brethren," and the word "Friends" with a capital letter is freely used. The Epistle of 1684 is headed "Yearly Meeting of Friends." In the first volume of sufferings, from which Besse compiled his work, I find these words: "In these two volumes are some of ye sufferings (being many more and great) of ye people of God (now vulgarly and scornfully called Quakers, first called Ye Children of Light)," &c. In the first Yearly Meeting minute-book is a letter dated sixteenth of Eleventh Month, 1668, commencing with the words "Deare friends." There is also the expression "friends at London," and "friend were considering," and "friends are generally well here." The Yearly Meeting minutes commence with the year 1672, and I find the words "At a General Meeting of Friends for the Nation."

Marriage certificates that I have looked at between 1687 and 1715 speak of the "People o God called Quakers." Some from 1737 to 176 use the expression "People called Quakers. The marriage Regulations in 1861 have the words "Friends, commonly called Quakers, and in 1873 the Marriage Regulations use the words "Our Religious Society."

The 1834 edition of the Book of Discipline seems to be the one that first has "Religious Society of Friends" in its title-page.

Turning to Joseph Smith's Catalogue, under the heading "Friends" I find the words "Society of Friends" freely used after 1790; but Society is also used in 1780 in a title "A Short Vindication of the Religious Society of the People called Quakers" (vol. i: p. 766).

Looking back amongst broadsides, &c., I find an address of the Morning Meeting, 1777, containing the words "Our Society;" 1770, paper put out by Mary Hinde "To Such of the Society, 1765, again in an official document put out by the Two Weeks' Meeting, I find "Practice of the Society." In 1737 in "Seven Queries proposed in print by Friends in Ireland, &c., I find the words "Good of the whole Society." In 1716 in a very neat little speech made by George Whitehead in presenting an address to George I., he speaks of the "Annual Assembly held for the Religious Concern of their Society" (see Whitehead's "Christian Progress," p. 686).

It is evident the word "Society" was used more or less all through last century, but does not appear frequently on the official documents, which generally speak of the "People called Quakers."—Thine sincerely,

ISAAC SHARP

DEVONSHIRE HOUSE, 12, Bishops gate Without,
London, E. C., Third Month 8th, 1900.

The only good name worth having is that which blossoms from a good life.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

What Paul Learned.

Paul, as Saul of Tarsus, was a diligent scholar. Like as Moses became learned in the wisdom of the Egyptians so did Saul in that of the Greeks. But, being a Jew, his father sent him up to Jerusalem to a famous doctor of the Law, Gamaliel, to be instructed in the Divine laws as given by Moses. How well he learned, how zealous he became, his career soon showed. The followers of Jesus, whom Pilate at the Jews' demand had crucified, were becoming numerous; and the rulers of the Jews had hoped to have crushed forever this sect (as they called it) when they had caused the death of Jesus. But those who believed Jesus to be the Christ, the promised Anointed King and Saviour, upheld by a power explicable to the Jews, not only promulgated His teachings in Jerusalem, but persecuted those who fled, spreading the doctrines to far off Gentile cities. Saul of Tarsus knew one of these, where Greek culture was in high esteem; and there, like as in a quiet field, a flock of Jesus' disciples flourished and increased. Here was at Antioch these Greeks recognizing a religion in them distinct from Judaism, first called them after Christ Jesus, "Christians," because they themselves claimed that Christ lived to them of his spirit, which made them what they were.

Obtaining letters from the rulers of the Jews as a warrant to arrest these and bring them bound to Jerusalem to be scourged in the synagogue, Saul with his attendants sets out, like a sheriff and his posse, in our day. No better fitted officer for the purpose could they have chosen. Learned, zealous, at home in Hebrew or in Greek, in Moses' law or that of Syria, "verily thinking within himself that he did God service;" he now draws near to Antioch fully equipped. At Jerusalem, foremost in persecution, though yet but a young man, the witnesses of the death of Stephen, the proto-martyr, laid down their garments at his feet; nor was Saul, as Ananias said, unknown in Antioch, and all who knew did fear.

But One, whose omniscient eye had seen and known him, ere as a babe Saul hung upon the breast, and by whose grace he had attained to manhood and goodly gifts, beholds him; but still as yet, like gentle Samuel, knew not the Lord, only as he had learned of man; and now he finds he had learned all wrong. His pride and haughtiness laid low, his anger subdued, "trembling and astonished" when amidst a blinding light, like as Moses at the burning bush, he heard a voice calling him by name, "Saul! Saul!" Deeply humbled in this near approach to Divinity, well might Saul ask, "Who art thou, Lord?" and Jesus revealed Himself to Saul as Him whom Saul did persecute, whilst worrying his harmless sheep and babes. Christ's glory, too great for human eyes, had left Saul blind, and for three days and nights he tasted nothing, till a servant of the Lord, Ananias, was sent to preach the Lord Jesus, to open Saul's eyes, and that he might be filled with the Holy Ghost, as a chosen vessel to carry the glad tidings of salvation to the off kings and peoples.

But Saul, when changed in name as in nature, and called Paul, had yet very much to learn of Christ. Nor did he go to man, for had he not done so before? And had now to unlearn all. God soon led him, as He did his servant Moses, into the quiet solitudes of Arabia, and there He taught him, as Paul says. "But I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man. For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it but by the revelation of Jesus Christ" (Gal. i: 11, 12). God was now his teacher by his Spirit, like as, ere sin had blighted God's creation, Adam walked holy with God in Eden's garden, with free access to the tree of life; and Paul now learnt that in this newer dispensation, as God's prophet spoke, "all shall be taught of God."

Like as Moses was a servant sent of God to Israel, so now Paul is sent of Christ as his servant to the far off Gentiles, for "Is He the God of the Jews only? is He not of the Gentiles also? Yes, of the Gentiles also" (Rom iii: 30).

Paul then had learned in himself that though richly endowed with natural gifts, having had access to all the sacred writings of the Jews, having sat under the most famous teacher and expounder of the Holy Scriptures, zealous in himself to know and to do the Divine will as made known in the Scriptures, he had found after all, to his sorrow and grief, that he could not find in these that peace in his conscience toward God which he so earnestly sought, but when through faith and God's revelation of himself through Christ in his appearing to him, and by his teaching him by his spirit, Paul found peace and joy inexpressible. Now in his love to Jesus and in love to his fellow-man, no hardships were too great, no dangers but he could brave them, to bring others to what he himself enjoyed. Many were the lessons he had yet to learn, but how well he learned, how faithfully he obeyed, the end tells it all, when he solemnly declares, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous judge shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing" (2 Tim. iv: 7, 8).

(To be continued.)

HOW PINS ARE MADE.—First, a reel of brass wire is taken of suitable thickness. The wire passes over a straightening board, after which it is seized by two jaws, and a cutter descends and cuts it off, leaving a projecting part for a head. On the withdrawal of the cutter a hammer flies forward and makes a head on the pin; then the jaws open and the pin drops on a finely ground metal plate, with the heads upward, until the end to be pointed comes into contact with a cylindrical roller with a grinding surface, which soon puts a fine point on the pins. They then fall into a box ready to receive them, and are ready for the second stage. After they are yellowed, or cleaned, they are tinned, or whitened, as it is called. The pins are now ready to be placed in papers. One girl feeds a machine with pins, and another supplies the machine with paper. The pins fall into a box, the bottom of which is made of small, square steel bars, sufficiently wide apart to let the shank of the pin fall through, but not the head. As soon as the pins have fallen through the bottom of the box and the rows are complete, the bottom detaches itself, and row after row of pins is sent at regular intervals to be placed in the papers.—Christian Work.

"Make Us a Speech."

A tramp asked for a free drink in a saloon. The request was granted, and when in the act of drinking the proffered beverage, one of the young men present exclaimed:

"Stop! Make us a speech. It is a poor liquor that doesn't unloosen a man's tongue." The tramp hastily swallowed the drink, and as the rich liquor coursed through his blood, he straightened himself and stood before them with a grace and dignity that all his rags and dirt could not obscure.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I look to-night at you and myself, and it seems to me I look upon the picture of my lost manhood. This bloated face was once as young and handsome as yours. This shambling figure once walked as proudly as yours, a man in the world of men. I, too, once had a home and friends and position. I had a wife as beautiful as an artist's dream, and I dropped the priceless pearl of her honor and respect in the wine-cup, Cleopatra-like, saw it dissolve and quaffed it down in the brimming draught. I had children as sweet and as lovely as the flowers of spring, and saw them fade and die under the blighting curses of a drunkard father. I had a home where love lit the flame upon the altar and ministered before it, and I put out the holy fire, and darkness and desolation reigned in its stead. I had aspirations and ambitions that soared as high as the morning star, and broke and bruised their beautiful wings, and at last strangled them, that I might be tortured with their cries no more. To-day I am husband without wife, a father without a child, a tramp with no home to call his own, a man in whom every good impulse is dead. And all swallowed up in the maelstrom of drink."

The tramp ceased speaking. The glass fell from his nerveless fingers and shivered it into a thousand fragments on the floor. The swinging doors pushed open and shut again, and when the little group about the bar looked up the tramp was gone.—Selected.

"THOU wilt think, perhaps I am expressing myself rather earnestly; but it is indeed my conviction that from despising the day of small things many have fallen by little and little; and that, if ever these rise again to usefulness in our Society, it must be by close attention to what they are too apt to consider minor particulars, which, in my view of them, are only portions of a chain from which, whether we apply the figure to a law of nature or grace, whatever link we strike disorganizes the whole."—Jonathan Hutchinson.

"AND thou, Solomon, my son, know thou the God of thy father, if thou serve Him with a perfect heart and a willing mind, He will be found of thee, but if thou desert Him, He will cast thee off forever." It is the transgression of the Divine law in the soul and disobedience to the light of truth, as therein manifested, that occasions the withdrawal of the Holy Spirit, and the casting off forever. It is the refusal of man to let the Lord have dominion over him, and reign and rule in his heart that causes the desertion of grace.—Selected.

In life, troubles will come, which seem as if they would never pass away. The night and the storm look as if they would last forever, but the calm and the morning can not be stayed; the storm in its very nature is transient.—George MacDonald.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The election for President and Vice-President of the United States, on the 6th inst., resulted in the election of McKinley and Roosevelt, the Republican nominees for President and Vice-President.

The reply of the State Department to the Anglo-German note respecting the maintenance of the territorial integrity of China and open trade in the coast and river ports of that country, reiterates the adherence of the American Government to these principles as declared in previous notes to the Powers.

Statistics given of actions in the Philippine Islands from Second Month 4th, 1899, to Sixth Month 30th, 1900, show 33 officers and 476 men killed and 147 officers and 2076 men wounded.

A grand total of $338,000,000 of exports of manufactures in the nine months ending with Ninth Month, 1900, is reported, which is three times as great as in the corresponding months of 1890, and nearly two and one-half times as great as in the same months of 1895.

In competition with European manufacturers an American steel company, has obtained an order for $5,000,000 worth of rolling stock for South African railways.

Dr. H. V. Hilprecht has recently returned to Philadelphia from an expedition which has been carrying on excavations at Nippur, in ancient Babylonia, about seventy miles south of Bagdad. In a large mound rising 100 to 200 feet above the desert, has been found an ancient temple of Bel or Baal, containing thousands of tablets recording the history of dynasties running back to 4000 years B. C. The value of this discovery Dr. Hilprecht says can hardly be overestimated. The library of clay tablets contained writings not only in the character used 2200 years before the Christian era, which were the very latest tablets in the library, but the majority were in the cuneiform characters peculiar to the more ancient writings. They cover every branch of the literature of that early period, long before the day of Abraham, and tell of a civilization of which no word has come down to us.

Big Bald Knob, on the border line of Bedford and Somerset counties, 3000 feet above sea level, has been ascertained by E. Matley, a Pennsylvania Railroad engineer, to be the highest point in Pennsylvania.

United States Indian Agent Shoefelt, in charge of the Union Agency, whose jurisdiction comprises the five civilized tribes in the Indian territory, protests in his annual report against the unlawful occupation of the Indian lands and urges rigid Congressional legislation to protect the Indian citizens against the encroachment of aggressive and grasping whites. Of 2000 complaints filed against non-citizens by Indians in the past fiscal year, a large majority were against white men who in the past had intruded themselves upon the Indians and had gained their confidence to a sufficient degree to secure possession of their prospective allotments, and after having secured possession refused either to pay rent or to vacate, thus preventing the Indians from receiving any rents or profits therefrom. Many of the Indians are too poor to institute suit for possession and therefore are left helpless. The total population of the "Five Civilized Tribes" is estimated at 84,750, comprising 20,250 Choctaws and freedmen, 10,500 Chickasaws and freedmen, 16,000 Creeks and freedmen, 35,000 Cherokees and freedmen and 3000 Seminoles, and their lands comprise a total of 19,776,286 acres.

The total population of the United States is 76,295,220, an increase of 13,225,461 in the past ten years, or nearly 21 per cent. The population of Pennsylvania is 6,301,365, an increase of 1,043,351 in ten years. The number of Indians, exclusive of those in the Indian Territory is 145,282. The population of the State of Vermont, as announced by the Census Bureau, is 343,611, against 332,422 in 1890. This is an increase of 11,219, or 3.3 per cent.

It is said that during the present century 400 human lives, $125,000,000 and 200 ships have been lost in fruitless efforts to find the North Pole.

The Auditor of the Post-office Department for the year ending Sixth Month 30th, 1900 shows that the total revenues for the Department for that period were $102,354,579 and the expenditures $107,219,298, leaving a deficit of $4,864,718. The report shows that while the population of the country has increased 19 to 1 in 110 years, and the wealth of the people 40 to 1, the number of post-offices has increased 1000 to 1 and the revenues of the service 2700 to 1.

Smallpox has broken out on a number of Indian reservations in the West, and it is feared that when the cold weather sets in the epidemic will become more widespread and assume a more malignant form. Every effort is making to stay its progress, and the Indian Bureau is forwarding vaccine virus to the various agencies.

In the report of General Randall, commanding the Department of Alaska he devotes considerable space to the natives of Alaska, and says that the Esquimaux has been unnoticed by those he has befriended, and has been allowed to die for the lack of proper care and food. For years he has extended his hospitality to adventurous white men, and his hut has been the shelter for shipwrecked sailor and frost-bitten miner. From all points, Cape York, Port Clarence, Topek, Galofin Bay, Ynkon River and elsewhere, reports have been received of sickness, starvation and mortality so great that it promised to wipe out almost the entire race. In closing this particular feature of his report, General Randall says: "In many parts of the United States provision has been made for the Indian. Reservations have been set apart for him, and food and clothing supplied. In Alaska it was not necessary heretofore to do much, but the great rush of white men that followed the discoveries of gold has completely changed everything. The game and fur-bearing animals have about disappeared and the natives' means of sustenance are gone. I therefore recommend that the Government afford some relief to the natives until such time as they can take care of themselves."

There were 376 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 20 less than the previous week and 5 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 196 were males and 180 females; 46 died of consumption; 35 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 18 of diphtheria; 12 of apoplexy; 12 of cancer, and 7 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 9 1/4 c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.30 to $2.50; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.35 to $3.50; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.65; spring, straight, $3.65 to $3.90; city mills, straight, $3.45 to $3.65.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 73 1/4 to 73 1/2. No. 2 mixed corn, 42 1/2 to 43 c. No. 2 white oats, clipped, 28 to 28 1/2 c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5 1/2 to 5 3/4 c.; good, 5 to 5 1/2 c.; medium, 4 1/2 to 4 3/4 c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4 1/4 to 4 1/2 c.; good, 3 3/4 to 4 c.; common, 1 1/4 to 2; spring lambs, 3 to 5 1/2 c.

HOGS.—Best Western, 7 to 7 1/4 c.

FOREIGN.—The Chinese Minister at Paris has cabled to Emperor Kwang-Su, urging him to return to Pekia, pointing out that it would greatly facilitate the peace negotiations.

Private letters from German soldiers in China tell of frightful tortures and slaughter of Chinese in battles by German troops. No quarter was given. The scenes are said to be indescribable.

From all the evidence obtainable, it appears certain that the Dowager Empress was the actual instigator of the recent troubles in China, and this is the view taken by the allied Powers, who seem practically united on the proposition that the Empress Dowager must not further participate in the affairs of China, and that she must be removed to a point where she will exercise no influence upon the Imperial Government.

By the unanimous verdict of the foreign Ministers at Pekia, eleven high Chinese officials, including Prince Tuan, are condemned to death. Three of the Boxer leaders have already taken their own lives.

The agents of the American Bible Society in Shanghai states that the total number of Protestant missionaries and their children known to have been massacred, as the result of the anti-foreign movement in China, and concerning whose deaths there cannot be a reasonable doubt, is 93. Protestant converts killed are numbered by the thousand. Fifty-five Catholic missionaries are reported as killed and in the northern provinces, including Manchuria; between 15,000 and 20,000 Catholic converts were murdered by the Boxers.

By means of Marconi's instruments the Belgian packet steamer Princess Clementine, while nearing Dover pier on the 3rd instant, exchanged words with Ostend across nearly fifty miles at sea. The only connection between the ship and shore was a wire hoop at the topmast. When the Belgian authorities have formally approved the system of wireless telegraphy, it will be extended to all other Belgian packets.

Before a meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science in the Ninth Month, W. H. Preece announced that he had been able by wireless telegraphy to convey audible speech six to eight miles across sea without wires.

The City Imperial Volunteers, returning from South Africa, marched through London on the 29th ult., along streets packed by thousands, and received a tumultuous greeting. There were 4,000 police and 22,000 troops duty along the line of march, but they were unable to manage the crowds, and the occasion was transformed by drunken men into a scene of extraordinary violence during which many persons were injured and several killed.

A severe earthquake has recently occurred at Caracas, Venezuela, killing fifteen persons, injuring many others and doing great damage to property.

According to Yokohama advices the Buddhists of Japan are making great efforts to celebrate the beginning of the new century by active missionary work.

An enterprising farmer in Switzerland has turned the force of a convenient stream into power, and generated an electric current strong enough to run a planing machine, a fruit crusher, a threshing machine and a pump. The peasants come from miles around to gaze in astonishment at a farmhouse and stable brilliantly illuminated with electric lamps of sixteen and thirty-two candle power.

RECEIPTS.

Received from S. E. Hunt, N. J. $2, vol. 74; Geo. Sykes, Agent, England, £21 5 shillings, being 10 s. e. for himself, Mary Ashby, John Anderson, Robert Bigle, John Bellows, R. B. Brockbank, Birmingham Free Reading Society, R. H. Clark, A. Cheal, Stephen Cumland, Thomas Francis, William Graham, W. B. Gibb, Jane Hall, William Knowles, Elizabeth Knowles, Thomas Knowles, J. A. Braithwaite, W. J. LeTall, Joseph La W. C. McKeane, Anna Moorhouse, Wm. R. Nash, David Pickard, George Pitt, John Sykes, Eliza M. Southall, J. Shield, Isaac Sharp, James Stewart, F. B. Sainty, C. Thomson, John Wood, Lucy W. Walker, J. H. Wall, F. E. Wright, William Williamson and Ellen K. Watkin, and 5 shillings each for E. and G. Brodrib and James Smeal, and 14 s. 5 d. for P. T. Moffat, 14 s. 4 d. for J. Thompson, and 13 s. for T. de Chrouschoff.

NOTICES.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage will run trains leaving Philadelphia 7.17 and 8.19 A. M., and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when requested. Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., twenty cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, Westtown Station or West Chester, Phone 85.

EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Sup.

WITH the approval by Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting of a religious concern of William C. Allen, a meeting for Divine worship is appointed to be held in Western District Meeting-house, on Twelfth Street below Market Street, Fourth-day, Eleventh Month 14th, at 7.45 P. M.; at which Friends and attenders generally, including especially younger members, are invited to be present.

Public Meeting Lansdowne, Pa.

A meeting for worship is appointed by authorized Chester Monthly Meeting, Pa., to be held in the meeting-house at Lansdowne, Pa., Fifth-day evening, the 11th inst., at eight o'clock.

Friends' Library, 142 N. Sixteenth St., Pa.

Open on week-days from 11.30 A. M. to 2 P. M. and from 3 P. M. to 6 P. M.

The following books have been added to the journal collection:—

- BLAISDELL, A. F.—Stories from English History.
BROOKS, E. S.—True Story of Lafayette.
CHAFLIN, F. P. and Humphrey, F. A.—Little Folks of other Lands.
COCHRANE, Robert.—Four Hundred Animal Stories.
EDDY, S. J.—Friends and Helpers.
LONG, W. J.—Ways of Wood Folk.
MARDEN, O. S.—Winning Out.
RHOADES, L. I.—Story of Philadelphia.
SANFORD, D. P.—Little Folks at Brookside.
TAPPAN, E. M.—In the Days of Alfred the Great.

DIED, at the residence of his brother-in-law, Joseph B. Woods, near Mt. Gilead, O., Tenth Month 20th, 1900, STEPHEN JACKSON, a member of Springville Meeting in his eighty-fourth year. Himself and wife had at Ohio Yearly Meeting at Barnesville, O., and on the turn home stopped here for a visit among relatives, he was seized with typhoid pneumonia.

—, at Cragmoor, New York, Eighth Month 1900, HANNAH B. WRAY, widow of Joseph B. Wray, daughter of the late James and Lydia B. Kite, in her fourth year of her age; a beloved member and officer of New York Monthly Meeting.

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, ELEVENTH MONTH 17, 1900.

No. 18.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,
No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,
PHILADELPHIA.

South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth.)

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

MILITARISM A MENACE TO HUMANITY.— Making of "inconceivably cruel crimes committed upon native men and women" in China in South Africa by Germany's officials,—similar barbarities are reported of those other countries claiming the name of Christ,—the Nation says:

The truth is, that the magnificent German army machine built up on blind obedience and brute force. It is practically impossible to punish a crueler unless he commits murder, and their complete power over their men leads to inevitable moral deterioration on the part of the officers. The whole of the army—of militarism at its height—menace to the development of the people along with civilization and humanity, and its results are a fearful price to pay for the satisfaction of having a better army than some other nation. Officers trained in this school are placed in authority over the bodies and souls of dark-skinned peoples thousands of miles from the social, legal and moral restraints of the Fatherland, there is no other outcome to be expected."

THE POPE'S EXALTATION OF THE REDEEMER.

News comes from Rome this month that the Pope has addressed to the bishops an encyclical on the Redeemer. He exhorts the world to seek the Redeemer, which, the Pontiff says, is the road to truth and life, add-

As Christ's coming to the world reformed so the latter, in turning to Christ, will be better and be saved by following his doctrines. Divine law, by discountenancing revolt against constituted powers and avoiding conflicts."

If the peoples acted so," the encyclical concludes, "they would love one another as brothers and obey peacefully their superiors." Neglect of the Pontiff further says, has led to so many disorders that the peoples are oppressed with intense fears and anguish. He concludes with an appeal to the bishops to make known to the entire world that the Redeemer and Saviour of mankind alone can bring salvation and peace.

By this declaration from the Pope we are reminded of the message which Stephen Grellet was enabled to deliver in person to Pope Pius VII.: "Finally," he says, "as I felt the love of Christ flowing in my heart towards him I particularly addressed him; I alluded to the various sufferings he underwent from the hands of Napoleon; the deliverance granted him from the Lord; and queried whether his days were not lengthened out to enable him to glorify God and exalt the name of the Lord and Redeemer Jesus Christ, as the only Head of the Church, the only Saviour to whom alone every knee is to bow, and every tongue is to confess; that such a confession from him, in his old age, would do more towards the advancement of Christ's kingdom and the promotion of his glory than the authority of all the Popes, his predecessors, was ever able to do; moreover that thereby his sun, now near setting, would go down with brightness, and his portion in eternity would be with the sanctified ones, in the joys of salvation.

"The Pope, while I thus addressed him, kept his head inclined and appeared tender; then rising from his seat, in a kind and respectful manner he expressed a desire that 'the Lord would bless and protect me wherever I go,' on which I left him."

An Unauthorized Exponent.

For some years past we have been gradually ceasing to be disappointed at the assumption so often showing itself, that the proper way to propound Friend's doctrines is to propound the reverse.

Volunteer exponents or explainers of our faith, whether singly or in large parties, have from time to time so explained Quakerism away by piecemeal, that if they were all to be believed, there would now be but little of it left as a body of doctrine. Indeed, in many localities professing our name, the reversal of its tenets and principles would appear to be the one successful church industry. Witness the ministry—once awaiting the Spirit's putting forth, now given out at will, at man's choice and times; once given as freely as received, now hired; once free, now confined to the pastor; worship—once in a silence to be broken only by Divine call, now with silence diligently excluded as so much loss; human priesthood, once abolished, now reclaimed for the conducting of divine services, including the performance of marriages, and supplying the hitherto missing requisite for "sacraments" and ordinances; the abrogation of all our distinctive testimonies with the principles testified for—as plainness, scruple about flattering titles or compliments, and phrases or names not based on truth; skepticism as to the witness for Truth in some quarters and the divinity and sin-bearing of Christ in others; and so on. But for all this, we were not yet quite prepared to see any one, professing to speak for the Society of Friends, announce to the country that for a defensive warfare Friends would generally take up carnal weapons.

Such, however, was the representation made of us by one apparently under our name to a public man conspicuous in the nation. Thereupon an esteemed member has been moved to write for these columns a protest from which (forbearing, as usual, all partisan allusions), we will quote:

"That any one proposing to voice the sentiments of Friends, as a religious body should say, 'We are not non-combatants, and when it comes to maintaining the honor and integrity of the nation, and commanding respect for our loved flag; our people would largely, perhaps as largely as most bodies of Christian workers, respond to their country's call and would combat as loyally as you could wish, any attempt to insult the flag we all so dearly love,' is incomprehensible, to say the least. It is so strangely and flagrantly out of harmony with the whole genius of Quakerism, its doctrines and history for two hundred and fifty years, that on the face of it there are grave suggestions of fraud. For there could scarce be a greater misrepresentation than the attempt to fasten upon the Society such sentiments as are quoted above. . . . When important doctrines are misrepresented by any parties, it becomes our duty to raise our voice in protest."

At the same time an article from the Washington Times has been forwarded to us, entitled "Non-Combatants," aimed at the doctrine that no man not willing to bear arms and fight for his rights can give a good reason why he should be entitled to the privilege of living in a free country," or as the reviewer prefers to characterize it, that

"A man's fists are the most important part of him, more valuable than his brains, or his conscience." He goes on to say:

"A great deal of nonsense has been talked at one time or another about moral courage being higher than physical courage, but that does not change the fact that it is, or interfere with the general statement that one man may be possessed of both kinds. Physical courage, moreover, is not incompatible with a disinclination to fight. It sometimes takes more bravery not to defend one's self than to carry a revolver or become a good boxer. The Quakers of ante-bellum days were wont to risk imprisonment, whipping and death rather than give up their connection with the underground railroad. One of their number was caught assisting a runaway slave, and taken to a Kentucky prison where he spent sixteen years, and received lashes enough to kill a man of less hardy physique. Men who have risked and endured these things are not deficient in physical courage.

"Hannibal Hamlin, during years when his life was constantly threatened, walked the streets of Washington with no other weapon than a cane, though half the men in both houses of Congress went armed. The poet Whittier more than once faced, unarmed, a mob which threatened him with stones and brickbats. The man of high moral ideals and strong intellect is seldom a fighter from choice. He may fight when necessary, but his preference is for logic and persuasion. Since, ultimately, the problems of civilization have to be settled by logic and not by fisticuffs, there is perhaps much reason for his attitude.

"As compared with the crafty, time-serving and cowardly sycophant, the soldier is no doubt a fine figure. There is something about physical strength and endurance which challenges admiration. But it must be joined with higher qualities or it becomes mere brutality. Napoleon was great, not because he was a Hercules, but because of the mighty intellect, the gigantic personality, which made men his slaves. Great soldiers are not blusters, and seldom do they exalt their own calling above that of others. They do not treat with scorn the man who refuses to fight because his conscience forbids him, especially if he happens to live in times which test his courage in another way."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Power.

Power means ability to do. All power is limited but that of God, who is infinite in power. There is then a power of God which nothing can withstand, for He is above all. There is a power of Satan who brings man into the bondage of sin. Man also has power to do according to his will, and as first created could and did glorify his Maker, for man dwelt under God's power and protection. Being tempted, man hearkened to the tempter, and through sin fell from innocence and bliss; and more than that, being enslaved by sin he had no more power to do good nor to please God.

Where God rules is his kingdom—one of life, love, light and glory, righteousness, peace and joy. Where Satan rules is one of death, darkness, hatred, strife and woe. Man is the servant of whomsoever he obeys, whether of sin unto death or of obedience unto life. No man can be in God's kingdom while at the same time he serves Satan, committing sin. No man can serve God and mammon at the same time. Adam abiding in God's presence, was free from sin; going out therefrom his works were evil; so if a man abide in Christ he cannot be free to sin, for the character of sin is unchangeable, and inevitably brings death and separation from God.

Likewise, if a man live under the power of darkness, which all do who continue in sin, the kingdom of Satan, he cannot possibly serve or worship God there, any more than Israel could whilst in the bondage of Egypt. The children of Israel by their own power could not come out from under the bondage of Pharaoh, no more can God's people now of their own free will, for the carnal mind is enmity against God. It was the arm of God's power made bare that brought Israel out of bondage by the hand of Moses as a Saviour. It is God's power now, as manifested through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom alone any man can come from under the bondage of sin into the freedom of Truth and the liberty of the spirit.

God called his people to come out of Egypt that He might lead them into the promised land. Moses forsook its pleasures and honors, choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God. God now offers his salvation to man under the like tender, that men leave the pleasures and lusts of this world wherein Satan's kingdom holds sway, and follow whithersoever the Lamb leadeth them, though it may be into the wilderness. Father, mother, sister, brother, worldly applause and prospects all, all to be forsaken for the sake of Him who calls, saying, "Come, deny thyself, take up thy cross daily and follow me."

It is the power of God's love that draws us to Him. "We love Him because He first loved us." "Whilst yet sinners Christ died for us," and now He subdues our hearts to himself by the power of his love. "I drew them with cords of a man, with bands of love. . . . I laid meat unto them" (Hos. xi: 4). It is none other than He who as the man Christ Jesus was tempted and afflicted as we are, and yet who in his love to us died that we might live, now glorified sitting on his throne of power Divine, comes and knocks at the door of every heart that entering He may spread a table of heavenly meat. It is He, the Alpha and the Omega, the first and the last, the only Saviour of men.

Hast thou heard Him brother, sister, gently calling thee? If so trust Him, for his name is love, his arm is power. "He is able to save to the uttermost all those who come unto God by Him. Out of Satan's kingdom of darkness and sin the opposition of man will vanish as the Egyptians in the waves, and the sea itself with all its proud waves and roaring, will be passed through dry shod. His outstretched arm that upheld Peter on Galilee's wave is the same all powerful arm now around thee. "When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee" (Is. xliii: 2).

After that God had revealed himself to the lad Joseph, and had given to him dreams foretelling future events, God suffered Joseph's brethren to sell him as a slave. He suffered Satan to tempt him and Joseph was thrown into prison. He tried him and proved him and found him faithful. He gave him wisdom to interpret dreams; He exalted him to the power of a throne; and still Joseph was godly, upright, humble and forgiving. Dying, he had an assured hope of his children inheriting the land promised of God. His father Jacob, too, met with the God of Abraham and Isaac at Bethel; he passed on to Syria and there suffered the heat by day and the cold by night, but amidst it all God prospered him, and brought him again to Bethel a prince in power, the Israel of God. And sufferings and trials have been the lot of all who have been called to be sub-shepherds in Israel, for such all Christians should be. David besought that God, who remembered him in all his afflictions; Jeremiah prayed in his dungeon, and Daniel in the lion den; partakers were all these in the suffering of Christ, and so also may we be if we patiently endure what seems meet to God to permit.

Let patience have her perfect work that may come out of every trial like as a vessel out of the furnace, fit for use.

Immanuel, God with his people, the same yesterday, to-day and forever,—He will not suffer them to be tempted above what He is able them to bear; He will not let man destroy the work of his hands, for men may hurt the body but cannot hurt the soul. Being tried and found faithful He will give to them a crown of grace and glory, and make them inheritors in the kingdom of God.

"God hath spoken once: twice have I heard this; that power belongeth unto God." David in Ps. lxxii: 11. In this power of God David whilst a youth slew the lion and the bear, and Goliath the giant who defied Israel and Israel's God. Going forth in "the name of the Lord" he slew him, and afterwards, as king, twice he smote the Philistines in the valley of Rephaim. Jesus our King, Anointed of God, as the Captain of our salvation, conquered Satan and death, and now calls men to freedom that they may engage in a holy warfare, against their fellow-men, but against the very lusts in ourselves from whence all wars and rebellions against God's laws arise. "Every battle of the warrior is with confusion; noise and garments rolled in blood, but his shall be with burning and full of fire" (Is. 5). Christ's freedom is one from the bondage of sin, one of truth from error, one of love and tenderness of heart from a hard, hateful and revengeful spirit. God in power as a consuming fire goes through these briars and thorns in the wilderness of men's hearts, and by his baptism of the Holy Ghost and of fire destroys all these, clears up the fallow-ground and sows the good seed of "the kingdom of God, which is in righteousness, in peace, and in joy of the Holy Ghost."

"RELIGION which is an acquaintance with God in spirit, is the noblest principle which man is capable of. But the activity and energy of it is not at man's command. We are to be quiet, passive, and not seek to stir up our Beloved till He please. Let us abide at home (in the house) till intelligence arrives, that the Master is come and calleth for us. Men willing and running of themselves are ignorant of the knowledge of religion as they do after discoveries in natural science, bewilder themselves and effect nothing that is profitable. Patiently wait and quietly hope is the lesson we should learn. How dry and like ashes our minds are, when the flame of religion (I mean the active, present virtue of it) is extinct." Richard Shackleton.

"MOTHER," said a child, "I have found God." "Where have you found Him?" asked her mother. "In heaven," said the little one in reply. Her elder sister laughed at her and asked, "Well, Phebe, have you been to heaven?" "No," the child said, "but the kingdom of heaven has come to me."

The Captain's Vow.

I was traveling, many years ago, on a stage-coach. One of the passengers, a sea-captain, told how in a dreadful storm his vessel had been wrecked, and every soul on board except himself and one or two sailors had been lost. He had saved his life by holding on to a plank, and was at the mercy of the waves for a considerable time. The company pitied the unfortunate captain, who was returning home to a family destitute; but they wondered that a man telling of an escape almost miraculous could end almost every sentence with an oath. When the coach stopped to change horses, one of the passengers proposed to the captain to walk on with him and let the coachmen undertake them. As they walked the gentleman said, "Did I understand you last night that you had lost your ship?"

"Yes."

"That all your crew were drowned except yourself and one or two sailors?"

"Yes."

"That you saved your life on a plank?"

"Yes."

"Forgive me, then, for asking you one question more. When on that plank did you not look to God that if He would spare you, you would lead a very different kind of life?"

"None of your business!" said the captain, angrily.

The coach by this time came up, and they got up outside. The day passed on without anything occurring to break the journey, and toward evening, as the coach was entering the town, the captain excused himself from joining the rest of the passengers at supper, as he had no money. The gentleman took from his pocket a handsome sum and offered it to him. "No," said the captain, "I am poor, yet I am no beggar."

But," replied the gentleman, "I do not offer it to you as a beggar, but as to an unfortunate brother."

There was kindness in the gentleman's manner which could not be mistaken. The captain could not refuse the gift, but he took it as if it was half ashamed of accepting a benefit.

The captain went home with a heavy heart, and the gentleman retired to rest, thankful that he had helped a suffering brother.

He was surprised the next morning at daylight to hear someone rap at his door. He opened it and beheld the captain standing before him in tears. The captain took his hand, pressed it, and said, "Sir, I have not slept a wink since I saw you. I was angry with you yesterday. I am now come to ask your pardon. I had, while on that plank, vowed to God that I would live differently from what I have ever done, and by God's help from this time forward I am determined to do so." They pressed each other's hands and parted, probably to meet no more in this world.

THE RICH POOR MAN.—William Taylor, in the story of his life, tells of an old colored man who died in the city hospital. "He was a very homely man, and suffered intensely from the 'king's evil,' and I don't know how many other evils, but he had wisdom and was very pious. I saw him frequently, and every time he was as happy. A short time before his death he clasped his hands and shouted the praise of God. Said he, 'The Lord only knows how

I have been pinched with poverty, and what this poor body has suffered; but I am rich; I have an inheritance in heaven. Glory be to God! I shall soon be released from these sufferings and go to my home in heaven.'"

The Christian Nurture of Our Children.

Probably few parents realize the extent of their responsibilities for the formation of their children's characters, or for the success or failure of those children's lives when they grow up. Few understand that it is worth almost any effort, almost any sacrifice, to make the children what they ought to be, and that such effort and sacrifice are but the plain duty of every parent. The work of the teacher is terribly handicapped if he has to lay the foundation instead of building the superstructure. Not only so, but if the foundation has not been properly laid by the parents, a heap of rubbish will have accumulated, which needs to be removed if a proper foundation is to be laid. This applies to all parts of our subject; but as I am now dealing, not with ordinary education, but with specially religious training, I would point out the terrible mistake made by parents who expect teachers to bring their children to Christ when they have made no definite effort to do so themselves. Would that the fathers and mothers of the Society of Friends could realize that Jesus Christ is constantly saying to them, "Suffer the little children to come unto Me," and that if they refuse to be God's instruments in leading their children to the Saviour and definitely seeking their conversion while they are yet very young, they are depriving their children of much of the blessing which God has intended for them, and rendering their whole future life more difficult and more dangerous. I believe God intends every Christian parent to see the answer to his prayers in the definite conversion of his children while they are yet young, and that where this is not realized it is owing to some fault or mistake on the part of the parent. This may seem a hard, perhaps even an unkind saying, but I cannot withhold the expression of my own belief on the subject.

If we are anything better than traditional Quakers, if we care for the principles which God has given us as a society to uphold and to proclaim, we shall long for our children to be enthusiastic for these principles, and to hold them as the result of their own settled convictions. To ensure this we ought definitely to train them as Friends, showing them that we follow our own special practices, not for the sake of singularity, not simply because our forefathers followed them, not because they please our taste, but because we believe that by doing so we are pleasing the Lord and Master of our lives, who has the right to control all our thoughts, all our words, and all our actions. We shall be more eager to make our children zealous workers for Christ and for his church, than successful men of business or successful citizens. Not that these are unimportant, or that we should neglect any right training which would qualify them to conduct their business or their public life in a manner worthy of the disciples of Jesus, but we should train them to care for their church life more than for worldly ends, and to think the welfare of the church an object worth living for. How can we do this if we ourselves put other objects in the first place, and are only half-hearted in maintaining and extending the work of the Society of Friends? Actions speak louder than words, and our children will be quick to mark the insincerity of our professions if we try and teach them to do what we do not practice ourselves.

The Society of Friends is more dependent on voluntary efforts than most other bodies. Preaching, praying, personal visitation, spiritual oversight, and many other services, are in theory performed by all spiritually-minded members, each taking that share in the service which God may allot to him. The Society of Friends holds, not that we have no pastors, but that all are to place themselves at God's disposal to be used in pastoral work as He shall appoint. It holds, not that we have no preachers, but that all are ready to respond to God's call when He bids them testify for Him. But often this truth has been forgotten, and Friends have lapsed into a condition of spiritual laziness not very different from that of those who do their religion by proxy, and expect one priest or one minister to do the work which ought to be shared by the whole congregation. We have no right to forget that God still gives "some to be apostles, and some prophets, and some evangelists, and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, unto the work of ministering, unto the building up of the body of Christ." Each gift received should be exercised faithfully; and for this faithful service what better preparation can there be than the wise and loving training of sympathizing and whole-hearted fathers and mothers? We must work with our children, and encourage them to work with us, if we are to do our part in providing that the work of the church be carried forward according to the purpose of its Head.

Rightly directed energy means much, but it is not everything; and energy cannot be rightly directed unless it be directed by the Spirit of God. If our Quakerism is worth anything, we shall train our children from their very earliest years to value times of quiet waiting upon God, and to learn to listen to his voice.

If we thus train them while they are little, it will not take them long to appreciate our meetings for worship and to learn to take their right share in them, joining their silent prayers with ours whilst they are still very young; but if they see us impatient of silent waiting, if they notice that we readily accept some excuse to keep us away from meeting, we cannot be their true helpers in that life of holy communion to which God has called us and them.

May He whose voice we profess to listen to, and profess to obey, show us parents our deficiencies, and give us grace and courage to do all that He bids us in the training of our children.—J. B. Hodgkin, in London Friend.

AND if God give thee great faith, my dear brother, thou must expect great trials; for, in proportion as thy faith shall grow, thou wilt have to do more, and endure more. Little boats may keep close to shore, as becomes little boats; but if God make thee a great vessel, and load thee with a rich freight, He means that thou shouldst know what great billows are, and should feel their fury till thou seest "His wonders in the deep."—Spurgeon.

Samuel Tuke—His Life, Works and Thoughts.

(Continued from page 131.)

His life extended over a period of marked progress. It was enriched by rare powers of mental and spiritual discrimination. We have seen how he co-operated with the best efforts of the leaders of reform and of the public welfare. With this fact in mind we can the better appreciate his conscientious insight into subjects which he disapproved. Thus he wrote several papers (in 1844-5) on the influence of the fine arts which some advocated as calculated to promote mental refinement and true civilization.

"History tells us that moral evils have been rampant when the fine arts have been largely cultivated. . . . They have no power to influence in restraining selfishness or raising man to the love of his Creator and fellow-creatures. . . . From the revival of literature in Europe, Italy may be said to have been the seat of the arts, and still many of the works of the inimitable masters are to be found in her beautiful but unhappy country. Alas for her civilization!"

He speaks of our early Friends in this connection, viz: "What moral beauty reigned in those undecorated homes when parents and children were bound together by the strongest ties of domestic affection. . . . Theirs was a genuine perception of and reverence for the majesty and beauty of truth, that divine idealism which alone truly elevates man and feeds and nourishes society in whatever is worthy of the name of civilization among a Christian people."

"Christ taught his disciples that as God is a spirit his worship must be in spirit and in truth. His temple was to be the hearts of his living members, and they, through their Lord and High Priest, had immediate access to their Heavenly Father. In the teachings of the Saviour there was much to show that grace bath use of nature; the dressing of the lily and the provision of the sparrow supply beautiful lessons on the universal providence of the Creator and the trust which his superior creature man might repose in him. No idea, however, appears to have entered the minds of the early disciples that they were to set lilies and sparrows before them, artificially to stimulate their trust and confidence, and it is well known that the absence of all art in their worship was one of the prominent occasions of that contempt which their heathen neighbors, those who were considered the wisest and most enlightened, threw upon them.

"History abundantly shows that as that living faith which is the life-blood of true religion declined, so did men seek by dead forms, pageantries and other varieties of human art to stir up something that was like the living power that had been more or less lost.

"This practice of imitations will be found running through all the history of the church's decline. Art raised up feelings in men's minds which were the imitations of those holy aspirations that came from God and breathed towards Him. The Gospel in its simplicity had been preached to the poor and had wrought its miracles; it had by the accompanying power of Divine grace awakened men's souls, opened blind eyes, and the ear deaf to the sweetness of truth was made to understand the words of eternal life. The changes were inward, but the effects were seen outwardly, and here was the door open for human art to be exercised, and, like the Egyptian sorcerers of old, it did somewhat likewise by its enchantments. All the ingenious arts used to quicken dormant souls to a sense of the heavenly things are but so many counterfeits of truth and seals upon error."

The failure of the potato crop of Ireland in 1845-7 enlisted the sympathy and help of Friends in England and America, so that donations amounting to $970,000 were contributed in the course of three years, and James Hack Tuke visited the districts most affected, distributing aid and devising means for relief. His father was deeply interested in this visit. Indeed, anything that concerned the welfare of that unfortunate island with its degraded and suffering peasantry drew upon his sympathy. Samuel Tuke had written fifteen years before on the causes which have contributed to the impoverishment of that country, viz:

"Whilst rivers of blood and millions of treasure have been sacrificed under pretence of supporting the glory or extending the dominion of our empire, we have, under the guidance of selfishness and tyranny, neglected to improve the finest portion of our territory, and converted that possession into a positive evil, which, under a wiser administration, would have been infinitely more beneficial in the increase of our wealth, our happiness, and our greatness than all our colonies, East and West Indian and American.

"We have often heard the question started in conversation, Why is Ireland so different from England and such a plague to it? and how are its evils to be cured and we relieved from the annoyance and terrors which it is perpetually causing us? Many conjectures have been hazarded in regard to each of these questions.

"We have heard the answer to the first not unfrequently amount to this, that the Irish were an idle, revengeful, intractable people, under the influence of a wicked priesthood. It has been shrewdly suggested that there seemed to be a sort of judicial curse hung about them (perhaps for not embracing Protestantism), but whatever was the cause their state was beyond the reach of cure, unless it should please Providence to submerge the whole island, for half an hour, beneath the green waves that wash its shore! Strange as these things may appear in writing they are no more than we have heard fully expressed, and we have often seen similar views not obscurely floating in the thoughts of men esteemed intelligent, when conversing on the subject of Ireland. Nay, we firmly believe that many a statesman, on whose decisions the destinies of Ireland have in times past rested, bewildered in the labyrinth of a cruel and crooked policy, has scarcely had more distinct views of the cause and nature and cure of Irish evils than are contained in the foregoing statements."

When writing to his son Daniel in 1848 Samuel Tuke expressed his views on social reforms as follows: "My principle is this: That moral evil in men individually is the root of the chief social evils which exist in the world or in nations.

"It is opposed to the principle which is very prevalent at present, that the evils which effect men, individually, are chiefly owing to the action of those who govern them, either materially or through the influence of wealth.

"The latter principle rests upon another namely, that man is inherently good, and that the evil in him as evinced by acts is circumstantial.

"My principle involves an opposite doctrine, namely, that man is by nature prone to indulge himself in things which are not good that he lusteth to evil; and that in the indulgence of natural tendencies he does not obtain that which is best for him in this life, but a multitude of instances runs to wreck an ruin.

"It is a corollary from my principle for the cure of social evils we must look mainly to the means which effect man's moral condition; and, above all, to those which lead him to the recognition of God as a holy, ever present and all-seeing Being, who will judge and reward his rational creatures righteous and in mercy through his own appointed means."

(To be continued.)

What a Beaver Did.

A. D. Bartlett, son of the late Superintendent of the London Zoo, has an interesting story of a captive Canadian beaver, which he relates in The North and West. A large willow tree in the gardens had blown down. A branch about twelve feet long and thirty inches circumference was firmly fixed in the ground in the beaver's inclosure. Then the beaver was watched to see what he would do.

The beaver soon visited the spot, and working around the limb, commenced to bite the bark and gnaw the wood about twelve inches from the ground. The rapidity of progress was astonishing. He seemed to put his whole strength into his task, although left off every few minutes to rest and look upward, as if to determine which way the tree would fall.

Now and then he went into his pond, which was about three feet from the base of the tree. Then he would come out again with renewed energy, and his powerful teeth would set work anew upon the branch.

About four o'clock, to the surprise of those who saw him, he left his work and came hastening toward the iron fence. The cause of this sudden movement was soon apparent. He had heard in the distance the sound of the wheelbarrow, which was brought daily to his pond, and from which he was anxiously expecting his supper.

The keeper, not wishing to disappoint the beaver, although sorry to see his task interrupted, gave him his usual allowance of carrots and bread. The fellow ate it, and was seen swimming about the pool until about half past five. Then he returned to his work.

In ten minutes the "tree" fell to ground.

Afterward the beaver cut the log into three convenient lengths, one of which he used for the under part of his house.

"THERE is much said in a carping way which is far more calculated to arouse the feeling of the natural man and irritate him, than to make the sure witness in his soul and benefit him. Especially are tender children made victims by such a mode of speaking.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

AN APPEAL FOR INDIA.

SARAH D. SEARS.

Ere the sufferers, famine-stricken
Fall beside the way and sicken,
Let our warm life-pulses quicken;
Send them help to-day.
Ere the feeble life-flame smothers
In the fathers and the mothers,
In the sisters and the brothers,
Let us work and pray.

While life's flame so low is burning
To America they're turning,
For our help and pity yearning;
Shall they plead in vain?
Nay! By all that's pure and good
In our manhood, womanhood,
By the golden rule, we should
Send relief from pain.

Sad the scene 'mong many others,
Of the baby-sisters, brothers,
Watching, weeping by their mothers
Fallen by the way;
Watching, deeming she will waken
Who has ne'er their cries forsaken;
Weeping, till themselves are taken,
Each Death's famine-prey.

Or, while they are fallen, sleeping,
Faint with hunger, wroth with weeping,
Taken into kindly keeping
By the rescuers there;
Back to life to come so slowly;
Deem ye not this work is holy,
Working for the poor and lowly
With kind love and care?

Christians, o'er this broad earth dwelling,
By their wants and fears dispelling,
Ye to them are sweetly telling
Of the Saviour dear;
And the old, yet new, sweet story
Of our heavenly home of glory,
Younger, older, those grown hoary,
Will more gladly hear.

England, thou hast double duty.
Rise up in thy power and beauty,
Leave off war with crime and booty,
And make India free
From the famine and the fever.
Use war's millions to relieve her:
Thou the giver, she receiver,
Thou most blest will be.

Better merit Christ's rich blessing
By his children's griefs redressing,
Him in least of his confessing,
Wheresoe'er they are;
Better India's grateful children,
Better earth's admiring millions,
Than the gain of golden billions
By the hand of war.

Use thy thousands for improving
These thy subjects, ever moving
Them to higher plane and proving Nature's gifts are there.
That old mother-earth is holding
Riches vast for man's unfolding;
While the people thou art moulding
For new work and care.

With thy skill and power to guide them,
With thy means before, beside them,
Famine's ills might not betide them
As in by-gone years.
Urging peaceful war with nature
Thou wouldst bless thy fellow-creature,
And increase thy own fair stature
Without strife or tears.

Much hast thou already given;
Well and nobly hast thou striven
That the famine-bonds be riven
Ere thy children die;
But they still are needing more;
Give and thus increase thy store.
They will bless thee o'er and o'er
As the years roll by.

Oh! how blest that time will be
When, o'er every land and sea
Men and nations shall be free,
War and strife shall cease!
Hasten then, oh mother-land
That glad day when nation's stand,
Under arbitration's hand,
Waving flags of peace.

The Value of Toads and Bats.

As a result of experiments with toads and bats, it has been demonstrated that a house, or even a community, can be rid of various troublesome insects, including flies and mosquitoes. These experiments were made by Professor Clinton F. Hodge, of Clark University, Worcester, Mass. Professor Hodge's first experiment was with the toad. "I constructed a small pen in my garden," he said, "and in it, in a pan of water, installed a male and female toad. To attract food for them I placed within the enclosure bits of meat and bone. The results were as satisfactory as they were unexpected. The toads spent most of the time sitting within reaching distance of the bait, and killing the flies attracted by it. I watched one toad snap up eighty-six house flies in less than ten minutes.

"One day I gathered a quantity of rose bugs in a tin box and began to feed the bugs to a toad. At first I did not count, but finding his appetite so good I started to count. When I had counted over eighty bugs and the toad showed no signs of wishing to conclude his meal, I picked him up. Previous to my beginning to count he had taken from ten to twenty bugs. I found the toad equally greedy for rose beetles, canker worms, ants, caterpillars, moths, June bugs, weevils, snails and many other insects. So, too, in a house, a room may be cleared of cockroaches by leaving a toad in it over night.

"A toad may destroy over two thousand worms during the months of May, June and July, and one of these harmless creatures may well do a gardener service to the amount of nineteen dollars and eighty-eight cents each season, and yet he can raise twenty thousand dollars of toads at an expense of not more than twenty cents.

"Farmers in England buy them, paying as high as twenty-four dollars per one hundred, for use in their flower-beds and gardens. For household purposes a small number of toads could be given homes in an aquarium. At night the toads could be let loose to kill bugs, while in the day they could kill flies. I have built a sort of cage or wire screen, a foot wide and two feet long, the top of which is kept open. It is only necessary to put in two or three toads, provide them with shelters, a dish of water in one corner, and then keep it supplied with bits of raw meat and any other refuse matter calculated to attract flies."

In speaking of the bat, Professor Hodge said: "We have no animal more interesting and probably none more valuable, and certainly none less understood and more abused than the bat. They are easily tamed, absolutely harmless when gently handled, and make pets as funny as tiny monkeys. As destroyers of many of our most pestiferous night-flying insects, like mosquitoes, the bat is almost our sole dependence, and, as he is known to hunt insects afoot as well as on the wing, he is also of some value for larvæ that do not fly.

"My attention was turned to the bat through the codlin moth, the insect to blame for most worm-eaten apples. In an orchard near my home I found nine of the grubs of this insect in a minute. Chancing to go into another orchard, hardly a mile away, I found only four of the grubs in an hour's search. There is an old barn near-by, in which live a colony of between seventy-five and one hundred bats. The owner informed me that his apples were always free from worms."—Boston Evening Transcript.

"We Ought to Obey God Rather than Men."

Our position is that if a citizen is faced with a command, or request, of the State which required him to violate what his conscience declares to be a law of God, then he must obey the higher law and withhold obedience from the lower, to which ordinarily he would be entirely subservient, or which he would fully respect and sympathize with. Our correspondent thinks this principle, if followed in times of peace, tends toward anarchy, for it may involve a resistance to the decision of a court. The practical difficulty seems to us slight, for there are but few cases where in such times a sensitive conscience will thus embarrass the citizen. Such cases, however, did occur in ante-bellum days, when conscientious abolitionists gave succor to runaway slaves in spite of the Dred Scott case and Chief Justice Taney's decision. They said, "Whether we should obey you rather than God, judge ye." Nevertheless, anarchy did not occur.

Members of the Society of Friends are a standing example of the same principle, and yet who calls them seditious? In any case the man who follows his conscience rather than the law must be prepared to suffer the consequences and go to jail in time of peace or be shot in time of war if it is so ordained. We do not advance our ideas of loyalty as likely to be "popular," nor do we suppose in some cases they would stand the test of a court-martial. There are some cases where it might be the citizen's duty to resign life itself rather than disobey conscience. Our critic perhaps is familiar with such a history. Will our friend tell us whether there is any other arbiter of a man's actions than [the witness in] his enlightened conscience? We know of no other. The case of a man already enlisted in a military organization is in many respects different from that of the unfettered citizen. He has already resigned to a considerable extent his freedom of action. If called on to go anywhere at his country's call, he must obey, unless he resigns his commission. This he might be unable, under some circumstances, to do. And yet even here if called on to do that which grossly violates his conscience, he should disobey at all costs. At least this is the "higher loyalty," as we have received it.—City and State.

If a man abide not in me he is cast forth as a branch and is withered.—John xv: 6:

Some Account of the Early Experience and Subsequent Travels of Ruth Newlin.

(Continued from page 133.)

Here the regular account was broken off by sickness, and never again resumed, and the curtain falls between us and the inner life of this dear one for some years, except a few notes referring to that time. While it is to be regretted that she was not able to complete the full history with her own pen, as she intended to do, we are glad of this much. The early experience of those who through faith, obedience and patience, have attained to the stature and fulness of strong men and women in Christ, is often very encouraging to others, who may well conclude that no strange thing has happened them, when they are weak, faltering and often cast down with their shortcomings and backslidings. In younger years she had no liberty to divulge her feelings to any one, but in after life she was very free in telling her early experience and even seemed to enjoy dwelling upon the many deliverances from trouble and temptation which had been permitted to assail her from time to time.

Possessing a very sensitive nature, she was subject to greater extremes of feeling either of joy or distress, perhaps, than most. Her baptisms into suffering were as unto death, and when deliverance came, her joy was to the full, almost without alloy. The scripture was often applicable, "Sorrow remaineth for a night, but joy cometh in the morning."

The following notes, found among her papers, may not be out of place here, as they refer back to her earlier years:

Eleventh Month 21st, 1883.—To-day my daughter is forty-one years old. When I call to mind the very precarious state of my health in those years, I am lost in amazement that my life should be lengthened out to the present, while so many near and dear ones are called away in the prime of life. My dear companion has been years and years in glory, and I am still left in this world of sorrow. Oh! Lord, thou hast been my refuge in the day of trouble, and as a mighty rock in a weary land. Thy all-powerful arm has been underneath to support, and thou hast covered my head in the day of battle."

First Month 17th, 1891.—"I am sixty-five years old to-day. When I take a retrospective view of my rebellious life, it is a wonder to me that I was not cut off in my sins. Many years I stumbled at the cross in regard to my apparel, which I was so fond of, and if I had possessed the means, I should have gone to an extravagant length. But the Bishop of souls never left me to my own stubborn will, and in length of years I left off everything I felt condemned for wearing. And my reward for the sacrifice was sweet peace."

Her toilet was always arranged with peculiar neatness and taste, which some were disposed to define as pride. Although the natural propensity to change with the ever-restless tide of fashion had been crucified, and she had adopted a settled mode of dress agreeable to apprehended duty, her native precision remained to be a marked feature in her character. All our peculiarities are not sins, and the great Searcher of hearts can discern between the two, although man in his weakness can not. Our gifts are possessed in earthen vessels "that the excellency of the power may be of God and not of us." Yet the admonition is needful "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity" and even endeavor to subdue as much as in us lies those peculiarities, which grate on the feelings of others and sometimes mar the good that is intended to be done. She ever viewed with sorrow the tendency to depart from our testimony to the world in dress and address. Comparing it to a hedge about us, which when broken down, opened the way for other departures. Thus we would gradually lose the depth of spirituality which has characterized many who have felt called upon, even in minor things, to adhere to the practices as well as the principles which have been long established in our Society. Yet she warned some not to rest in the outward form, which could never save any, with out the inward work of regeneration—the old man with his deeds put off, and the new man, Christ Jesus put on.

"Soon after making an entire surrender in regard to my attire, the call was renewed which had rested on my mind at times for years, that it would be required of me to tell to others the way of life and salvation. Oh! that none may procrastinate the work of the Lord so long as I did, and be so unwilling to obey. The magnitude of the work was so great, and I so unfit every way, I felt at times I would be glad if the concern would be taken from me, and I even went so far as to ask that it might be taken away. And for a while I felt some easier in my mind, and he who is ever the deceiver of mankind, persuaded me to believe I was nearly a Christian, and just as sure as I became entirely given up, then the Lord would take me from my family, which I loved better than my Saviour. So he kept me in this delusion for a whole year, and I became so destitute of the presence of the Most High, that I began to fear I never would be favored with his loving presence any more, and was almost sunk into despair."

Fourth Month 13th, 1878.—"I feel that all within me is humbled down as in the dust and ashes before the Lord, the God of my salvation. Oh! Lord, I desire to be able on all occasions to say, 'Not my will but thine be done.'

"The language that first saluted me this morning was, 'Be not faint-hearted but believing.' Thou alone can enable me to do this. When I am favored to look over my past life in the light of wisdom, I am amazed at the goodness of a long-suffering God, and his great mercy to me; who visited my soul in very early childhood. I have had to remember at times all through my life the solemn impressions which were made on my mind when at meeting at New Garden, Ind., when only five years old."

(To be continued.)

THE home is no place for the scold. It ought ever to be the scene of forbearance, love, charity and affinity. Husband and wife, parents and children should be kind, gentle, responsive and helpful. Thus will be realized the sweetest of joys, the noblest of confidences and the dearest and most enduring of relationships.

MAKE use of time, if thou lovest eternity; know, yesterday cannot be recalled, to-morrow cannot be assured; to-day only is thine.

Salary and Freedom.

[From an article in the Gospel Messenger, so far as it may comport with Friends' view of the nature of the ministry.]

Both are [craved as] desirable things, and yet between the two there is a continual conflict. This is especially true in reference to the ministerial calling. And because of it there is conflict, friction and a longing desire for freedom from the demand that salaries too often make. Between the restraints of creeds and the expectation to please, many ministers whose aspirations are above that of a mere hireling, are laboring under heavy pressure and in the gall of bitterness. Their souls long for the freedom to preach the Gospel independent of either creed, tradition or the wishes and expectations of wealthy pew-holders. The man who depends on his labor in the ministry for support is too often at the mercy of the pleasure and whims of the people whom he serves. And as the paying towards this support is made largely voluntary, there is not that system about it that there is in reference to that of other callings; so that if any member is not pleased with the preacher or his preaching he feels at liberty to withdraw his support. In other words, to make him feel that he is a "hireling" and that it is his duty to adapt his preaching to the wishes of his employer. If he happens to be a post in the church, it means a large slice from his support, laboring against his convictions of right and duty to God, or handing in his resignation.

No matter how much we may say that these things should not be so, that ministers should be employed to preach the Gospel and labor for the highest spiritual interests of the people, the facts, in many cases, remain: And in truth the tendencies are too keenly felt on both sides. The most natural feeling on the part of the employer is to have his ministers preach to please, and that of the minister is to please also. It is hard to get away from feeling of this kind, and yet, in a better sense it is exceedingly galling to the minister. There is nothing that is so effectual in closing a man's mouth as money when it means a home, food, clothing and the ordinary comforts of life. And there is no other calling in life that is so dangerously tempting towards being bought as the ministry. It is the great barrier of a salaried ministry . . . because of the opportunities afforded for binding men's consciences and curtailing their liberties.

Many of the changes made and the resignations offered are the outgrowths of the unreasonable demands made by worldly parishioners. In some cases those who pay most liberally to ministerial support are brewers, saloon-keepers, and such as make money easily because of their business being either illegitimate or dishonorable. For ministers not to preach temperance and against these evils in the face of such hearers, pew-holders and church supporters is a temptation that is not easily met. And yet those who are honest to their own convictions, to their parishioners and to the God cannot do otherwise than preach the truth. And we are glad that there are those who will, in the face of all these temptations and difficulties speak out their convictions right.

In the morning papers we have the name of a minister who refuses to accept a salary, because he wants to be free to carry out his conceptions of right. He says: "In preaching for a salary I cannot bring myself to think it right to preach the Gospel, for then I am bound by traditionalism and by machinery. An effective teacher of morals talks God's truth in terms of to-day." It is further stated that he (Richard Wrightsman, of Christ's Church, New York,) has had several other pulpits offered at good salaries, but refuses them because, says he, "To drudge in well-being is blasphemy."

Let neither love of money nor fear of losing position tempt the man of God to preach anything more or less than the truth as we have it in the Gospel. To preach the Gospel, [the power of God unto] salvation," is that to which we are called. The living or support follows as a consequence. Only the "hiring" makes the money a condition. And it is the hiring who preaches to please his people, that he may get their money. The good shepherd careth for the sheep, because he loves them as he loves his own soul.—H. B. B.

PATIENT WITH THE LIVING.

MARGARET SANGSTER.

Sweet friend, when thou and I are gone
Beyond earth's weary labor,
When small shall be our need of grace
From comrade and from neighbor,
Passed all the strife, the toil, the care,
And done with all the sighing,
What tender truth shall we have gained
Alas, by simply dying!

Then lips too chary of their praise,
Will tell our merits over,
And eyes too swift our faults to see,
Shall no defect discover.
Then hands that would not lift a stone
Where stones were thick to cumber
Our steep hill-path, will scatter flowers
Above our pillowed slumber.

Sweet friend, perhaps both thou and I,
Ere love is past forgiving,
Should take the earnest lesson home—
Be patient with the living.
To-day's repressed rebuke may save
Our blinding tears to-morrow;
Then patience—e'en when keenest edge
May whet a nameless sorrow.

'Tis easy to be gentle when Death's silence shames our clamor,
And easy to discern the best
Through memory's mystic glamor;
But wise it were for thee and me,
Ere love is past forgiving,
To take the tender lesson home—
Be patient with the living.

SLATE PENCILS.—Slate pencils were formerly all cut from solid slate, just as it is dug from the earth, but pencils so made were objected to on account of the grit which they contained, and which would scratch the slate. To overcome this difficulty, an ingenious process has been devised by which the slate is ground to a very fine powder, all grit and foreign substances removed, and the powder passed through silk cloth in much the same manner in which flour is bolted. The powder is then made into a dough, and this dough is subjected to a very heavy hydraulic pressure, which presses the pencil out the required shape and diameter, but in length of about three feet. While yet soft the pencils are cut into the desired lengths and set out to dry in the open air. After they are thoroughly dry the pencils are placed in steam baking kilns, where they receive the proper temper. Pencils made in this manner are not only free from all grit and of uniform hardness, but are stronger than those cut out of solid slate. For these reasons they have superseded the old kind. Over 25,000,000 of these pencils were made and sold in 1899 by one American concern in Chattanooga.—Cement and Slate.

Items Concerning the Society.

Among the announcements of the Books of the Week we notice "The History of the Life of Thomas Ellwood," published in Putnam's Library of Standard Literature, by G. P. Putnam's Sons, at the price of $1.75.

"The Friends' Book Association" propose to print the essential portions of George Fox's Journal, complete, in the form in which Thomas Ellwood prepared them for the folio of 1694, "but to abridge doctrinal and expository matter, and omit many of the epistles and letters."

The New British Parliament contains seven members of the Society of Friends.

The English Friends' Famine Relief Fund is now over one hundred and forty thousand dollars.

The Inquirer (English) contains a carefully written article by Henry Rawlings, once a Friend, now a Unitarian minister stationed at York, on the Society of Friends. He is impressed by the extent to which "meetings for religious instruction," with prepared addresses, are now taking the place of some of the ordinary evening meetings, and thinks it a sign of deeper changes coming. He "doubts whether there was ever so deep a doctrinal cleavage in the Society as now." In our own view, the cleavage is not deepening but healing up.—British Friend.

Two public meetings for Divine worship to be held, one in Friends' meeting-house in Media, at 2 P. M. on the first First-day of next month (Twelfth Mo. 2d), and the other in West Chester, at 2.45 P. M. on the first First-day of the First Month (First Mo. 6th, 1901), have been arranged for by a committee of Concord Quarterly Meeting, which was held at Media last Third-day, and approved of a religious concern to hold these meetings. It is desired that they shall be attended by its members generally, especially by the younger portion. Welcome was expressed also for other attenders who might feel concerned or desirous to come.

Notes from Others.

"There is no danger that the Gospel will not adapt itself to the needs of every successive age. That it will conform itself to all fancied wants and arbitrary demands of humanity, cannot be expected. The Gospel in every age addresses itself to essentials, to the heart needs of the race, to the deepest problems of life. It is adaptive in that it seeks in any given set of circumstances the shortest and surest channel for the inflow of its own gracious, transforming energy; it is assimilative in that it associates itself at every possible point of contact with the life of each generation in turn, just as men are living that life, for the definite purpose of resolving the moral chaos which it finds into the spiritual and social cosmos which is the goal of all its striving with man.

"It need never be feared that the Gospel will grow too old for use, too weak for social service. It is an exhaustless force, an unwasted value, a tireless regenerator of humanity. The evidences of Christianity are fresh as this morning's newspaper. The Gospel is historic if anything is history, but it is also, in the deeper, and not the lighter, flippant sense, abreast of the times, and ever pressing on toward the eternities.—N. Y. Observer.

Whatever American Roman Catholics may desire concerning a union of Church and State, they are subject to a power that does desire it, and when the alignment is made, when the interests of the Church demand that the alignment be made, they must stand as heretics and upholders of their nation's Constitution, or as Roman Catholics and the enemies of the palladium of our liberties.

That this time shall ever come seems to many only an evil dream. Who dreamed five years ago that our flag should wave over a tropical archipelago in the distant Orient? It is from the results of this war that the danger threatens. It is this that has encouraged the Roman hierarchy. With eight million Roman Catholics added to the eight millions we already have, there is an opportunity to form a Roman Catholic party that shall be the beginning of many troubles.—W. A. Curtis in the Christian Advocate.

At the recent Church Congress in England, the Bishop of Ripon congratulated his audience that, during the century now ending, the adherents of Christianity had increased from two hundred to five hundred millions, and that Christian nations now wield sovereign influence over eight hundred out of fourteen hundred millions of earth's population, but those who believe in the necessity of the new birth of individual souls and their personal union with Christ, will find but little ground for encouragement in the statement, as they ask how many of that vast multitude of adherents are true members of Christ.

On the other hand, there should be no yielding to discouragement at the paucity of results through human efforts. It is enough to do our part and leave the matter in the hands of Him who ruleth over all. He will work out his own ends and accomplish his purposes. It is ours to labor patiently and cheerfully, having the assurance that we shall be found in our lot at the end of the days.—Episcopal Recorder.

FIRST STEAMBOAT FOR THE DEAD SEA.—The object of a steamboat route across the Dead Sea from Jerusalem to Kerak is to facilitate the commerce between these two cities, that has for centuries been conducted over many sand-swept desert roads. The first of the boats which have been built at Hamburg is called the Prodomos, or Forerunner. A second craft has already been ordered. The boats will be fitted up with every modern electrical apparatus. They are introduced principally to handle the freight traffic, which is large, to and from Jerusalem, but there will also be accommodations for thirty-four passengers. The Desert folk are aghast at this puffing Western innovation that threatens their trade of centuries. Ledger Monthly.

Our dictionaries are nothing but registers of the edicts of man's advancing intelligence.—A Correspondent.

"The Logic of Events" is a convenient phrase for expressing the dependence of inexperienced humanity on the law of might as the revelation of right.—A Correspondent.

The Bible is not dependent on the dead letters of the monuments for its credibility, nor does the earthly life of our Lord require the attestation of some rockhewn gospel. From age to age, from generation to generation, the gospel is written in the hearts and lives of men, and Christ walks in his true Church to-day as really as among the golden candlesticks in the apocalyptic vision. It is not a dead gospel, nor an empty manger or sepulchre, which claims our interest. It is a living gospel, which is confirmed in the hearts of men rather than by any testimony of the monuments or ancient manuscripts. We bow before Him in loving adoration who liveth and was dead, and is alive for evermore.—Samuel Ives Curtis.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—According to calculations the next House of Representatives will consist of two hundred and three Republicans and one hundred and fifty-three Democrats and Populists, with the one member from Idaho remaining in doubt.

The election has been followed by a revival in many branches of trade and manufacturing industries.

The U. S. troops have all been withdrawn from China, excepting nineteen hundred men who are under the command of the American Legation.

In a report in reference to the Philippines, General MacArthur, after declaring emphatically that the present army of sixty-three thousand men is strained to the full limit of endurance, adds: "At present and for many years to come, the necessity of a large American military and naval force is too apparent to admit of discussion."

An interesting fact shown by the census is the area of various cities. New York covers 197,192 acres; Chicago, 122,240; Philadelphia, 84,933; St. Louis, 39,276; Boston, 60,661; Baltimore, 24,171; Pittsburg, 19,418. Hoboken, N. J., is the smallest city in the United States in point of area, having 59,364 people on 960 acres. New York City has 18 people to the acre; Chicago, 13, and Philadelphia 15. Hoboken has 61 to the acre.

The death rate of New York is 18.41 to each 1000 of population; of Chicago, 14.57; of Philadelphia, 18.78. The highest death rate in the United States is that of Charleston, 29.92. Mobile's is 29.80. The lowest is that of Lincoln, Neb., which is 6.13.

In the annual report of the Treasurer of the United States, Ellis H. Roberts, on the operations and condition of the Treasury, he says the growth and prosperity of the country and the general activity of business are reflected in the transactions of his office. The net ordinary revenues of the Government for the fiscal year were $567,240,852, the largest in the history of the country. The gross receipts under warrant, including those on account of the public debt, were $1,387,299,262, and the disbursements $1,195,943,472, a large increase on both sides over the previous year.

Chicago has officially tendered its $34,000,000 drainage channel to the United States Government, in the hope that the latter will make it a part of a water-way to the Gulf of Mexico. A memorial to Congress says the canal is deeper than the draft of any lake vessel and is wide enough to float three abreast, but is commercially useless to the nation, owing to the lack of a proper channel in the Illinois and the Desplaines rivers.

Electric coal cutting machinery is rapidly displacing handwork and other varieties of mechanical mining appliances in the collieries of Great Britain and the United States. The coal thus mined is cleaner, the waste less and the effect of the machine on the ventilation and temperature of the mine less than with any other mechanism.

A well yielding six thousand barrels of petroleum daily has lately been opened in Lewis Co., West Virginia. This yield exceeds that of any other on record.

The population of the Southern States has increased from 19,300,000 in round numbers, to 23,200,000, or very nearly 20 per cent., during the last ten years. Very little of this increase can be attributed to immigration. Exclusive of immigration the population of the entire country has increased 9,225,000, of which nearly 4,000,000 is in the Southern States.

The population of the State of New Jersey is 1,883,669, as against 1,414,933 in 1890. This is an increase since 1890 of 138,736, or 30.3 per cent.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs says: The Indian population of the United States is about 267,900, of which 45,270 receive a daily ration. The ration issued and its value vary according to the tribe. Nearly two-fifths of the number receiving rations belong to the great Sioux Nation. He controverts the commonly accepted theory that by constant contact with the whites the extinction of the Indian is only a matter of time. It says it can be stated, with a great degree of confidence, that the Indian population of the United States has been very little diminished from the days of Columbus, Coronado, Raleigh, Captain John Smith and other early explorers.

Careful returns made of the annual rainfall in New Jersey show that in the northwestern part of the State there is a fall every year of forty-four inches of rain; that on the sea coast it is somewhat more than this, and yet that in some parts of the State the yearly rainfall is as low as thirty-one inches, which brings it down to that of some of the sub-arid regions of the West.

Prof. Voorhees, of the U. S. Agricultural Experiment Station, points out the benefits of systematic irrigation: By this means it was found that blackberries will produce 97 per cent. gain in quarts over the ordinary method of culture; currants, 43 per cent.; cabbage, 31 per cent.; sweet corn, 51 per cent.; sweet potatoes, 72 per cent.; lima beans, 23 per cent., and watermelons, 44 per cent. Singularly enough, tomatoes received no advantage from irrigation.

Voting took place in Porto Rico on the 6th inst., resulting in the election of Republican candidates by a large majority.

Of 19,618 school children in Milwaukee examined during the past year, 5055 had defective vision and 1417 were afflicted with eye troubles.

Statistics furnished by the universal Postal Union regarding the postal service of the forty-three principal countries of the world in 1898, show that the United States has the largest number of postoffices as well as employes and Congo the least. In the proportion of post-offices to area and population Switzerland leads with one to every four miles, the United States being sixteenth in rank. The United States, with service on 174,679 miles of railroad and 302,442 miles of all other roads, ranks first in the length of mail routes, Siam being last. The United States also ranks first in the aggregate number of miles annually traveled by mails.

There were 369 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 7 less than the previous week and 55 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 196 were males and 173 females: 40 died of consumption; 37 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 21 of diphtheria; 13 of apoplexy; 19 of cancer, and 5 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.30 to $2.50; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.35 to $3.50; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.65; spring, straight, $3.65 to $3.90; city mills, straight, $3.45 to $3.65.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 74 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 74 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.

No. 2 mixed corn, old, 44 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.

No. 2 white oats, clipped, 28 to 28 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.; good, 5 to 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.; medium, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.; good, 3 $\frac{3}{4}$  to 4c.; common, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; spring lambs, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 6c.

HOGS.—Best Western, 7 to 7 $\frac{1}{4}$ c.

FOREIGN.—It is said that conferences between the envoys in Peking for the purpose of agreeing upon the fundamentals for peace negotiations with the Chinese plenipotentiaries proceed favorably in the whole series of important points. A battle is reported to have been fought between the Imperial Chinese troops and the Boxers in South China, which resulted in the defeat of the Boxers with great loss.

Oriental advices state that four to six million Chinese north of Peking are in danger of starving, their crops having been a total failure.

Private letters from China written by German soldiers give fresh details confirming the reports of tortures inflicted by the troops on Boxers. The Berlin press is urging that an official investigation into the conduct of the war in China be ordered by the German Government.

The United States Embassy in Berlin has received many applications for redress against the German Government made by natives of Alsace-Lorraine who are now American citizens, and who, after the Paris Exposition, visited their old homes, only to be expelled by the authorities. Under the provisions of the treaty of 1868, Germany refuses to recognize them as entitled to protection.

The expenses of the South African war, to be borne by Great Britain are expected to amount to $500,000,000. Guerrilla warfare by Boers continues.

A syndicate has been formed to develop Eastern Cuba, consisting in part of American capitalists. The work of building a railroad from Santiago to Santa Clara, a distance of 350 miles has been begun. It is said that the country is wonderfully fertile and sparsely settled, and has in the opinion of those who subscribed to the company, a great future. The road which the company is already building will open one of the most fertile sections of the island. The property recently purchased includes hundreds of thousands of acres of sugar and fruit lands, which it is proposed to develop.

The exposition in Paris has closed. It has been visited by 50,000,000 persons and is regarded as pecuniarily successful.

It was found by the recent census that in Cuba the total number of male citizens of voting age was 417,990; of whom 187,813 were whites born in Cuba, 96,088 white born in Spain, 6794 whites born in other countries, and 127,298 colored, including blacks mixed and Chinese.

Great Britain has more than 1600 steamers of 300 tons and upward. Germany has 127 of the same size the United States 120 and France 60. Great Britain has 24 steamers with a register of 10,000 tons or more.

The exports of butter, cheese, eggs, bacon, ham, mutton, pork, apples, oats, peas, wheat, flour and potatoes Great Britain from Canada have more than doubled since 1896.

A Spanish-American Congress opened in Madrid on the 9th inst. Portugal will be represented, and all the South American Republics, except Bolivia, have accepted the invitation. Spain will not have predominance, as each State represented has one vote. The object of the Congress declared to be an effort to draw the component parts in closer intellectual and commercial relations.

Learned men of St. Petersburg are planning a scientific expedition to examine the immense number of manuscripts at Mukden, China, discovered by Russian troops, among them being ancient Greek and Roman documents, supposedly taken by the Mongolians on their retreat from the Occident. They are believed to be of great historic value.

The Trans-Siberian Railroad offers the cheapest traveling in the world. The Russian Government, in order to encourage emigration to Siberia, has made remarkably low rates. It is possible to travel six thousand miles for the sum of $3.37.

NOTICES.

THE FRIENDS' EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION.—A meeting will be held at 140 North Sixteenth Street, Philadelphia, Eleventh month 17th, 1900, at 2.30 P. M.

1. "Drawing as a Factor in Education," by Rachel Alsop, of Friends' Select School.
2. "The Educational Value of Medeling," by Lillie Tears, of Moorestown Academy.
3. "Sloyd," by Eber D. Kanaga, of Friends' Select School.
4. Discussion.

RUTH S. GOODWIN, Secretary.

All interested are cordially invited.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage will meet trains leaving Philadelphia 7.17 and 8.19 A. M., and 2 and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when request Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., twenty-four cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, Westtown Station or West Chester, Phone 85.

EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Sup't

DIED, Teeth Mo. 22nd, 1900, at his home, Germantown Phila., THOMAS P. COPE, in the seventy-eighth year of age. This dear Friend, by an early submission to the constraints, limitations and sanctifying power of Divine Grace, presented in his daily life a rare combination of Christian virtues and graces that well illustrates the preciousness of "the fruits of the Spirit." Within the circle of his immediate family, he was beloved as honored head; his counsel was sought and justly valued by those who shared his personal friendship; and in religious Society he filled the various important stations to which he had been appointed with fidelity, and a most earnest concern that nothing, on his part should mar the beauty and excellency with which he believed the church is to be adorned. He took much interest in preparing and distributing compilations from the memoirs and writings of George Fox, William Penn and Robert Barclay, thereby making valuable additions to the literature of Friends. During his active engagement in a large mercantile business, Thomas P. Cope was remarkable for unswerving justice, and the maintenance of a high standard of commercial integrity. In later life his kindness, heart and quick sympathy with the wants or sufferings of his fellow-man, led him to foster various broad-minded schemes for their relief or uplifting. Whether viewed therefore, in his domestic or social relations, his place in the church, or the community, the close of such a life has left a sad blank, but it cannot have been lived in vain; while we may reverently believe that, through the mercy of the Redeemer he so fervently loved and sought to serve, our departed friend has forever "entered the joy of his Lord."

—, at Philadelphia, Pa., Ninth Mo. 6th, 1900, GEORGE JONES, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. A member of Frankford Monthly and Germantown Preparative Meetings of Friends.

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, ELEVENTH MONTH 24, 1900.

No. 19.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,
NO. 207 WALNUT PLACE,
PHILADELPHIA.

South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth,)

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,
NO. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

Our Primitive Christianity.

We have been accustomed to claim and believe that "Quakerism is primitive Christianity revived." It is acceptable to us on no other ground. "If any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his." The spirit of Christ in us and actuating us, is our only true title to that Christianity which was primitive and is the same to-day and forever.

We know of and want no other Christianity than that of Christ, and are sure of none that is not directly from Him by his immediate Spirit. We do not have to explore back into history and drag Him forward as an antiquity intrude Him upon modern times; we do not have to ask, "Who shall go over the sea for us and bring the word unto us that we may hear and do it?" We do not have to ask of any priesthood, "Who shall ascend into heaven to bring Christ down from above, or who shall descend into the deep, to bring up Christ again from the dead? But the word is nigh thee, in thy mouth and in thy heart."

It is not Quakerism's fault that its insistence on this doctrine and its practice, once primitive, now seems distinctive. This peculiarity of its virtue, and its mission on earth is that the doctrine of the immediate presence and word of Christ shall become less and less a peculiarity by being re-adopted in practice by Christendom.

What peculiarity of our doctrine or testimony would have seemed a peculiarity, in the sense of something eccentric or odd, to the spirit of the primitive church? Even of testimonies deemed by some as so very "minor,"—would simplicity of dress and truth of address have seemed an oddity, or rather the expected thing? Personal decoration and compliment, not dictated by truth and holiness, but swayed by worldly fashion would then have been a dire and heathen peculiarity. Would preaching and all exercise of gospel worship only as approved by the Holy Spirit be a singularity?

That was the normal state of worship and ministry, and the stated, studied and paid performances would have been man-made peculiarities.

Would an observance of the command "Swear not at all," and "Render to no man evil for evil," but "follow peace with all men" have been peculiarities? Nay, but their opposites,—the taking of oaths and the going to war,—were deemed inconsistent with the law of Christ. But as to carnal ordinances, while primitive Christianity was clear in setting forth the true nature of the "one baptism" so plainly denominated Christ's own,—that of "the Holy Spirit and of fire;" and the true partaking of the bread of life and communion of the Holy Ghost, we will admit that forms and habits grown inveterate under the Old Dispensation so clung to early disciples that the continuance of outward elements did not seem that incongruity with the new and spiritual order which the spirit of the New Testament would indicate. But, then, early Christians were not primitive Christianity itself,—neither is our own membership Quakerism, or up to its mark. For we shall not represent "primitive Christianity revived," except as we are ourselves revived.

We simply wish to suggest in adducing these particulars that the departures from primitive Christianity by which Christendom has left Quakerism "peculiar," are really themselves the peculiarities, the abnormities, the inconsistencies. The son who staid nearest home may have been left singular by his prodigal and worldward brother, but his was not the eccentricity; his was the steadfastness. We hold a waiting worship and a waiting ministry of the Spirit to be normal to the primitive Christianity of the gospel, and a ministry exercised in the time or appointment of men, or as a hired performance or man-made product, to be a monstrous peculiarity. We hold the spiritual baptism and communion to be those which are truly normal to Christ's new and spiritual dispensation of life, and all other procedures with external matter called ordinances, as effete provisions of an obsolete dispensation, to be consignable to the cast-offs as peculiarities, being no longer intended by Him, nor commanded in recorded words of his.

We hold the exclusion of women from the voice of prophecy and prayer in public ministry to be a later-day peculiarity, and not accordant with Him in whom "there is neither male nor female." We hold that those distinctive things in which our standing seems eccentric from the worldward apostasy, are the things wherein the latter is out of centre with Christ. They mistake modern Christendom for Christianity who say "Quakerism is not Christianity."

We adduce these things more for those who rely on primitiveness in the order of time as the criterion of the claim of a denomination to the Christian name, than for the true Friend who would stand in the gospel's true original. True Quakerism regards the truly primitive Christianity not as a set of points in history, but as that which dwelleth in the bosom of the Father himself,—the only begotten Son who hath declared Him, and ever liveth as his Word to man. And if Quakerism is to be accounted as primitive Christianity revived, in whom shall we look for its revival,—in our own membership, or in other trustees who shall bring forth the fruits thereof? For us as a peculiar people of Christ, of primitive Christianity only so far as we are surrendered to be his own peculiar possession,—for us "to live is Christ." This is our one rule, so short in word, so large in power. No form of godliness, however primitive, will make us Christian while we deny the power. But as members are determined to know nothing as authority, life and Lord but Jesus Christ and him crucified, our speech and our testimony shall be revived in demonstration of the Spirit and of power. No amount of claiming by history and by sound doctrine on paper or lip that "Quakerism is Christianity revived" is going to demonstrate such truth to this and succeeding generations, till they see the revival in us as a fact,—till they witness what a living power Christ in us can be, showing forth his salvation from day to day, as in days of old and as in former years; and able to make, according to our dedication to his life, "the latter glory of this house greater than the former."

WHEN a dying minister was reminded of the great good he had done, the service he had rendered to the church and the great love he had for Christ, he stopped his friends in their kind appreciation of his work on earth, and said, "Nothing gives me comfort now, but the love of Christ to me. The sisters of Lazarus said, 'Lord, he whom thou lovest is sick,' and this is the strongest plea you can make for me, and this thought brings me the greatest comfort now. It is not my love for Christ, but his wonderful love for me, in putting me into the ministry and permitting me to do anything for Him."

Culture.

Culture is a habit of mind, a mental process that wide reading and the memorizing of many facts and dates does not necessarily beget. In a general way culture may be defined as an acquired illumination, enabling its possessor to distinguish between the eternal and the ephemeral, between the significant and the irrelevant.

True culture takes little note of dates. It neither admires a thing because it is old nor welcomes it because it is new. It carries one into the realms of art, literature, science and social life, with a calm, judicial, sympathetic mind that is not clouded by feverish striving to know a little about a great many things or a great deal about little things.

Culture is to mental activity what real literature is to the printing press. As a nation we have great mental activity, but too little culture. We print an enormous number of newspapers, but not a great many permanent books. We are inclined to forget that one thought that clarifies our mental vision is worth a thousand unrelated facts, that one step toward real culture is more to be desired than a whole cycle of afternoon teas.

We should learn to give to the book and to the newspaper their appropriate places in our daily lives. To him who reads books worth the reading the daily chronicle of contemporary events gains a new interest. To-day's newspaper, if you have read history aright, becomes not a mere jumble of more or less interesting gossip, but a page in the diary of the human race, voyaging it knows not whither through wondrous seas. We should gain from great books that enlightenment which enables us to give to the crude details in to-day's news columns their comparative significance, to make, as it were, the annals of the moment submit themselves to the whole recorded course of human history.

When one has gained this power, acquired a culture that unerringly separates the eternal from the ephemeral, the significant from the irrelevant, then does the library seem more wonderful because of the newspaper, and the newspaper a thing to be read because of the library. Selected.

[This, however acceptable so far as it goes, stops short of the high calling of true culture. The "power which separates the eternal from the ephemeral" is that living Word, the in-speaking witness for truth, "dividing between soul and spirit," and a distinguisher of the thoughts and intents of the heart, discerning between that in us "which serveth God and that which serveth Him not." The spirit of Christ alone can preserve and edify us through our general reading, illuminate us therein, and, turning the water into wine, transmute our literary gains into culture by grace. Ed.]

If the universal cry of reform of so many inveterate abuses with which society rings — if the desire of a large class of young men for a faith and a hope intellectual and religious such as they have not yet found, be an omen to be trusted; if the disposition to rely more in study and in action on the unexplored riches of the human constitution — if the search of the sublime laws of morals and the sources of hope and trust in man and not in books proceed; if the rising generation can be provoked to think it unworthy to nestle into every abomination of the past, and shall feel the generous darings of austerity and virtue — then war has a short date, and human blood will cease to flow. — Emerson. [Why not say, if the spirit of Christ be received? — ED.]

Samuel Tuke—His Life, Works and Thoughts.

(Concluded from page 140.)

In approaching the end of so good and useful a man, one instinctively feels the hush of solemnity steal over the spirit — with an ever-deepening sense of the glorious transition which awaits those souls who have endeavored to serve their generation honestly.

And it was with a full realization of this inevitable summons that Samuel Tuke met, so serenely, the premonitions of the stroke which separated him from all his earthly interests and attachments. His domestic comforts and endearing companionships were of a high order, well illustrated by a letter he wrote to his son James upon his marriage in 1848, viz:

"YORK, thirteenth of Eighth Month.

"My Dear James:—I was much affected by the expression of thy tender feelings on quitting the parental roof. Very cordially do I reciprocate those feelings. Thou hast been dear and sweet in childhood, youth and manhood; and never more so than when rising to the character almost of a younger brother, some of my earlier hopes were realized, and I saw warm sympathies and good understanding combining healthily together, and giving thee a place of usefulness amongst thy fellows.

"I know thou art no stranger to the good Guide who leads into Christ's school, to bear his yoke, which binds the flesh but liberates the spirit, and gives the only freedom worthy of the name.

"I could speak a good deal of the blessedness of such a union as I trust yours is, of its influence in strengthening the mind to act jointly more independently of wrong influences than in the single state we have been wont to do. The feeling, too, of increased responsibility for each other which such an intimate union induces, tends to an increased individual care over the conduct of life, daily and hourly, lest in any way the one may lead the other astray, or in any manner obstruct the work of grace."

It was in the autumn of this year Samuel Tuke's faithful sister Maria died, after living in his family twenty-one years, and as Charles Taylor says, "besides supplying the place of a mother to his children she had been to himself a true sympathizer in care and sorrow, a tender and judicious friend to whom he could confide the various anxieties which he was naturally too prone to shut up in his own breast."

Her character was one of peculiar sweetness and unselfishness — her interest in all who stood in need of help bringing out "a remarkable ingenuity" in the manner in which she showed her kindness.

She did thank her Heavenly Father for placing her "in the midst of duties and of trials, and of pleasures which have all tended to strengthen the sweet cords of affection and domestic love." "To (her) strong emotions were united a lively humor; a ready vein of pleasant wit and a general elasticity of character which relieved a trace of melancholy she no doubt also possessed."

Her death coming so unexpectedly could but seriously depress all of the family, and Samuel Tuke felt it most keenly, especially as he was stricken within a few months by "a paralytic seizure" which resulted in his losing the use of one limb for a time. This he describes in the utmost calmness, saying, "so far was dead from assuming the aspect of the king of terrors that I seemed at times as if I could, without any discomposure, take hold of his hand, and be led down into the grave."

During this period of prostration his daughter Maria was his constant companion, and she read many books to him. It might be interesting to note in this connection that to a man as active as his had been for years, this was more of a rest than silence would have afforded, because, as John Stephenson Rowntree says, his "powerful intellect would again and again review the phenomena of mental disease. It was distressed at the evidences of sin and of the deceitfulness of the human heart, as evidenced in personal experience, in the fact of everyday life, in the annals of the past in the failures of philanthropic and political schemes for the amelioration of the race, in the infirmities of even good men, or in the contentions within the church. There was no exemption from private sorrow, and a sensitive conscience, trained from childhood, kept a life-long censorship over details of personal conduct. Thus 'the still, sad music of humanity' was constantly sounding in the chambers of that master mind." And thus we all should recognize that the great diversity of temperament and of habits, among equally good people, call for corresponding differences of treatment — remembering the common adage, "What is one man's meat may be another man's poison."

Samuel Tuke enjoyed the relief of being thus diverted, and he leaves a beautiful tribute concerning Friend's literature when he says "They interested without exciting me, and I felt a cordial agreement with the experience they (Friends' memoirs) described in the main."

The remarks Samuel Tuke would sometime make while listening to religious biographies might be illustrated by the record his daughter gives us, viz: "He had been looking at Margaret Lucas' Life, and said, 'A great deal of goodness with a good deal of weakness, as one often sees. I have very much altered, I think expanded, my view with regard to such matters. I used to think there was such a distinct line between good and evil; and so there is; but still there are so many ways in which natural character, education, etc., are shown, even when the individual has really experienced a change of heart. I see now, that if a person really has a great object at heart, there may be many weaknesses which, though they do not help, do not destroy the work. Some people take these peculiarities as the mark of good in a person.'"

After reading Frederick Dennison Maurice "Kingdom of Christ," he thought "the author was not correct in thinking that the early Friends would have done more permanent good if they had invented a form more suited to human nature," and added, "I have a firm faith that there will be a brighter day, that Christianity will prevail in greater purity in the world than it has yet done; though I cannot so fully believe that our body will be the chief instru-ant in the work. I see no reason either to suppose that they may not be made instruments. We want resuscitating, not remodeling; and we do not know how life or living members may spring up amongst us. . . . Professors of the highest spirituality may give in a time of true awakening the most vivid to the light which their predecessors greeted at the dawning of a glorious day. They who then greet it will be the successors of the early Friends."

In reply to the question, "If you have the truth why do you not spread it?" he asks, "Where was pure apostolical Christianity two hundred years after its promulgation. The professors, even of the purest form, where were they to be found?" and so he thought Friends of his generation were probably as near their ancestors in the Truth as the Christians of the third century were to the apostles, in faith and practice, adding, "The course of the church has been one of perpetual degeneration, with occasional surprising revivals."

After the marriage of his daughter Maria to Joseph Tylor, he writes to her, twenty-fifth of Tenth Month, 1850:

I trust the change has been in the ordering of Divine Providence, and I can hear of thy happiness without jealousy or repining." S. T. then recalls the saying of an old woman, upwards of one hundred years, whom he visited, in his wife's time. She was not at all superannuated, but hard of hearing and dull of sight, and when informed by her visitors that she had twelve children at home, she exclaimed with uplifted hands, "That's a mony." To thy dear mother's replying, 'None too many,' promptly, she quickly rejoined, with an earnest look, 'None too mony? I warrant you, you'll be right glad to see them all weel satel.' . . . When the right time comes one might be glad to see all one's children 'weel satel,' though the removal from the parent nest is not quite so easy as that of the birds." The recent agitation about birthright membership makes Samuel Tuke's thoughts of half a century back quite interesting, viz: "I have no faith whatever in the grand nostrum propounded by so many, the doing away with the birthright membership; nor in the altering of the rules respecting elders, nor indeed in any alterations in connection with the Discipline." During the spring of 1853 a second stroke of paralysis made our dear friend realize that his days were numbered, so that he said, "I believe that my pen is forever laid aside. I have been permitted to feel very quiet—very indeed, and with no desire for employment."

Some months later a third shock kept him in his chamber for the remainder of his life. His final summons came in the Tenth Month of 1857, when he passed into those realms of everlasting blessedness where no more suffering, separation or sorrow sadden the purified spirit. He was in his seventy-third year.

The testimony of his daughter concerning the conversations which he had with his children, especially on First-day evenings, after readings from the Scriptures, might be a fitting conclusion to this sketch of one whose life had been such a blessing to his family and fellow-men. She says, "My dear father expressed his views, on such occasions, with a force and clearness which made a deep impression and gave a strong sense of his own earnest desire to attain the truth and his deep conviction of its value."

"These opportunities frequently ended in fervent prayer 'for all present, and for those near and dear to us, wherever scattered,' then thanksgiving for blessings temporal and spiritual, most humble acknowledgments and earnest desires, expressed often in the language of David, 'Our soul cleaveth unto the dust, quicken us, O Lord, according to thy word.'

"Surely we cannot forget these reverent, heartfelt prayers." J. E.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

LEISURE MOMENTS.

Let every morn begin our lives anew,
Square with the day each balance due ;
Thus to the important now direct our powers,
To improve the time that only can be ours.
Prepared to leave if this day summoned home,
Resigned to wait the appointed hour to come.
In triumph quit this world without a sigh,
Yet live as those that know they never die.
Leaving some beacons on life's stormy road,
Footprints or waymarks where we humbly trod,
Or danger-signals that will plainly tell
The passing pilgrim where we slipped or fell.

C. S. COPE.

WEST PALM BEACH, Florida, Eighth Mo. 10th, 1900.

Pure Suffering.

There are sufferings that are not caused by our own sins, nor occasioned by our own blunders, yet may be necessitated for our own discipline. They grow out of our relations to others, our interest in their best welfare, our love of righteousness and our fidelity to God. Thus it often happens that special callings, gifts and revelations cost special tribulations and trials. Joseph's dreams arouse the envy of Joseph's brothers, and this leads to Joseph's captivity in Egypt. Moses' call to be the deliverer of his people is misunderstood by the Hebrews and costs him forty years of exile. David's divine anointing to be king makes him have to flee from the face of Saul and dwell in caves for awhile. Paul's third heaven elevations are in a measure compensated by the buffetings of Satan and a thorn in the flesh. Many men and women pre-eminent in the spiritual leadership of the Church in this and other generations have carried peculiar physical, temporal or domestic burdens.

Crucifixions of this character often involve physical sufferings, as in discomforts, deprivation, exposure, or even mistreatment and abuse, in some cases death, as for example, our missionaries in China; or it may involve mental pain or perplexity and suspense, or social suffering, as loneliness, desolation, desertion, alienation and even antagonism of friends and loved ones. And it will include deep spiritual suffering, for we go into the very shadow of death with those we would rescue. We feel their perils; we share their chastenings; we are hurt at their indifference; we agonize with their importunities; we become so identified with them we would save, as to sometimes cry out, "Lord, if not, then blot out my name from thy book." A holy soul may covet "the fellowship of Christ's sufferings"—not that pain in itself is sweet, but inasmuch as it is those who suffer with Him that shall reign with Him, and as it is only by the sufferings of some that others can be saved, our glory should be in the cross of Christ.

Two things are to be remembered for the consolation of such:

1. Their highest quality is reached in those sufferings which are undergone for the salvation of the soul. These very things may be gracious hedges against unseen perils into which human frailty and temptations to pride might precipitate the servant or handmaid of the Lord. The worker's "peculiar cross" will prove to have been the soul's peculiar safeguard.

When the world seems full of evil,
Lurking near on every hand;
When I find my strength too feeble
Its temptations to withstand
Then Thy strength becomes sufficient
As to Thee my weak faith clings,
And I'm kept in perfect safety
'Neath the shadow of Thy wings.

2. These things not only class us, then, with the martyrs and prophets of all ages, but they are "the marks of Christ." The peculiar anointing which made him the leader of his fellows made him also the scape-goat and the target of them all. Our comfort disturbed, our possessions destroyed, our visage marred, our Gethsemanes and Calvarys, are they not the makers of our royalty?—Zion's Watchman.

A Governor's Revenge.

A few years ago, while Robert Stewart was governor of Missouri, a steamboat man was brought in from penitentiary as an applicant for a pardon. He was a large, powerful fellow, and, when the governor looked at him, he seemed strangely affected. He scrutinized him long and closely. Finally he signed the document that restored the prisoner to liberty. Before he handed it to him he said: "You will commit some other crime, and be in the penitentiary again, I fear."

The man solemnly promised that he would not. The governor looked doubtful, mused a few minutes, and said, "You will go back to the river and be a mate again, I suppose?"

The man replied that he would.

"Well, I want you to promise me one thing," said the governor. "I want you to pledge your word that, when you are mate again, you will never take a billet of wood in your hand and drive a sick boy out of a bunk to help you load your boat on a stormy night."

The steamboat man said he would not, and inquired what the governor meant by asking him such a question.

The governor replied: "Because some day that boy may become a governor, and you may want him to pardon you for a crime. One dark, stormy night, many years ago, you stopped your boat on the Mississippi River to take on a load of wood. There was a boy on board who was working his passage from New Orleans to St. Louis, but he was very sick of fever and was lying in a bunk. You had plenty of men to do the work, but you went to that boy with a stick of wood in your hand and drove him with blows and curses out into the wretched night, and kept him toiling like a slave until the load was completed. I was that boy. Here is your pardon. Never again be guilty of such brutality."

The man, cowering and hiding his face, went out without a word.

What a noble revenge that was, and what a lesson to a bully!—Success.

Among the Doukhobors in Canada.

HOW THE RUSSIAN PEASANT EXILES HAVE THRIVEN
IN THEIR NEW HOME.

Probably most of the readers of The Christian Herald have heard more or less of the Doukhobors. This Russian sect of uneducated peasants has been suffering persecution at home for a century and more because of the fact that its members abjured the established church and condemned war and military service. But it was not until about thirteen years ago, when universal conscription became the rule, that their troubles became unbearable. These inoffensive people, who have charmed all who have met them by their simple piety and kindness, were banished from their homes and exposed to all kinds of hardships. At last, some influential Russians stirred themselves on behalf of these oppressed peasants and obtained as a great favor from the Czar permission for them to leave the country at their own expense. They had but little of their savings left after these years of sorrow, and it was necessary for the Quakers of England and America to come to their aid, and largely through their assistance some seven thousand of these peaceable people have been transported to northwestern Canada, six or seven hundred miles beyond Winnipeg. Here they were placed in an unsettled country upon the open prairie about a year and a half ago, with the necessity upon them of providing shelter and food for themselves before the long cold winter set in. They set to work with determination, and already they are beginning to feel at home in their new fields and houses.

The few settlers who had occupied these regions before the Doukhobors came did not know what kind of people they were, and thought they might prove to be lawless and dangerous. One ranchman, who was about to make a journey and leave his wife alone in his house, just at the time of their arrival, went to the Doukhobors and by signs with his gun threatened them with death if they came near his ranch. The morning after his departure his wife heard a knock at the door, and went with trepidation to the door, expecting to be assaulted. There she found a Doukhobor woman who smiled at her, for they could not understand each other's language, pushed her way in, took the milk-pail, went to the barn and insisted upon milking the cow for her hostess and doing other housework for her. She had taken this practical method of showing their good-will. This lady and her husband are now among the strongest friends of the Doukhobors. They have no children of their own, and would be glad to adopt a Doukhobor child, but these Russians love their children so that notwithstanding their poverty not one child in all the settlements can be secured.

These people are anxious to become Canadians and to be able to communicate with the Anglo-Saxon settlers around them. Knowing this, two ladies of Kingston, Ontario, Eliza H. Varney, a Quaker, and her young cousin, Nellie Baker, determined to establish a little summer school at one of the new Doukhobor villages on Good Spirit Lake. They arrived at their destination after a long journey, early in [Seventh Mo.] of this year. Eliza Varney had already passed the summer of 1899 there, conducting a dispensary for the Doukhobors, who have no physicians among them. They pitched their tents near three of the Doukhobor villages, a small tent for their residence, another for the dispensary, which was under Eliza Varney's charge, and a third, 20x20 feet, for the school, over which Nellie Baker presided, and for which work her studies at Queen's University had fitted her. Eliza Varney had won the affections of the villagers last year, and they were not slow to send their children to the new school, some of them arriving before the ladies had unpacked their luggage. Nellie Baker's report of her experiment, which has just been made to the Canadian Commissioner of Immigration, shows what difficulties she encountered. She found herself confronted by a tentful of boys and girls with none of whom did she have a single known word in common. "By signs and motions," she says, "I got them seated in rows on the prairie grass of the tent floor, and holding up a pencil said, 'One.' I could not detect any apparent comprehension. Then taking up another pencil I said, 'Two,' and added a third, 'Three.' Still no response, and my heart sank somewhat. However, I decided to repeat the method, and as I said 'One,' I noticed a look on a boy's face that told me he knew I was counting, and I saw him turn and speak to the others. Almost instantly they understood, and soon, repeating after me, counted up to ten."

From this beginning the course of teaching proceeded. Some of the pupils walked five miles to school and five miles back every day! Nellie Baker carried on this school for six and a-half hours a day and for five and a-half days a week, and as almost the entire time was occupied with oral teaching, some idea may be formed of the arduous character of her work. She was naturally tired when the hour to close came, but the children were never tired. The favorite method was object teaching. They learned the divisions of time from a watch, to count money from coins, and so on. The children had a natural taste for figures, and at the end of the two months during which the school was open the older children had succeeded in getting through one-half of the multiplication table, and some of the more advanced pupils were in the second reader (Canadian). In writing, she declares that some of them equalled or surpassed the teacher. The children were anxious to have tasks assigned to them to prepare at home, and never were satisfied with the amount of such tasks; they always wanted more. Their clothing was scrupulously clean and picturesque as well. "Of their needlework and embroidery," Nellie Baker adds, "I am speaking of that done at their homes by the girls of my school, their handiwork is simply wonderful. For this purpose my handkerchiefs were taken, and soon returned beautifully worked."

At first the Doukhobors did not know that Nellie Baker's work, like Eliza Varney's, was entirely voluntary and unremunerated. When they found it out they sent a committee to her to offer her some compensation, although they were in need themselves. When she declined it they told her that they thanked her "all the day and all the night."

Some of the older boys, who did not know a word of any language but Russian at the beginning can now, after barely two months teaching, correspond with Nellie Baker in "fairly understandable English."

It is worth while to quote Nellie Baker's remarks upon the general character of the Doukhobors. She writes:

"The dignified courtesy and hospitality extended to us in more than a score of their villages, the manly bearing of the men, the delightful sympathy and affection with which they regard everything connected with their home—an estimation of the home that has little to learn from, and possibly something to teach to even Anglo-Saxons—their dwellings that all ready surpass in comfort and cleanliness those of any other class of settlers excepting those from older Canada and Great Britain, all testify to the desirability of the Doukhobors as settlers, who will, I believe, soon make good Canadian citizens. It does not require very keen perception on the part of one having had a welcome into hundreds of their homes to be assured that this is a community living up to high moral standard and holding tenacious to the simple tenets of Christian faith. On their day-break services of a First-day morning their impressive intonation of the Scriptures, their beautiful singing and harmonious chanting of hymns one could write chapters. They sing much of evenings in the villages and going to and returning from work afield. A favorite chant, freely translated, runs as follows:

"You tell me stranger where you are going.

With the hand safe in my Saviour's

I will go over the mountainside and valley,

Over fields and prairies I will go, my friends,

To see the heavenly spring wild flowers;

I will go after Jesus

Over the hard sand, and the Lord God be with me.

He leads us on to Heaven

In his paths of righteousness,

Straight, straight to the Kingdom of Heaven.

A little story will add a touch to this picture of a noble people: A lady living two miles from one of the Doukhobor villages wanted a girl for a servant. A young girl went to her on trial for a month, but at the end of the period she promptly returned to her home. Her employer came after her, wishing to keep her, but on no account would the girl go. Urged to give a reason, at first she replied that she "could not," but finally said, "I cannot go back; my mistress did not love me." This little story throws a flood of light on the servant-girl problem. It is to be noted that the Doukhobors want in life and what they freely give. It was love that prevented them from learning to kill their fellows in the Russian army, and it was their too great love that made the Russian government force the best subjects to leave their native land. It will be Russia's loss and Canada's gain. They can only teach us on this continent the folly and sin of war, the joy of loving even one's enemies, and the impossibility of doing with bombshells, their long pilgrimage a their years of hardship will not have been vain.—Ernest M. Crosby, in The Christian Herald.

RHINEBECK, N. Y.

Unbelief is always impatient, but faith willing to wait God's time.

Some Account of the Early Experience and Subsequent Travels of Ruth Newlin.

(Continued from page 142.)

CORRECTION.—On page 132, near the bottom middle column, the year "1832" (which was in the manuscript), should be changed to 1822, and on the next page, last paragraph of first column for "head," read hand.]

There is but little found which throws light on the conflicts of the subsequent years which elapsed before she was made willing to submit to the heavenly call, and be a mouth-piece for the Lord. But much of bodily affliction was allotted to her in that time, and her commission upon whom she leaned and depended so much, was removed by death, leaving her under twenty-sixth year with four small children.

What this great bereavement was to her, is little portrayed in a letter, written soon after her relatives in Iowa. Extracts from the same are as follows:

At the time of his death they were all down with the flux.]

"Hendrics Co., Ind., Twelfth Month, 5th, 1851.

Dear Brother and Sister:—I take up my pen once more with a trembling hand, and an aching heart, and an almost broken one, to tell you how I and my four fatherless children are. My health is very poor, although I can sew and knit and help cook a little, and do more than I have done for a long time.

The twenty-sixth of Tenth Month was the first time I had all the children together for ten weeks. I feel very thankful to Him who has been pleased to raise us up again, although He has seen fit to strip me of my loving husband, and them of a tender father. I may not repine, although it does seem almost more than I can bear. There is no tongue can tell or pen describe what my sorrow is both night and day. There are many nights I cannot close my eyes to sleep, but lie sorrowing and bathing my pillow with my tears. He is never gone, and I and the children are here for the winter. I will try to tell you some of the particulars of his sickness and death. He was taken sick the twenty-ninth of Seventh Month, but did not seem very ill. I wanted him to have the doctor, but he said he did not suffer much, but maybe he would better have a little medicine. The doctor came and gave him a few doses, and said with a smile he thought he would soon be better. He was unable to wait on himself and on me some days I could not turn myself in bed for near three weeks, but he had no appetite. On First-day evening we heard that mother was gone from her long home (she died with the same disease that was so prevalent at that time). It overcame me very much. He came and kissed his face by mine; It was cold and sweaty, and was so most of the time while he lived.

He said it is very trying indeed. Only I think, that two weeks and two days ago I left here in common health, and now we cannot see her no more. Let us try to be ready to meet her. We know not how soon it may be our turn. And if we should live to be old, there will only be a few fleeting days of sorrow. I never thought as much about dying as I do this spring and summer. I feel to be a poor unworthy creature not worthy of the Father's notice. And sometimes I feel discouraged, and then I remember the many good promises we have on record, and what a merciful Father we have to deal with us, so ready and willing to blot out all our sins and remember them no more. If we will only give Him the whole heart. It makes me feel very humble indeed." And much more he said which I do not remember to write exactly. Sixth-day the 8th of 8th Month, we were all pretty much down, and they thought best to move us to Joel's (a brother living near). They took us on a bed in a wagon. He seemed to stand it better than I did, and entertained a hope of recovery. I was willing to hope the same, although it seemed to me that we never would all get home again. The rest of us grew better. He was soon worse. Lay quietly and talked but little. Would say, 'I do not suffer much pain. It seems strange I just lie here.' Two weeks before he died, he wished all called in and said, 'I feel so much better, I wanted to talk to you; I am so glad we have all lived so lovingly together, and the children have agreed so well.' And he talked about several other things. I feared it was a turn for the worse, and so it proved. . . . I began to get worse, and by First-day was extremely bad, so they did not tell me until Second-day morning that he was worse. Several came in to see us that day. He talked considerably, especially to Aunt Edith Carter and Eleazer Bales, about his prospect of eternal rest. The latter reminded him that they who put their trust in the Lord shall be saved. He replied, 'I have none other to trust in but the Lord alone.' On Third-day he requested that I should be laid by him, he wished to talk to me. He took my hand and said, 'How does thee feel about getting well?' 'I have some hope to-day,' I replied. He said, 'I have no hope of getting well. I think I shall not be here many more days. . . . I hope thee will get well so the children will have one parent left. I am not leaving much, but I hope you will not suffer. I want thee to give me up, and bear up through it all the best thee can. . . . I should be glad to be spared to help raise the children. I know you will have a hard time. It is hard to give you up.' He discovered I was very much affected, and said, 'Don't give away too much. Maybe the Lord will raise me up. If He don't, I want thee to give me up.' Then I was carried back. He suffered a great deal that night and often exclaimed, 'Oh! that the time would come for my release, but I want to wait the right time.' On Fourth-day they laid me by his side again. He said, 'How warm thy face is to my cold, sweaty brow that never will be warm again! and kissed me and said, 'Now, I bid thee a long farewell.' And so it was the last time he ever touched my hand. Oh! think, if you can, how I felt at those trying moments, and at the present while I write these things to you! He bid the children farewell, and told them to be good, that they would have no father to-morrow. He had told us on Third-day that he thought he should go happy, if he was not deceived, and hoped to have an easy passage to that Glorious City that John the divine spoke of. 'I expect to see a great sight. If I go easy that may be a sign to you that I am gone to rest.' He was quiet most of the day. Twenty-five minutes after four we discovered that he breathed shorter. Ten minutes before five he closed his eyes and departed as one going to sleep. Eleazer Bales knelt in supplication, just as the breath left him, very beautifully. . . . The administrator has petitioned court to sell part of the old place, and leave a little home for me, where the house is. I want to keep my little children together if I can. I do not know how I am to support them. I have two hogs which will make plenty of meat, and that is all the provision we have. How bread is to come I do not know. . . . I went down to my old walks the week before Quarterly Meeting, and to the graveyard, the first time I had seen his grave. So now, with aching heart, I bid you an affectionate farewell.

"Ruth Newlin."

She stayed with her father the following winter, who was also left in a lonely condition. But as he was in limited circumstances, and her health was sufficiently restored to undertake living alone with her children, she returned to her own home in the spring. She worked very hard to keep the wolf from the door, often until late in the night, taking in work for others to obtain the necessary food and clothing. She was very expert at knitting, and in that way was able to help herself. She would pick wool on the shares and make her part in to clothing. Friends were kind and often assisted her in various ways. The writer has heard her relate many instances when help came just in the needed time.

She said she thought the poor had a better chance to see the hand of Providence than those in better circumstances, for then they did not see so clearly the immediate source. She had one horse, young and high spirited. She would mount and with two children in her lap, and two behind her, attended meeting regularly. Some told her the nag was not safe but she had no fears, and would drop the bridle rein and not touch it until stopped at the meeting-house. So, to use her own words, she was helped to get along beyond her expectation, though often tried and discouraged. A little memorandum is expressive of her feelings on her return home.

Fourth Month 20th, 1852.—I now have returned to my old home with four small children, all in need of a tender father's care. We left this place in Eighth Month last, expecting soon to return. But, O! how soon our hopes were blasted, and my beloved one laid in the cold and silent tomb. How solitary everything appears. I am almost in despair. This world can yield no comfort to me now. Yet I sorrow not as one without hope; for I believe he is at rest.

Fifth Month 7th, 1852.—I was at Bethel Meeting yesterday, and a sweet little meeting it was to me. This day deeply tried both inwardly and outwardly.

Seventh Month 25th, 1852.—This morning, on my way to meeting, I was led to look back over my past life, and was permitted to see what a poor, short-sighted creature I am, and how many precious hours I have spent for no good; and now am left a poor disconsolate widow. Doubts and fears pervade my mind lest I shall never be able to enter that place of peace and rest; though there were a few words of comfort expressed by a worthy young woman in meeting, to the tried ones. If I ever attain that heavenly rest it will be through the redeeming love of a merciful Saviour.

Eighth Month 1st, 1852.—This is First-day, and very lonely I went to meeting, but suffered my mind to dwell on my situation, without feeling enough resigned, which caused inward poverty. One year ago, according to the days of the week, my dear mother died, and we were sick. I thought I had all I could bear then, but we do not know what we can bear until we experience it. Greater trouble has overtaken me. Yet I am here, a spared monument of mercy.

Eighth Month 10th.—Leanness and barrenness of soul are my portion for some days, I fear on the account of dwelling too much on how I am to support my little family in this life, and not enough concerned for the support of the never-dying soul.

Eighth Month 28th, 1852.—This day one year ago my dear companion was taken from this world of pain and trouble.

Seventh-day, Tenth Month, 1852.—One year ago to-day I moved with my little children to father's. A very solemn day it was to me. It caused me to look back on the day I left there with a loving husband, hoping to end my days with him. But for some purpose, known only to Him who joined us together, he is taken and I am left.

Twelfth Month 5th, 1852.—Will thou be pleased, O, merciful Father, to look down from thy high and holy habitation with an eye of pity upon my poor benighted soul. Thou knowest all my trials, all my desires, all my thoughts. Forsake me not in my tried situation, for in Thee I hope to put all my trust.

(To be continued.)

Doukhobor Notes.

The work is in progress of distributing Sheep, principally high-grade Shropshires and Oxford Downs, to the villages, the design being to give each village about twenty. These were selected by ——— Speers, the general colonization agent, who has practical knowledge for this work. Twenty-five hundred dollars was forwarded one month ago by the committee, for this purchase, and, quite recently, fourteen hundred dollars has been sent for the purchase of additional Wool and Poultry.

In a letter dated Winnipeg, 14th inst., Alex. Moffat, Acting Commissioner of Immigration, informs that Wm. F. McCreary, late Commissioner, has been elected to Parliament from Selkirk, and that the Laurier Liberal Government has been sustained, and re-elected by a large majority for another four years, and that the present immigration policy will be continued.

In answer to urgent request for details of the success of crops, both grain and vegetables, Commissioner Moffat says he has this matter now in hand and will report shortly.

WM. EVANS.

God Seen in all His Works.

In that beautiful part of Germany which borders on the Rhine there is a noble castle, which, as you travel on the western bank of the river, you may see lifting its ancient towers on the opposite side above the grove of trees about as old as itself.

About ninety years ago there lived in that castle a noble gentleman, whom we will call the baron. The baron had but one son, who was not only a comfort to his father, but a blessing to all who lived on his father's land.

It happened on a certain occasion, that this young man being from home, there came a French gentleman to see the castle, who began to talk of his heavenly Father in terms that chilled the old man's blood; on which the baron reproved him, saying, "Are you not afraid of offending God, who reigns above, by speaking in such a manner?" The gentleman said that he knew nothing about God, for he had never seen Him. The baron did not notice at this time what the gentleman said, but the next morning took him about the castle grounds and took occasion first to show him a very beautiful picture that hung on the wall. The gentleman admired the picture very much, and said: "Whoever drew that picture knows very well how to use his pencil."

"My son drew that picture," said the baron.

"Then your son is a very clever man," replied the gentleman.

The baron then went with his visitor into the garden and showed him many beautiful flowers and plantations of forest trees.

"Who has the ordering of this garden?" asked the gentleman.

"My son," replied the baron. "He knows every plant, I may say, from the cedar of Lebanon to the hyssop on the wall."

"Indeed," said the gentleman, "I shall think very highly of him soon."

The baron then took him into the village and showed him a small, neat cottage, where his son had established a school, and where he had caused all young children who had lost their parents to be received and nourished at his own expense. The children in the house looked so happy that the gentleman was very much pleased, and when he returned to the castle he said to the baron: "What a happy man you are to have so good a son."

"How do you know I have so good a son?"

"Because I have seen his works, and I know that he must be good and clever, if he has done all that you have showed me."

"But you have never seen him."

"No; but I know him very well, because I judge him by his works."

"True," replied the baron, "and this is the way I judge of the character of our heavenly Father. I know from his works that He is a being of infinite wisdom, power, and goodness."

The Frenchman felt the force of the reproof, and was careful not to offend the good baron any more by his remarks.—From the German.

The Passing of the Buffalo.

Plans have been made by the League of American Sportsmen for the re-introduction, at the next session of Congress, of the Buffalo Reserve bill drawn up this year by Representative Lacey, of Iowa, but on which no action was taken. This bill provides for the retention of twenty thousand acres of public lands in New Mexico as a buffalo range, nominal rent of one cent an acre to be paid for twenty years. Unless steps of some kind are taken within a very few years, extermination, according to some of the best observers, must be the fate of the American bison.

Colonel Shields, President of the League, in a conversation on this subject, said: "Nothing has yet been accomplished toward the preservation of one of the noblest and most characteristic of American animals. We were not able to give this bill the support it deserved this year, because so much of the energies of the League were concentrated on the passage of the other Lacey bill, now the so-called Bird Protection law. Next year we can work for the buffalo with undivided enthusiasm. I could take a map and mark on it the present whereabouts of every individual buffalo in America. That shows how nearly we have come to losing an animal which was once to be found over the Western plains. The suddenness of his disappearance was remarkable. Up to 1873 there had been little apparent decrease in the number of buffalo, but by 1883 the wild herds had almost entirely disappeared. About 1880 I saw the remnant of one of the last herds surrounded by the camps of head and skin hunters. That herd was gone the next year.

"The successful preservation of the Allard and 'Buffalo Jones' herds gives an indication of what could be accomplished on government reserves. The Allard herd, under the care of cowboys, has actually increased from 35 animals in 1883 to 280 at the present time. The Jones herd, which now numbers 60, is descended from less than a dozen. In each of these cases the plan has been to prevent the animals from getting scattered, tending them in a corral when sick, and keeping the young ones from the wolves and coyotes. The Allard herd is almost a profitable enterprise. The sales keep about even with the natural increase. Most go to parks or private estates, but a few are killed for food. A full-grown live buffalo is worth $400 to $500. Dead, will bring in almost as much. The head sells for $150, the skin for $100, and there are the carcass 200 to 1,000 pounds of good meat which will sell for 40 cents a pound.

"The Yellowstone Park herd, on the other hand, has almost gone out of existence. There were 400 head originally, but the protectors, bears and wolves killed the young buffalo, while poachers and head hunters camp around them on the borders of the park and shot the adults. There is not more than a score left there to-day."

William T. Hornaday, Director of the Zoological Park of New York, estimates that there are not more than 400 buffaloes in the world to-day.

NEITHER do parts nor learning make men the better Christians, though the better ornaments and disputants; and it is the ignorance of people about the Divine gift which causes that mischievous mistake. Theory and practice, speculation and enjoyment, words and life are two things. It is the penitent, the reformed, the lowly, the watchful, the self-denying and holy soul, that is the Christian! A that frame is the fruit and work of the Spirit, which is the life of Jesus, whose life, though hid in the fulness of it in God the Father, shed abroad in the hearts of them who truly believe, according to their capacity. O that people did but know this to cleanse them, circumcise them, to quicken them and to make them new creatures indeed! Re-created or regenerated after Christ Jesus unto good works that they might live to God, and not to themselves, and offer up living prayers and living praises to the living God, through his own living Spirit, in which only he is to be worshipped in this Gospel day.—Wm. Penn.

Two Views.

"I've only one life here to live," said a young man, flippantly, "and I'm going to make the most of my time." He was first in every venture; he visited every country in search of new delights, and at the age of forty he had burned the candle of his life at both ends and drifted out into eternity. Having lived for himself, he had few mourners, and ere the grass was green above his last resting-place he was forgotten.

"I've only one life to live here," said another, a earnest-faced young man, and his eyes looked upon the world with all its needs, temptations and suffering. "Only one life to live, and must make the most of my time." Upon the earth he traveled. The friend he found in him a friend, the sorrowing one a comforter. The weak and hopeless ones were cheered, the tempted were strengthened, the degraded lifted up and encouraged to a better living.

After fourscore years of kindly, useful deeds, one day, with a smile, closed his eyes upon the world's scenes. His many friends came crowding round to take a last farewell. Through their eyes they looked and saw God's peace upon the quiet face; the same gentle smile shined about the lips, and the willing, helpful hands were clasped across the quiet breast. Many loving words these lips had spoken! Many blessed deeds these hands had done! And now, though many years have passed, words and deeds are not forgotten, and his grave fresh flowers bloom, planted by loving hands. You and I have but one life here upon earth. What shall we make of it? The choice lies with us. Shall we live for the self or the Master?—Selected.

Items Concerning the Society.

You are informed that Baltimore Yearly Meeting is willing to accept in the main the "Uniform Outline," left it for a year with a Committee for consideration suited to the special condition of the Yearly Meeting.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING.

The meeting convened on Second-day, Tenth month 8th. The Meeting for Sufferings and that for Ministers and Elders were held on Seventh-day. The Meeting for Worship on First-day was not so large as last year. Ministers from the Yearly Meetings having Minutes, were present: O. Harvey, of Kansas; Henry T. Outland, of North Carolina, and Esther Fowler, of Ohio. Visiting Friends, without Minutes from Ohio and Kansas Yearly Meetings, were in attendance. We esteem it as an evidence of our Heavenly Father's continued mercy that He has sent amongst us some of his messengers, who have, we believe, enabled rightly to divide the word of Truth. On account of poor health Abel H. Blackburn was permitted to be released from being clerk, which was granted, and Albert Maxwell was appointed clerk for the day. The committee appointed last year on the subject of improving the facilities for the Yearly Meeting proposed that we should be placed in the care of the Yearly Meeting and held by trustees, the interest of which should be used for the support of schools within the limits of the Yearly Meeting for the education of the children, members of the Yearly Meeting, and children who have been placed under the care of us as members of their families, the agreement being that the subscription to be valid and binding when the sum of two thousand (2,000) dollars shall be subscribed. The report was satisfactory, and the committee was continued to solicit contributions and report to a future sitting.

On Third-day morning Mahlon Johnson, on behalf of the representatives, proposed Albert Maxwell for clerk, and Joseph Allen for assistant, who were appointed to the service. The Book, Tract, Peace and Temperance Committees showed a practical interest in their work, and the following was appended to their report: "The introduction of military drill in the public schools, the agitation now in the world which is stirring up the spirit of war, and the alarming growth of the liquor traffic should stir our members to use every right effort to maintain inviolate the principles and position which the Society of Friends has always held on these subjects."

During the reading of the queries and answers thereto we were made sensible of the want of watchfulness in the maintenance of our precious principles and testimonies. The primitive believers in Christ are described as walking in the fear of the Lord and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost.

The fear of God which thus marked the disciples at the beginning, was also an eminent characteristic of the religious experience of our forefathers in the truth. They were made to tremble before the Lord under the sense of their own corruption in the fall, and of his holiness, and when brought, through the grace of Christ, to partake of the joy and peace of believing, this holy reverence and awe dwelt with increasing power upon their spirits, kept them in watchfulness and in tenderness, and in a remarkable manner accompanied the outpouring of the Spirit upon them for services in the church.

On Fourth-day two Meetings for Worship were held, which were satisfactory and felt by many to be seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. On Fifth-day the committee, which had been continued at a former sitting to solicit subscriptions for a school fund, reported that they had received subscriptions to the amount called for, which we believe to be a hopeful indication of an increased interest in education.

NATHAN PINSON.

DANVILLE, Ind.
Eleventh Month 17th, 1900.

Notes from Others.

A minister of the Gospel has the right to do what any Christian has the right to do. There is not one moral law for ministers and another for other Christians. At the same time there is such a thing as propriety, and every sensible minister will take care not to transcend the limits that are set by the propriety [of his station].—The Watchman.

"Indianapolis telephone subscribers have made arrangements with the central office to have their telephone bell act as an alarm clock," says Popular Science. "Orders have been left there for the purpose, and the manager has a regular schedule of calls from 4.30 to 7.30 A. M. Persons who wish to take early trains out of town leave orders with the manager, and there is no danger of missing their trains. It has also frequently happened that a subscriber has left word to be called at one-hour or two-hour intervals during the night where he has had to take medicine, and much inconvenience and worry has been saved thereby."

SMALL MARKET FOR SILENCE.—A prominent firm of London clock manufacturers recently discovered that a rival German company were doing a large trade in cheap clocks which were sent out to the west coast of South Africa. They got hold of a sample and, finding that there was a heavy profit on the sale, invested a large sum of money in making a better article, thousands of which were shipped to the same market. Sales were very slow, while the inferior German production sold freely. Finally the explanation came. Savages like noise.

The clocks made by the original exporters had a particularly loud and aggressive tick. Their imitators made a better clock; but it was almost noiseless, and the savages would have none of it. The remedy was simple. The next shipload that was despatched by the English firm were of vile construction, but ticked loud enough to wake sound sleepers, and the natives were delighted. Thus was virtue unrewarded, while astuteness was loaded with good things.—London Daily Chronicle.

BIBLE HELPS AND THE HELPER.—We live in a day of multitudes of helps in Bible study, and it is often a great temptation to try to take the digested food of a help, and so more quickly to appropriate its truths; but I would here assert with earnest conviction that the one great commentator who enables us to understand the Bible is the Holy Spirit. This is his peculiar work; the book is his and the application of the words to the individual life is his, and no human agent, formula, or catechism dare supplant the Divine guide under penalty of utter failure of being able to exercise quickening faith and of understanding the message aright. It seems to me that the class of simply devotional books are even worse than useless, as they never turn out anything better than weak, lackadaisical Christians. The best books are those which continually send the student right back to the Bible to test the truth of their statements, looking to God alone to open up its meaning by his Holy Spirit, fully persuaded that these things cannot be understood by the natural man. He cannot receive them, for they are foolishness to him, for they are spiritually discerned; the gift of the Spirit is the supreme gift to this age from God through Christ.—Howard A. Kelly, M. D. (of Baltimore.)

CHURCH DECLINE.—E. P. Wise, minister of a church—the Disciples of Christ—whose membership has increased seventy-one per cent. in the past ten years, believes that there is just cause for alarm on the part of all Christian people in this general backward trend. Numbers, to be sure, he remarks, do not in themselves count with God; but still the Christian—like the Buddhist and the Mohammedan—believes that the welfare of the world depends upon its accepting his own point of view; and if he cannot successfully evangelize his own country and his own town, his hopes of rescuing the world from the outer darkness must begin to seem faint. E. P. Wise finds the cause of the present unsatisfactory state of Christendom to lie, not in the hardness of heart or the rationalizing mind of the unconverted, but in the worldliness of the churches and their members. He believes furthermore that failure to make Christ the centre of all preaching, and lack of reliance upon the power of the Holy Spirit, are also important causes. In the same category he places the results of the higher criticism upon the popular mind, believing that it has temporarily affected the authority of the Bible, and in the minds of great multitudes "the net result of the destructive criticism has been to destroy faith in the divine element in the Book."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Secretary Hay has received a petition from nearly all the leading cotton manufacturers of the South that he take such action as may be within his power to prevent the interference by any European Power which might close the foreign markets to the important cotton manufacturers of the United States, as well as injuring many other American interests. The petitioners represent fully $15,000,000 in capital and declare that they have lost half their trade since the Boxer uprising, and are now running on half time. This is only one of many communications that have been received at the State Department which has influenced it to endeavor to secure an honorable settlement of the Chinese troubles as speedily as possible, even at the risk of offending some of the Powers which are bent on vengeance.

A proposal by the Powers to destroy the tombs of the Ming Dynasty, as a means of preventing a recurrence of recent outrages in China has been disapproved of by the U. S. Government. The reverence entertained by Chinese for the tombs of their ancestors is well known; but the feeling entertained for the tombs of the dynasty is even more impressive, and an attempt to destroy them may, it is believed in Washington, cause serious trouble.

The United States Government has been officially notified that China had ordered the imprisonment for life of Prince Tuan and Prince Chwang, and had also imposed punishment upon other Boxer leaders; but at a Cabinet meeting it was decided that the General commanding the China army should also be included among those to be punished, and Minister Conger was so notified.

The American Consul at Canton has been notified that the Board of Reconstruction has been ordered to pay $10,000 as the first instalment in settlement of American claims.

The President has expressed the hope that all the members of his Cabinet would remain in office during the next four years.

M. G. Brumbaugh, Commissioner of Education for Porto Rico, says the school system now in operation there includes 800 teachers and 38,000 pupils. This is only a beginning, as there are 300,000 children of school age without school facilities, most of whom would enroll if they could.

A delegate to Congress was elected in Hawaii, by the party in sympathy with the late Queen who still hopes she may be restored to the throne. The population of Hawaii is stated to be 154,001, an increase of 44,981 since 1896.

The production of oleomargarine for the year ending Sixth Month 30th is said to have been 81,139,901 pounds. The principal places for the manufacture of oleomargarine are in Illinois, Kansas, Ohio and Rhode Island. The district which include the packing houses near Chicago produces the greatest quantity, over 39,000,000 pounds having been produced in that district last year.

At least two mammoth iron steamships are now in course of construction near New London, Conn., for the Pacific trade, which are to be larger than any vessels in the world now building or planned. The new vessels will be 20,000 tons register, and 33,000 tons displacement; or just 10,000 tons more displacement than the new Atlantic steamer "Deutschland." They are designed to carry cattle, chilled or frozen meats in refrigerating chambers, fruit or any kind of cargo that may appear for transportation.

Snow fell on the 14th and 15th inst. in Western New York, near Dunkirk, to the depth of 18 to 24 inches.

The United States produces 22,220 pounds of grain for each inhabitant; England only 360 pounds.

The annual report of the Life Saving Service says that there are 239 stations, 194 being on the Atlantic, 58 on the lakes, 16 on the Pacific, and 1 at the Falls of the Ohio, at Louisville, Ky. The number of disasters to documented vessels within the field of operations of the service during the year was 361. There were on board these vessels 2655 persons, of whom 2607 were saved and 48 lost. The estimated value of the vessels involved in disaster was $6,127,500, and of their cargoes, $3,342,690, making a total value of property imperiled $9,470,190. Of this amount $7,234,690 was saved and $2,235,500 lost. The number of vessels totally lost was 61.

The Pittsburgh Coal Company has inaugurated a plan whereby its 20,000 employees are not only to become stockholders in the company, but will have an accident and death fund, to be followed by a system of pensioning all those employed by the company in any capacity.

A dispatch from Washington states that there has been found in Peking records that prove conclusively that a landing was made on this Continent by the Mongolians in the year 129 A. D., centuries before Columbus was born, and before the acceptance of the theory that the earth is a globe led the men of Europe to seek a new world in the West. The story is that five adventurous missionaries sailed from the eastern coast of China, crossing the Pacific and skirting the Fox Islands, and finally sighting the western coast of the American Continent. They turned southward and proceeded along within sight of the shore until a landing was made in Mexico, opposite the Peninsula of Yucatan. It is said tablets have been found in the State of Soconra, in Mexico, covered with Chinese characters.

According to Commissioner of Immigration Fitchie, of New York, immigrants have arrived in this country at the rate of 1000 per day from all countries since the Seventh Month last.

Preliminary estimates of the average yield of crops have been published from Washington, as follows: Of corn, 25.3 bushels per acre; of buckwheat, 15 bushels; of potatoes, 88.0 bushels; of hay, 1.28 tons.

The population of the State of Pennsylvania as announced by the Census Bureau is 6,302,115, as against 5,258,014 in 1890, an increase of 1,044,101, or 19.8 per cent.

There were 439 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 70 more than the previous week and 74 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 224 were males and 215 females: 41 died of consumption; 46 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 25 of cancer; 21 of diphtheria; 18 of apoplexy, and 6 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 10 $\frac{3}{8}$ ¢ per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.30 to $2.50; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.35 to $3.45; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.65; spring, straight, $3.50 to $3.85; city mills, straight, $3.45 to $3.65.

GRAIN—No. 2 red wheat, 71 $\frac{3}{4}$  to 72¢.
No. 2 mixed corn, new, 43 $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 28 $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5 $\frac{1}{8}$  to 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢; good, 4 $\frac{1}{4}$  to 5¢; medium, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ ¢.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ ¢; good, 3 $\frac{1}{4}$  to 4¢; common, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 2¢; spring lambs, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 6¢.

HOGS.—Best Western, 7 to 7 $\frac{1}{4}$ ¢.

FOREIGN.—The foreign troops in China have seized the tombs near Peking, and in an engagement 300 Boxers were slain.

Sanitary conditions in Peking are becoming serious. Since the foreign occupation many Chinese have died of smallpox and other infectious diseases. Fearing that their funerals would be interfered with, they have kept most of the coffins containing their dead in their houses and courtyards. Smallpox, which is always prevalent, is much more malignant during the winter season, and the danger is now alarmingly increased.

A letter from a Belgian traveller has been published which gives an account of the results of the destruction of the Chinese along the Amur River, which surpasses in horror those previously published. He says: "From Blagovetchensk to Aigun, 45 kilometers, numerous villages studded the bank, with a thriving, industrious population of over 100,000. That of Aigun was 20,000. No one will ever know the number of those who perished by shot, sword and stream. Not a village is left. The silence of death was around us, the smoking ruins of Aigun on the right, with broken down, crumbling walls and shattered, roofless houses." The river Amur was crowded with corpses, of which it was estimated 12,000 encumbered the river, thousands of whom were women and children. This awful destruction appears to have been accomplished by Russian troops forcing the inhabitants into the river, where they were drowned.

The population of the city of Tien Tsui it is said now reaches 600,000 Chinese, and the allies are strengthening the garrison as against a possible surprise. It is supposed that one-third of the inhabitants are Boxers.

Refugees at Canton report that anti-Christian riots have broken out in the province of Kiang-Si. The non-Christians are wearing badges, and all persons not so decorated are in danger of death.

A despatch from Peking says: The Chinese Police Commissioners have received a telegram from the Empress Dowager, dated the 10th instant, censuring their failure to prevent the despatch of foreign punitive expeditions into the interior.

The Czar of Russia is now sick with typhoid fever, though it is asserted not seriously so. In relation to this the London Times says: "It is hardly necessary to say that any event which will lead to a change in the occupant of the Russian throne, at the present anxious state in the far East, might very gravely prejudice the situation."

Indian corn does not mature when planted in Germany and other countries of Central and Northern Europe. Since 1891, when Europe imported but 23,000,000 bushels of this grain from the United States, its use as cattle feed has steadily grown, and last year's imports from the United States alone aggregated 189,000,000 bushels. Of this, 45,250,000 bushels went to Germany. It is said that if efforts were made to educate European people to the various uses of Indian corn as a palatable and wholesome article for human food, our exports in corn meal and corn would attain astonishing proportions and become of great benefit to the poor working classes of Europe.

In a speech before the Reichstag the Imperial Chancellor von Buelow stated the demands of the powers upon China as follows:

"China shall erect a monument to Baron von Ketteler on the site where he was murdered, and send an imperial Prince to Germany to convey an apology. She shall inflict the death penalty upon eleven princes and officials already named, and suspend provincial examinations for five years where the outrages occurred.

"In future all officials failing to prevent anti-foreign outrages within their jurisdiction shall be dismissed and punished.

"Indemnity shall be paid to States, corporations and individuals. The Tsung-li-Yamen shall be abolished as its functions vested in a foreign Minister. Rational intercourse shall be permitted with the Emperor, as civilized countries.

"The forts at Taku and the other forts on the coast of Chi-Li shall be razed, and the importation of arms a war material prohibited.

"Permanent legation guards shall be maintained, and also guards of communication between Peking and the sea." "Imperial proclamations shall be posted for two years throughout the Empire suppressing Boxers.

"Indemnity is to include compensation for Chinese who suffered through being employed by foreigners, but no compensation for native Christians.

"China shall erect expiatory monuments in every foreign or international burial ground where graves have been profaned.

"The Chinese Government shall undertake to enter upon negotiations for such changes in existing treaties regarding trade and navigation as foreign Governments deem advisable, and with reference to other matters having in view the facilitation of commercial relations.

It appears from the census in Cuba, that Spanish rule, which led to the insurrection, cost the island least 200,000 lives. The losses were caused by war, Weyler's reconcentration policy, by decrease of birth and immigration, and by a corresponding increase of deaths and emigration. Immigration has lately been large.

A very considerable increase in the activity of troops in the Philippines has taken place. Many skirmishes have occurred and several small engagements in Northern Luzon.

The recent edict of the Czar of Russia by which imprisonment is substituted for transportation to Siberia will affect, it is calculated, an average of about 3 persons annually leaving only about 100 persons charged with political or ecclesiastical offenses, and 430 unfortunates vagabonds yearly to suffer exile. This revulsion in the penal system is expected not only to be of immense humanitarian value in the relief from the terrible sufferings of transportation to Siberia for thousands of prisoners, but also to be of great benefit to Siberia which has been seriously menaced by the concentration of so many criminal and dangerous elements in its territory. Siberia has received in the last twelve years 100,852 transported persons who with their families number 159,191 individuals.

The Pope of Rome in a recent letter speaks thus of active proselytism carried on by certain Protestant bodies, particularly the Italian Waldenses and American Baptists and Methodists: "From the very outset of pontificate we have had occasion to point out as one of the most deplorable evils brought by the new order of things to this capital of the Christian world, the active proselytism displayed on the part of heresy and the to which the faith of our people was in consequence exposed. Let the faithful be convinced of the truth nothing can be greater or more precious than the true of that faith for which their fathers fearlessly not only want and misery, but frequently violent persecutions and death itself. And this feeling of strength not but be natural and deep-rooted in the souls of our population, which knows well that the Catholic Church not only possesses divine characteristics to distinguish it as the only true one, and the only one who has received the promise of immortal life, but that also at all times conferred inestimable benefits on Rome, Italy, and the world," etc.

NOTICES.

ERRATA.—In the lines concerning Margaret Hutton, second stanza, on page 127, the word "nature" appearing in manuscript, should be changed to "man." In fifth stanza for "even" read "ever"; in the eighth "poured" read "owned"; and in the twelfth for "see" read "rounds."

FRIENDS' INSTITUTE LYCEUM.—The first meeting of the Lyceum will be held at 140 North Sixteenth Street, Sixth day, Eleventh Month 23d, at 8 P. M. Program: The Paris Exposition of 1900. Illustrated. Will Rau.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage will leave Philadelphia 7.17 and 8.19 A. M., and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when ready at West Gate fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., two cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, Westtown Station or West Chester, Phone 85.

EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, JR.

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 1, 1900.

No. 20.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

scriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,

PHILADELPHIA.

South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth.)

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

read as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

OMILETICALLY SOUND, SPIRITUALLY SPURIOUS—Sound sermons cannot make sound preaching unless they are more than sound.

Christian business is morally debasing by its actors.

The true way to adapt Quakerism to modern needs is to adapt modern interests to the needs of the Spirit of Truth.

We received some time since, from Cyrus Harvey, of Galena, Kansas, his treatise on "The Baptism on the Holy Spirit"—a strong, eloquent and searching argument in support of the following position:

We are in agreement that there is but "one baptism," and that whatever the one baptism is, it is at which "now saves us" (Pet. iii: 21); if any other baptism is established as the "one baptism," that baptism with the Holy Spirit is to be rejected; on the other hand, if the baptism of the Holy Spirit is shown to be Christ's baptism, and to conform to the "Christian baptism," the real gospel baptism must be established.

able at present to give this able addition to our controversial literature the attention which it deserves, we simply note the fact that the Kansas Yearly Meeting, to which the treatise belongs, has adopted his treatise for circulation. (78 pages, price 50 cents.)

so the report of that Yearly Meeting's proceedings given in our present number shows a spontaneous interest sprang up in that favor of a more thorough circulation of "The Friend" among its membership. This cheering to our laborers here, who wish to sustain those hearts and hands in every word and work in the Truth which they have espoused, and to be joined to the true church in every place; and to take heed, for ourselves and the flock, of this counsel of George Burdett: "Beware of discouraging any in the work of God. The laborers are few that are faithful for God. Take heed of hurting the gift which God hath given to profit withal, whereby ye have received life through death, and a measure of peace by the destruction of evil. . . . Some speak to the conscience; some plow and break the clods; some weed out, and some sow; some wait that the fowls devour not the seed. But wait all for the gathering of the simple hearted ones; for they that turn many to righteousness shall shine forever."

At the same time from another quarter comes a subscription, with these words:

It is one of my most earnest longings that Friends should be won back to a pure Quakerism, and I should wish to see THE FRIEND so conducted and edited as to appeal to those who are following what some of us feel to be error, largely because the Truth has been presented to them sorely cumbered with the accretions of human weaknesses. If THE FRIEND will breathe a spirit of invitation and a gathering love, I trust its influence may be greatly extended and true Quakerism be nurtured in the East and the West, the North and the South.

We desire to share in the gathering spirit which our correspondent breathes, and are reminded of the invisible language which seemed to be inscribed on its sheet as THE FRIEND first came under our responsibility, "A repairer of the breach and a restorer of paths to dwell in." May saving grace so order our heart in his word as to promote the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, and without that scattering weakness which could wink at rocks of danger when we see them.

RESISTING THE COMING CONQUEROR.—"What shall I do with Jesus?" said a political ruler; and it continues to be the greatest political question and the "paramount issue." It is a government question, which, suppress it as cabinet or councils may, will not down, and must be reckoned with sooner or later. "Which shall have free course and be glorified in the political state?" "Not this man," cries the rabble, "but the robber! Crucify the Christ!" And so, what becomes of the Pilate who does, by a shift of responsibility, crucify Him? As said the apostate emperor on receiving his death wound, "Galilean, thou hast conquered!" so it is inevitable that "at the name of Jesus, every knee shall bow and every tongue confess." It remains as true as ever, that had the princes of this world known the wisdom which is from above, they would not be crucifying the Lord of glory.

Slavery in the Transvaal.

An incidental result of the Transvaal war, as of our war for the Union, seems likely to be the deliverance of the blacks in that country from their condition of slavery. Neither of the two wars was waged primarily with that intention as the motive, but both of them are traceable to slavery as their first great cause. Our relief at such portion of the result in each case does in no wise compromise our abhorrence of the monstrous sin called war; nor does any overruling of a sin for a good result justify the sin, or take a shade off from its sinfulness.

From a book by John H. Povill the following has been gathered:

"The South African War, as it goes on, draws increasing attention to the fate of the two Republics and to the struggle between the two white races involved, until every one is in danger of forgetting the Transvaal holds four times as many blacks as whites, whose rights and future are quite as much at stake as those of the Boers. For whatever may be the equities of the issues between the two white races in South Africa, no doubt whatever exists as to the treatment of the colored races by the Transvaal. Its loss of independence will stand in final history as one of those inevitable retributions which always attend the oppression of one race by another, unless law take the place of violence—a truth as sure in our own States as in South Africa.

"The fundamental Boer principle in the treatment of the colored race is embodied in this dictum of Transvaal law: 'The people shall not permit any equality of colored persons with white inhabitants, neither in the Church nor in the State.' Three laws have been enacted in accordance with this fundamental provision—first, prohibiting a native from owning realty; second, refusing him marriage by civil or ecclesiastical process, and, third, closing the courts to him in any civil action against a white man.

"The criminal laws apply to white and black alike, but in the Boer courts the testimony of a negro has no weight by the side of a white man. In civil claims he has no recourse or redress. The only marriage which he is permitted to practice is that under his tribal regulation. Custom goes a step further and forbids his presence on the sidewalk, and maladministration has permitted an unlimited supply of liquor in a country where every other white administration makes every possible effort to suppress the sale of alcohol to the negro.

"These statutes and the results which flow from them are given at length in a work just published by John H. Povill, 'Natives Under the Transvaal Flag.' The original Boer trek (or migration northward) began because Great Britain insisted on the emancipation of the negro. This step was undoubtedly taken with less consideration for the property rights of the white owners than was the case in the West Indies, but in this country at least it has never been felt that the slaveholder had property rights in man which ought to be considered, and in our Civil War such rights were all swept aside for loyal and disloyal alike when the time had come for emancipation.

"Restrained by treaty from continuing slavery in the Transvaal, the Boers adopted the system of law which has just been outlined in order to compass the subjection of the black. Oppression has undoubtedly existed in the various contract systems in force at Kimberley and elsewhere, but the evidence is overwhelming that this is trivial by the side of the direct and personal ill treatment, oppression and denial of all civil rights visited by the Boers on the black.

"History has no lesson more inevitable than the certainty with which the denial of moral and civil rights is visited upon the race of the oppressor. Political rights often have to be delayed until a race is ready for them, but no human being is too ignorant, too weak or too depraved to be beyond the protection of equitable and just law. The worse the condition of any human being the more necessary is this protection. The denial of law and its protection to the negro in [any country] to-day is a greater crime than the denial through the forms of law of his political rights.

"For laws of changeless justice bind
Oppressor and oppressed.
And close as sin and suffering joined
They march to fate abreast."

How and When to Read.

A. R. Spofford, late librarian of the Congressional Library in Washington, in his "Book for All Readers," gives the following advice:

"The art of reading to the best advantage implies the command of adequate time to read. The art of having time to read depends upon knowing how to make the best use of our days. Days are short, and time is fleeting, but no one's day ever holds less than twenty-four hours. Engrossing as one's occupation may be, it need never consume all the time remaining from sleep, refreshment, and social intercourse. The half-hour before breakfast, the fifteen minutes waiting for dinner, given to the book you wish to read, will soon finish it and make room for another. The busiest men I have known have often been the most intelligent and the widest readers. The idle person never knows how to make use of odd moments; the busy one always knows how. Yet the vast majority of people go through life without ever learning the great lesson of the supreme value of moments. Let us suppose that you determine to devote two hours every day to reading. That is equivalent to more than seven hundred hours a year, or to three months of working time, of eight hours a day. What could you not do in three months if you had all the time to yourself? You could almost learn a new language, or master a new science; yet these two hours a day, which would give you three months of free time every year, are frittered away, you scarcely know how, in aimless matters that lead to nothing. A famous writer of our century devoted only four hours a day to writing, yet he produced more than sixty volumes of singular literary merit. The great naturalist, Darwin, a chronic sufferer from a depressing malady; counted two hours a fortunate day's work for him, yet he accomplished results in the world of science which render his name immortal.

"Be not particular as to hours, or the time of day, and you will soon find that all hours are good for [improvement]. Have a purpose and adhere to it with good-humored pertinacity."

Apart from works of pure literature, and spiritual edifying, which should be read lovingly and slowly, and inwardly digested, in accord with Bacon's counsel, A. R. Spofford strongly advises the early formation of a "shorthand method" of reading. He says:

"Most writers envelop the thought or the fact in so much verbiage, complicate it with so many episodes, beat it out thin by so much iteration and reiteration, that the student must needs learn the art of skipping in self-defense. To one in zealous pursuit of knowledge, to read most books through is paying them too extravagant a compliment. He has to read between the lines, as it were, to note down a fact here or a thought there, or an illustration elsewhere, and leave alone all that contributes nothing to his special purpose. As the quick, practised eye glances over the visible signs of thought, page after page is rapidly absorbed, and a book which would occupy an ordinary reader many days in reading is mastered in a few hours.

"The habit of reading I have outlined, and which may be called the intuitive method, or, if you prefer it, the shorthand method, will more than double the working power of the reader. It is not difficult to practise, especially to a busy man, who does with all his might what he has got to do; but it should be learned early in life, when the faculties are fresh, the mind full of zeal for knowledge, and the mental habits are ductile, not fixed. With it, one's capacity for acquiring knowledge, and consequently his accomplishment, whether as writer, teacher, librarian, or private student, will be immeasurably increased."

GOD IN THE CREATION.—In common with the great unphilosophical mass of mankind, I hold that between cause and effect there is a binding power which constrains one to follow the other. If asked whence we suppose that power to have been derived, such of us as are conscious that we are "no very great wits," don't mind confessing that we "believe in a God," will neither mind suggesting that the power, wherever not exerted by an animated creature, may possibly be directly from God. For from there being any difficulty in conceiving Omnipresent Deity to be exhibiting his might in every speck of universal space in every instant of never-ending time, it is, on the contrary, impossible to conceive otherwise. We cannot conceive one single minutest point in limitless extension to be for one moment exempt from the immediate control of a Divine nature assumed to be

Diffused throughout infinity's expanse
And co-existent with eternity.

—Wm. Thomas Thornton.

First Meeting of the Colonial Congress.

John Adams's description of the opening the first meeting of the Colonial Congress Philadelphia:

"When the Congress met, Mr. Cushing made a motion that it should be opened with prayer. It was opposed by Mr. Jay, of New York, and Mr. Rutledge, of South Carolina, because we were so divided in religious sentiments—some Episcopalians, some Quakers, some Anabaptists, some Presbyterians, and some Congregationalists—that we could not join in the act of worship. Mr. Samuel Adams arose and said that he was no bigot, and could hear prayer from any gentleman of piety and virtue, who was at the same time a friend to country. He was a stranger in Philadelphia but had heard that Mr. Duche (Dushay then pronounced it) deserved that character, and therefore, he moved that Mr. Duche, an Episcopalian clergyman, might be desired to read prayers to Congress to-morrow morning. The motion was seconded and passed to the affirmative. Mr. Randolph, our President, waited Mr. D., and received for answer that if health would permit he certainly would. Accordingly next morning he appeared with [clerk] and in his pontificals, and read several prayers in the established form, and then read the psalter for the seventh day September, which was the 35th Psalm. You must remember that this was the next morning after we had heard of the horrible cannonade at Boston. It seemed as if heaven had ordained that psalm to be read on that morning. At this, Mr. Duche, unexpectedly to everybody struck out into extemporary prayer, which filled the bosom of every man present. I confess I never heard a better prayer, or so well pronounced. Episcopalian as he was, Dr. Cooper himself never prayed with so fervor, such ardor, such correctness of pathos, and in language so elegant and suitable, for America, for Congress, for the Province of Massachusetts Bay, especially the city of Boston. It had excellent effect on everybody here. I must beg of you to read that psalm. If there is any faith in the sortes Virgilianae or Homericæ, or especially sortes Biblicæ, it would have been thought providential. Here was a scene worthy of painter's art. It was in Carpenters' Hall Philadelphia—a building that still survives—that the devoted individuals met to whom service was read. Washington was kneeling, and Henry, and Randolph, and Rutledge, and Lee, and Jay, and by their sides stood, bowed in reverence, the Puritan patriots of New England, who at that moment had no reason to believe that an armed soldiery was wasting their humble households. It was believed that Boston had been bombarded and destroyed. They prayed fervently for America, for the Congress, for the Province of Massachusetts Bay, and especially for the city of Boston, and who can realize the emotion with which they turned imploringly to heaven for Divine interposition and aid? It was enough," says Mr. Adams, "to melt a heart of stone. I saw the tears gush into the eyes of the old, grave, pacific Quakers of Philadelphia."

Unbelief is always impatient, but faith is willing to wait God's time.

A PRAYER FOR THE SPIRIT.

Prayers I make will then be sweet indeed,
 If Thou the Spirit give by which I pray;
 My unassisted heart is barren clay,
 That of its native self can nothing feed.
 Of good and pious work thou art the seed
 That quickens only where thou say'st it may.
 Unless thou show to us thine own true way man can find it. Father, thou must lead!
 thou, then, breathe those thoughts into my mind,
 By which such virtue may in me be bred,
 That in thy holy footsteps I may tread,
 The fetters of my tongue do thou unbind,
 That I may have the power to sing of thee,
 And sound thy praises everlastingly.

—Michael Angelo.

Educational Voices.

The teacher's mission is to give all that is in life from whatever source, that the soul of what our nation may become, and that shall become, shall be fulfilled only when heaven and earth clasp hands.—Matthews.

Too many teachers drift along from year to year, and reach the fatal "dead line" early in life. Do not let your school duties keep you from doing some regular systematic reading. Catch the spirit of the times and be a living, thinking, growing teacher.—C. M. Parker.

In the organization and conduct of its work the school must be consciously guided by this fundamental law of growth: "From experience, through thought, to achievement" from experiment, through theory, to practice.—W. Elson, Wisconsin.

What the working world asks of the schools is to send it boys of character. Our hearts are sick of mere work and money making. We do not want machines, we want men. We do not ask for shrewd, keen men, we appeal to you for upright men.—N. H. Nelson, St. Louis Business Man.

Jesus commanded his disciples: "Go ye into the world and teach all nations;" purify the heart, lead them to the knowledge of God the Father, of Jesus the Son of God, and of the Holy Spirit of God, to a life in accordance with this knowledge and insight, and to all indeed necessarily proceeding from this.—Froebel.

Education consists in leading man, as a thinking, intelligent being, growing into self-consciousness, to a pure and unsullied, conscious and free representation of the inner law of Divine unity, and in teaching him ways and means thereto.—Froebel.

It is somewhat shocking to discover how few men and women, even among those who claim the title of "educated," know or care much about really good literature. They read—the newspapers, the magazines, and the latest, most sensational novels. But with these persons there is little acquaintance or affection, being for its object what is really pure, noble and elevating in the world's best books. I regret, it, then, as of the utmost importance to hold up a high standard of literary culture as the inspiration and aim of all those who would claim to a truly liberal education.—George Turnbull Ladd.

Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy mind.—Mark xii: 30.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Kansas Yearly Meeting.

Kansas Yearly Meeting began with a session of the meeting of ministers and elders, held at Spring River, Cherokee Co., Kansas, on Fifth-day, the twenty-fifth of Tenth Month, 1900.

This opening session was comforted by the presence of Henry T. Outland, of North Carolina. A larger delegation than usual had come from Emporia, and the northern parts of the State; so the meeting opened with a good attendance, and proved to be a favored opportunity.

On the morning of the 26th, the day on which the Yearly Meeting for business assembled, the community was shocked by an accident which happened to our aged Friend, Andrew Hinshaw, who fell down stairs and was so injured that for some days his life seemed to hang in doubt.
 The whole meeting was touched and moved to sympathy with this dear Friend. He had come from his home to attend the Yearly Meeting, and yet he could not attend any of its sessions.

The custom of Kansas Yearly Meeting is to precede all its business sessions with a joint meeting for worship of both men and women Friends. These opportunities for worship were felt to be seasons of great spiritual comfort and blessing. Many of the young people were much tendered in these meetings.

In the first session of the meeting the epistles were read from Iowa, Western, Ohio, New England and Canada, the five Yearly Meetings in correspondence with Kansas Yearly Meeting.
 It was felt to be a source of great comfort to Friends to secure these evidences of a common faith and a common purpose to hold and maintain the ancient principles of Friends. A large committee was appointed to prepare essays of reply to these Epistles.

On Seventh-day, the 27th, Levi Bowles was reappointed as Clerk, with Alva J. Smith as assistant. The meeting then entered on the reading of the Queries and Answers.

In treating of the deficiencies and causes that prevent the prosperity and growth of individuals and the church, Friends were warned that the Spirit that takes offense is the same nature of the one that gives offense. And that the Divine love that "covers the multitude of sins" hides or covers the sins of others, because our own sins are covered by Christ's blood.

The public meetings on First-day were very largely attended by other people not members.
 The morning meeting was the largest gathering since the division, twenty-one years ago.
 There was enlargement with ministry on the prayer of Elisha for his servant, that the "Lord would open the eyes of his servant," to see the hosts of the Lord surrounding them. The message was pressed home that it was needful to have our spiritual eyes opened before we could see the wondrous things in store for those that loved the Lord.

The ministry in the afternoon session was mainly an application of the same principle of a needed spiritual opening of the eyes of the heart as a qualification for the ministry. The danger of believers persisting in their own wills in any course of religious service, when in true tenderness they have been shown once or more by the Holy Spirit that it was wrong, was illustrated and enforced by the case of Baalam, who so desired the "wages of unrighteousness"

that he persisted in his endeavor to get Divine permission to curse Israel, that God in his anger let him go, and then rebuked him by the mouth of the dumb ass.

The session of the Yearly Meeting on Second-day was mainly occupied with the routine business of the Yearly Meeting.

The Committee on Books and Tracts made their report for their year's work. The report showed that the committee had distributed about thirty-seven thousand pages of Friends' tracts the past year, and also fifty-one books and pamphlets. An interesting feature of their work was the information that they had availed themselves of the Young Men's Christian Association, and W. C. T. U., of Joplin, Mo., for the distribution of many tracts. These associations were glad of such a chance to secure proper literature for circulation in their religious work. The committee were encouraged by the Yearly Meeting to continue to use these openings and to extend similar opportunities to other cities in this great mining region—there being five cities with an average population of fifteen thousand each within thirty miles of Spring River Meeting place. The Yearly Meeting made an appropriation for the use of this committee.

The Committee on Religious Labor made report that nearly all the members of the Yearly Meeting had been visited the past year.
 Thirty-four meetings for worship had been held under the concern of the committee. About twenty-three of these meetings were held in the evening or on First-day, during the summer months, at Spring River, as a means of keeping many young people in our limits from the associations and temptations which are incident to a mining region such as we have near us.

The report of the Committee on Education shows that there are two hundred and eighty-three children of school age in our limits.

Two Friends' schools have been maintained in our limits the past year. One small school in Cottonwood Quarterly Meeting, with an enrollment of eight and an average attendance of seven and one-half.

Spring River Academy, the other school, had an enrollment of eighty-seven; seventy-two of these pupils were members with Friends.
 The Academy is in a prosperous condition at this time, with an enrollment of eighty-seven for the present winter term.

The meeting of Ministers and Elders made report that Spring River Quarter had recorded Enoch Carter a minister of the gospel, and Lavina J. Harvey as an elder the past year.

The reading of the minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings showed that that body had approved and recommended for circulation as an exponent of Friends' views, a book written by C. W. Harvey, entitled "The Baptism of the Holy Spirit."

The presence of Henry T. Outland, and his services, met with such response in the hearts of Friends, that the committee appointed by the Yearly Meeting on returning minutes, made report that as they believed the time had come when a sound and rightly anointed Friend should be received by this Yearly Meeting although not in official relation with the meeting from which he came, yet the way seemed to open in the Truth to give him a minute testifying our unity with him and his labors of love amongst us. This report was approved by the meeting, and a returning minute granted him without any reference to the Yearly Meeting from which he came.

An interesting discussion occurred near the close of the meeting with reference to THE FRIEND. The meeting was informed that a very interesting case of conviction of Friends' principles in a person who became a member the past year, had resulted from reading THE FRIEND. The members of the meeting were encouraged to make an effort to get THE FRIEND into other families. The meeting was united in instructing its treasurer to pay the cost of furnishing a copy of THE FRIEND in which the report of the Yearly Meeting appears to every family belonging to this Yearly Meeting, and also appointed two Friends to prepare the report of the Yearly Meeting and forward the names of the Friends' families of the Yearly Meeting.

The Particular Meeting at this place (Spring River) had been without the presence of several of its valued members for some months previous to the Yearly Meeting,—two ministers and one elder being in Iowa, and one minister and two elders in Indiana, engaged in social and religious visiting in these places. One minister, much to our regret, was absent from our own Yearly Meeting. The return of all these Friends except the latter, near the beginning of the Yearly Meeting, together with so many Friends from other parts, was a matter of special enjoyment to the Friends of Spring River Meeting.

The first sitting revealed the fact that this would be the largest Yearly Meeting for some years past, perhaps since the disturbances of twenty-five years ago. About six hack loads of Friends were met at Galena on Fourth-day evening, and driven to different parts of the neighborhood, and nearly as many more on Fifth-day evening, who were disposed of in the same manner. Although the station is over five miles from the meeting-house, the weather being fine, which, with the smooth, graveled road, and the pleasure of meeting Friends from other parts, made the drive an enjoyable one. The school which occupies the upper floor of the building, was adjourned on Fourth-day to begin again on Second-day, after Yearly Meeting closes. The long porch in front of the Meeting-house and other improvements, giving the place a friendly appearance, greatly increases the comfort and satisfaction of being at Yearly Meeting; and it is fitting to say that these improvements were largely made by an appropriation from the Charleston estate at Philadelphia, and the benevolence of one of our own members, who, a few years ago, filled one room of the meeting-house with neat and comfortable seats at his own expense. All of which are fully appreciated by those concerned. The porch furnishes ample room, where a large meeting, protected from rain and sun, may enjoy the pleasant intercourse and handshakes that no other religious body does to the same degree.

Our observation was that at no other time have we seen an equal interest taken by both old and young in promoting the general welfare of Friends, and the meeting. One Friend, whose mission seemed to be to take his carriage and convey Friends to and from different parts of the neighborhood, as occasion required, remarked, "It does me good to haul them around." Thus the meeting was held and concluded, with nothing arising to mar the unity with which we met. Which unity was also extended to our dear Friends, Joshua P. Smith, of Iowa, and Henry T. Outland, of North Carolina. The latter of whom went to the western part of the State on Sixth-day, after Yearly Meeting, and attended Spring River Meeting again on First-day, the eleventh instant; then started on his return trip. The Yearly Meeting closed on Fourth-day, and at seven o'clock on Fifth-day morning, near a dozen vehicles drove up to the depot, loaded with Friends on their way home. Having a few minutes, some of us visited one of those gigantic machines, called crushers, and saw it devour the rocks as though they were bread, which is the first process of reducing lead and zinc from its native state to the various uses to which it is put. As we viewed some of the lead specimens, we felt to regret that one of our native minerals is made the messenger of death to so many of our fellow-beings.

The locomotive whistle, as the signal of the train's approach, caused the bustle which is usual on such occasions, and the question was asked, "Is any one going to be left?" Instantly the desire came that when the Bridegroom of souls comes, none of us may be too late. As the train moved away, the same loneliness was felt which we have so often experienced before when parting with friends, either to their temporal or eternal home, and desires were raised for our preservation in the unchangeable Truth, that when we again meet we may enjoy the same blessings as in the Yearly Meeting just closed.

The Effect of the Gospel On Life and Character.

Col. Ingersoll sat musing one morning, when a young man entered his apartments and faced the great champion of infidelity with the question: "Which do you think would help a young man more, Christianity or infidelity?" Not receiving any reply, the visitor continued: "Perhaps if you knew a little of my past life and of the change that has come over me, you would be better able to tell me," and he hurriedly gave a retrospect of his past. It was the old story of a "Good-for-nothing boy," shirking school, defying all discipline, mischievous, daring and bold, trying a dozen different trades and positions and sticking to none, at once the pride and grief of a mother's heart. He continued to go from bad to worse, growing more wild and reckless, until the blessed truth of the Gospel laying hold of him, turned the whole current of his thoughts and desires.

Colonel Ingersoll said: "Oh, no doubt you were influenced by some religious excitement and carried away by it, such as a revival or something of the kind."

The young man replied: "No, it was not in any revival, but alone in my closet; I commenced to seek after God. Now, Colonel, how can you account for the change in my life?"

Finally, the infidel said: "Oh, you were like a young colt which had been kicking over the traces, until you thought you had enough of this nonsense and would be quiet."

Here was where Ingersoll's argument was lame. He was talking to the wrong man about colts, for this one had served his apprenticeship in that business, and knew that when it was natural for a colt to kick, he would kick when he was an old horse. That was just what he had asked Ingersoll to explain, what had taken the kick out of his life?

Ah, yes, the great question of the ages which skeptics and infidels cannot or will not answer, is: What has taken the kick out of so many lives, and transformed, not only people and homes, but whole districts, and even countries? The history of Christianity is the history of moral transformations, the marvel of which finds no adequate solution in any system of unbelief. . . . The gospel has wrought with unrivalled mastery, and is still achieving its glorious conquests. It brings new energies, new ideals and new hopes; develops the unexpected, even unsuspected capacities in individual life, and crystallizes character in society. It can do what nothing else can accomplish, it can make alive. It possesses the power of moral change, the secret of a quickened conscience; it can renew and transform the man, and can subsidize for its high purposes all the forces of modern time.—Christian Instructor.

A SINGLE POUND OF COAL.—A single pound of coal is capable of producing two hundred and thirty-six horse-power, and could do the work of an express locomotive for one-fifth a minute. In other words it is enough to haul a train of eight cars, including the Pullman sleeping cars and dining cars, at the rate of fifty miles an hour one-sixth of a mile.

In sawing wood a man may work at the rate of about sixty strokes a minute, and his saw blade may have progressed five feet a minute but a circular saw, driven by machinery, will cut seventy times as much wood in the same time. And yet this one little pound of coal contains power enough for one hundred and eighty such saws.

We can easily compare the power locked in this black diamond with the work of a strong man. The strength of a man may be reckoned at one-tenth of a horse-power. Allow him eight working hours, equal to four hundred and eighty minutes. During this time he occasionally stops for short rests, to change his position, to pick up another tool, to judge of the result of his work and plan for further procedure. This will take one-tenth of the time, leaving four hundred and thirty-two minutes, which, at one-tenth of a horse-power, gives him a total effect of forty-three and two-tenths horse-power as the result of his day's labor. This pound of coal contains more than sufficient power to do in one minute the day's work of five such strong men. Or it would take about nine thousand six hundred strong men, working steadily side by side, to do just as much work in one minute as nature has locked for us, ready at our call, in a single pound of coal.—American Boy.

A CONVINCING COMPARISON.—Look at the nations which are without the Bible—Turkey, Persia, China; look at those countries with so-called Christianity which is not a Bible religion—Spain, Italy, Russia, South America, Ireland, South America; and see what a difference it makes whether the life of a people is grounded in Scripture [doctrine].—Dr. W. B. Crowe.

Some Account of the Early Experience and Subsequent Travels of Ruth Newlin.

(Continued from page 150.)

Seventh Month 31, 1853.—Although several months have passed since I put a line in this little book, I hope I have not been entirely forgetful of my dear Maker who has thus far enabled me to hold up my head in hope. Yet there are many times when I am almost ready to say, Surely, I shall fall entirely into the hands of the enemy of my soul's peace. At such times there arises a little consolation from past experience. We may look back on them that will not do the work of the present. As like the manna gathered by the children of Israel, what was gathered yesterday will suffice for to-day. I have been much comforted at home of late by sickness in my family. I have many deep reflections about my condition. But, O, let me humbly wait.

First Month 1, 1854.—A new year has begun, and my desires are that I may begin with double my diligence in the Lamb's warfare.

Fourth Month 4, 1854.—Oh! Gracious Father, have mercy on me, who am but dust and ashes. I crave that thou wilt not suffer me to come out of this my allotted suffering and trial until thy own appointed time. Thou knowest what is best for me. Search and me and thoroughly purge away all the dross, tin and rebroate silver, that nothing may remain that is not consonant with thy holy will. Help me to guard my tender offspring committed to my charge, in the way that will be consistent with thy will. Lord, preserve me by thy fear.

Fourth Month 5, 1854.—What a load of distress still rests upon me. How I did shrink from my duty this day; but my covenant is with thee this evening to the God of my life, that thou wilt be pleased again to favor me with the light of his presence and strengthen me in my needful time, I will obey. That I may once more be at peace with Him, which is worth more to me than ten thousand worlds and all I could afford.

Fourth Month 8, 1854.—This day went to Mill Creek Meeting under an unusual weight, for what cause I knew not, until I had taken my seat, when I felt that something would be laid upon me. O! then the distress of mind came in, feeling that the time had come, and remembering my covenant. Yet I still pleaded that I was not fit to preach to others. Bless the name of the Most High, He let me see that there was nothing between my peace and peace, if I would obey. The work required such an awful thing for me to undertake, that I was ready to shrink. My whole heart was shook. Then I said within my heart, If, if thou wilt go before, I will obey. Then my promise seemed to me to be, I will be both true and utterance. Thus, when all was done that could be, my exercise was so great that I knew not how I got to my feet, but so I did, to my great astonishment, relieved my heart of a loaded spirit in a very few words. Oh! the sweet peace I felt is indescribable. It dwelt within my heart, This is worth all my suffering, nothing but love and joy. I thought of his will to take me to himself I would have died. But found that I must be resigned to live or die.

A note found on a slip of paper, bearing date Fourth Month 8, 1855, may add to the interest of the above. To-day, thirty-one years ago, I first yielded to obey my Lord and Master in a required duty, to speak in a public meeting (at Mill Creek, just before it closed), which I had been shrinking from through fear of bringing dishonor to the cause for eight years and six months. But that day life and death were set before me in a very remarkable manner. I felt that if I did not yield that day, it would be the last call and my life would soon be cut off, and I numbered with the transgressors. It had been for several weeks that I cared but little about sleep, neither did I want food for the body. I felt that I could not live much longer. The peace and consolation I had after yielding, no pen can tell. I passed an almost sleepless night; my joy was so great. I had no wish to live any longer, but desired to be taken out of the reach of the tempter who had cheated me out of so many years of enjoyment.

A little more in connection with this is called to the mind of the writer, as related by herself, or as nearly as memory allows. After retiring on the night previous to her first appearance in public, feeling that she could not live much longer without relief, the words of the Saviour were brought forcibly to her mind, "But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom." She was not sure that it was Scripture until she arose and found it, but could not see that it had any application to her present condition. But after the experience of the following day, could realize its fullness of meaning. The exact words of the message delivered on that day, which remained to be a memorable one to her throughout the whole of her long and useful life, can not be called to mind. But their substance was in regard to the uncertainty of time, and a warning to some present to prepare for death which might be near at hand. A woman near by began to weep, and told some after meeting that the message was for her. She lived but a few months afterward, but was favored with peace and reconciliation with her God. Obedience to the Divine call, not only freed her own soul from its fetters, but the message being sent by Him who willeth not the death of any, but that all might be saved with an everlasting salvation, was blessed to others also; which reminds us of her own explanation of individual influence when faithful to known duty in any line. She said it was like casting a pebble into the water's surface; one ring was made, then another, until it extended far out from where the pebble was cast.

Fourth Month 9.—A quiet calm seems to cover my mind this day with earnest desires to be preserved in the right way.

Fourth Month 10, 1854.—To-day I am almost overwhelmed with trouble; yet I can not see where I have offended.

Fifth Month 11.—This morning a secret query sounded in my mind. What has thou done with the Lord's money while time is so swiftly passing away. Went to meeting with humble desires to do or try to do better in the future. But, O! how busy is the enemy trying to do away with all my good resolutions. For when brought to a clear sight of my duty, I was like Jonah, ready to flee, or like Saul, when he spared

Agag and kept the best of the spoil unto himself.

Fifth Month 20, 1854.—Oh! the sorrow and trouble I have. Almost ready to give over striving any longer. My faith seems very weak indeed. I think myself comparable to a dry tree, fit for nothing but to be hewn down and cast into the fire.

24th.—How lonely I do feel; disconsolate every way: a cumberer of the ground: a poor miserable creature. Oh! can it be that there will be a way made for me where there appears to be no way. Oh! for more patience and resignation to my condition, which at the present seems very trying both inwardly and outwardly. Oh! that my head were waters and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night to the God of my salvation.

Fifth Month 21.—My desire is to be kept in a truly humble state of mind. I am afraid I have spent too much of my precious time of late in unnecessary conversation and too much concerned about this world's stuff. And not kept my eye single enough to the great fountain from whence all blessings flow. Lord, will thou be pleased to turn my steps in the right path; for I feel that I have no might of my own. I desire to be found walking humbly before thee.

Tenth Month 9th, 1854.—Oh! Gracious Father, be pleased to be near around about me this evening. Enable me to hold up my head in hope above the tempest that surrounds me. Enable me to bear my trials with Christian patience. Hide not thy face from me in the day of trouble.

First Month 4, 1855.—I feel a secret hope that I am not altogether forsaken by Israel's Shepherd. I feel humble and thankful for his many favors to me, a poor, unworthy creature. Ah! am I not the most unworthy of all? (Near two years elapsed before the next entry. The vicissitudes of her experience in that time are pretty well summed up in the following note):

Second Month 20, 1857.—This day I have been humbled as it were with my mouth in the dust. Feeling my unworthiness so great for the work that has for some years appeared before the view of my mind. At times I have been made willing to surrender and take up the cross and be obedient, and received the sweet reward of peace. At other times, I have shrunk from manifested duty and plunged my soul almost into despair; thus it has been with me while time is so swiftly slipping away. Would that I were as a lump of clay in the Great Potter's hands, submissive and passive to his will. Then would my peace flow as water down the rivers rolls.

Second Month 21, 1857.—This was our Quarterly Meeting day. There was a committee appointed to visit subordinate meetings, families and individuals, as Truth opens the way. Almost immediately after this concern was laid before the meeting, I felt that my name would be mentioned, which caused me to tremble, feeling myself entirely incapable and unfit for such a great work. While Friends were deeply engaged considering the concern, I took my seat in a secluded part of the meeting, thinking to evade their notice, but for all that I was not hid, neither did I escape the appointment. After meeting I felt that I could not bear even to be seen with the fathers and mothers to hear the time this arduous work should commence. Yet

I felt that I should have to submit to the wishes of my friends, and bear the cross.

Third Month 11, 1857.—To-day met with part of the committee at Spring Preparative feeling much more like one that needed visiting instead of one of the visitors.

(To be continued.)

SEEKING AND FINDING.

"Master, where dwellest Thou?" (John i: 38.)

THE QUEST.

O Master of my soul, where dwellest Thou?
For but one Sovereign doth love allow,
And if I find not Thee, quite lost am I,
Tell me Thy dwelling place: this is my cry.

No travel will I shrink, no danger dread,
If to Thy home, where'er it be, I may be led:
Not where the world displays its golden pride,
Only with Him, who is the King, would I abide.

THE FINDING.

Nay, not in far distant lands, but ever near,
Near as the heart that hopes or beats with fear;
My home is in the heaven, and yet I dwell
With every human heart that loveth well.

Not where proud perils are I place my throne,
But with the true of heart, and these alone;
So where the contrite soul breathes a true sigh,
And where kind deeds are done, even there dwell I.

And those who live by love need never ask,
They find my dwelling-place in every task;
Vainly they seek who all impatient roam;
If brave and good thy heart, there is My home.

BISHOP OF RIPON.

"Diverce Faire Indian Baskets Filled With Corne."

It is hard for us to realize what a few baskets of maize meant to the Pilgrims when they reached Cape Cod on that memorable November day in the year 1620. The good ship, Mayflower, carrying just a hundred souls, had sailed from Plymouth, England, the previous September. Before the company disembarked, the shore was explored by several small parties, looking for a favorable site for a town. The first of these expeditions was led by Captain Miles Standish, "good man and true," and consisted of sixteen picked men, all wearing corselets and armed with muskets and swords. Marching through thickets in single file, their armor was much injured by the boughs and bushes.

It is interesting to notice the things which they saw on that first expedition: five or six men (savages), with a dog, a deer, wood-gaile, remains of an old fort, springs of fresh water, small vines, sassafras, abandoned cornfields, Indian graves, walnut trees full of nuts, strawberry bushes and grapevines, an old hut, and in it a great kettle, which had been some ship's kettle, brought out of Europe, two canoes, a deer trap, partridges, flocks of geese and ducks. They saw some heaps of sand which had been newly paddled with hands, "which," says an old chronicle, "we digged up and in it we found a little old basket, full of fair Indian corn, and digged further and found a fine, great, new basket, full of very fair corn of this year, with six and thirty goodly ears of corn, some yellow, some red, and others mixed with blue which was a very goodly sight. The basket was round and narrowed at the top. It held about three or four bushels which was as much as two of us could lift up from the ground and was very handsomely and cunningly made. After much consultation we concluded to take the kettle and as much of the corn as we could carry away with us; and when our shallop came, if we could find any of the people, and come to parley with them, we could give them the kettle again and satisfy them for their corn." Governor Bradford says this is the first time they had ever seen Indian corn. They filled the kettle, put corn in their pockets, and buried the remainder. Later they went back and took all the corn, calling the place Cornhill. This time they found ten bushels. Governor Bradford devoutly remarks, "And here is to be noted a special providence of God, and a great mercie to this poore people, that hear they gott seed to plant them corne ye next year, or els they might have starved." It is pleasant to find that about six months later they discovered the owners of the corn and gave them "full content, and are in great league with them." These holes in the ground, "caches" they would be called in the West, held about a hog-head of corn apiece. The corn was husked and well dried, then placed in large baskets covered with mats. This hole in the ground was lined with the inner bark of trees, and in it were placed the baskets, which were then covered with earth. This method preserved the corn in good condition. "The Indians," says Belknap, "planted their maize when the leaves of the white oak were the size of the ears of a mouse."

After five weeks' delay the Pilgrims found "a place very good for situation," where there were little running brooks, the desirable corn-fields, and a rock for defense. "It was purely a coincidence," says Professor John Fiske, "that the spot which they chose had already received from John Smith the name of Plymouth the beautiful port in Devonshire from which the Mayflower had sailed."

The Pilgrims had a very trying winter on those desolate shores. But they were not daunted. They set to work at once, and by the end of the first summer they had seven houses, also four for the plantation and other buildings. Twenty-six acres had been cleared and a good harvest gathered in. It was at this time that a day of thanksgiving was appointed by Governor Bradford. But we must not overlook the part an Indian played in making possible this joyous harvest festival.

Squanto was one of the Indians carried away by the opprobrious Hunt to be sold into slavery, but he escaped to England, where he had learned to speak English. He became acquainted with the Pilgrims through Samoset, their first Indian friend. Squanto became friendly and taught them how to plant and make the most of their baskets of fair Indian corn.

They first strewed the ground with fish, putting two or three alewives into every corn-hill. The Pilgrims took great interest in securing the best kind of seeds. On their first visit to their ally and friend, Massasoit, they obtained a promise for seed, and we find Governor Bradford greatly solicitous in the matter of getting seed suitable for their soil, and traded for the purpose.

The Pilgrims seemed to think maize palatable, for in a letter from New England at this time we find this, "Our Indian corn, even the coarsest, maketh as pleasant meat as rice. But a day came when the Pilgrims' store was so low that they were in a state of semi-starvation. They lived on what they could get from the sea, which was very little, because of insufficient means of securing fish, small quantities of game, and groundnuts. New adventurers came and lived off their bounty and the Pilgrims themselves were so deep engaged in erecting fortifications that they somewhat neglected this staple food. They made a trip to Nauset, and after many difficulties got about eight or ten hogsheds of corn. On one occasion on going for corn in the shallop some beads and scissors were stolen. When the theft was discovered, Captain Standish demanded satisfaction of the sachem, then refusing all friendly advances. The next morning the chief returned with a company of men, in a stately manner, and proceeded to reconcile Standish in his own peculiar way. He thrust out his tongue until you could see its very root, and licked the captain's hand from the wrist to the ends of his fingers, at the same time getting down on his knees in a manner taught him by Squanto in imitation of the English fashion. His men followed suit. He returned the stolen goods to Standish, and assured him he had punished the thieves. This was so ludicrous that even the grim, hungry Pilgrims had to laugh. Governor Bradford secured some corn at different places, but famine still stared them in the face, when Captain Standish went in shallop to Barnstable Harbor, through wind, frost and snow. Coming to his foresight and determination a good supply was obtained.

On account of the intense cold, they were obliged to go ashore and lodge in the wigwags. The Indians professed their usual friendliness, but the doughty captain questioned their sincerity, or, as the old chronicle puts it, "he possessed the heart of the captain with jealousy," and so he put half his men on guard, while the other half slept. Some of their beads having been stolen, Captain Standish told the sachem that as they meant no injury they would receive none without punishment or due satisfaction. On which the coward sachem caused the offenders to be searched out and the beads returned, adding a goodly present of corn to pacify the angry captain.

During these two years of want the nature of the forefathers was admirably demonstrated. "They bore these wants with patience and allacritie of spirite." "During this time, when they had maize, they thought it as good as a feast, and wanted not only five days together, but sometime two or three months together, and neither had bread of any kind of corne."

In 1623, before planting, Governor Bradford and his advisers determined that the cooperative system should be abandoned and each man should set his own corn, in this way to himself for provision. Land was distributed according to the number of mouths to be fed. It proved a successful scheme. Even the wives and little ones went into the field to set corn, for it was their own field—their own.—Anna H. Wikel, in Christian Advocate.

Patience in low times is an excellent anchor, and hope bears up the soul.

The Mangled Bible.

A story is told of a certain minister who, instead of preaching the gospel, used to spend his time in the pulpit in what he called destructive criticism, examining the Bible, and showing how much of it he did not believe to be true or inspired of God.

One of his hearers followed him very attentively, and undertook to carry out his ideas practically. One Sunday the minister denied the inspiration of the Book of Revelation; so his hearer went home, took his Bible and cut it all out. Then he would deny the inspiration of another book, or passage, and the hearer would promptly cut that out of his Bible. He went on so for five years, until the Bible was nearly used up.

One day the man called on his minister, carrying his dilapidated Bible with him, and conversed with him on this wise:

"I have been listening to your preaching for five years, and have heard your criticisms on the Bible, and when you said anything that was not inspired I have cut it out; and here is what I have left," said he, producing the book, which was mangled, clipped and torn almost beyond recognition. The minister looked at him in amazement, and said:

"Let me take the book; let me look at it." The man drew back, and said: "No; thank the Lord I have the covers left; they will keep them."

The man did well to keep the covers of his Bible; better perhaps than he did to waste his time in listening to a man who evidently had no faith, and who doubtless knew very little about the book he criticised or its author. It will usually be found that such men get their objections to the Bible at second hand, from the volumes of open unbelievers, or from the writings of some beer-drinking, tobacco-smoking theologian, whose ideas are as poisonous as the smoke he exhales.

Some people have yet to learn that error and false teachings are no holier in the pulpit than in a bar-room, and that a meeting-house where untruth is proclaimed has no more sanctity than a barn. We should allow no superstitious reverence for times and places to lead us to forget that they that worship the letter must worship Him in spirit and in truth. A man had better be at home reading his Bible than at church hearing a man pick it to pieces. "Cease my son to hear the instruction that causeth to err from the words of knowledge" (Prov. xix: 27).—Armory.

How to Make Good Neighbors.

About twenty years ago a man, with his wife and three children, in a covered wagon, drove up in front of a farm house in Carroll county, Illinois, just as the sun was setting in the West. It was early springtime. Seeing the farmer in the yard, he asked the privilege of staying over night. He explained that his wife was in delicate health, having just recovered from a severe illness, and that they were going to southern Kansas to see if a change of climate would not do her good. As dark clouds were gathering in the south and east, he was afraid it would rain before morning, and further exposure might increase her sickness.

The farmer, being a Christian of a true type, hospitably received the strangers into his home. After the evening meal, the two men drew their chairs to the corner of the kitchen for a talk. The stranger opened the conversation by telling how sorry he was to leave the old neighborhood where he had lived so many years. The neighbors were all so good and kind. If any one was sick, the neighbors would go in and wait on them, and look after the domestic and farm duties with as much care and solicitude as if it were their own. And when he told of the kindness of his neighbors when his family went through a siege of scarlet fever, tears pushed themselves out of his eyes and trickled down his cheeks, and his voice was choked so that he could not proceed with his tale.

After a moment's silence he said, "I do not know where I shall settle, but I do hope it will be in a good neighborhood."

His host leaned over, and sympathetically placed his hand on the stranger's knee, and said, "My friend, do not be uneasy: no matter where you settle, you take your neighbors with you."

Several months passed after the above incident took place, when a knock was heard on the door of the same farmhouse, and when it was opened the host saw another covered wagon before the house, and a tall, comfortably dressed man asked for the privilege of staying over night. No one was sick in his family, but he was afraid to camp by the roadside, lest some one might molest his team or the contents of his wagon.

As before, the farmer took them in and entertained them. After supper they entered into conversation, and the mover told "how glad he was to get away from the neighborhood where he had lived. His fences had been broken down, his stock had been maimed, and they were constantly picking quarrels with his children. If any of his family were sick he had to hire help to take care of them, and he hoped when he settled again it would be in a better neighborhood." His host inquired where he had been living, and found that he came from the very same neighborhood that the first family were so sorry to leave. So the wise old host clasped his hands behind his head, and, tilting his chair back, said, "Go where you will, sir, you will find that kind of neighbors, for you take them with you."

There never was a truer saying. We make friends by being friendly, and we make neighbors by being neighborly.—C. E. Pomeroy, in Our Young Folks.

DOMESTIC SCIENCE.—Herbert Spencer, writing of the education of girls, gives the following sound advice: "Give them a good school education. Teach them to cook healthful food. Teach them to wash, to iron, to mend stockings, to sew on buttons, to make their own clothes, and a well-fitting skirt. Teach them to bake, to know that cooking saves medicine. Teach them that a dollar is worth a hundred cents; that only those are saving who spend less than they receive, and that whatsoever more is spent tends to impoverish. Teach them that they are better dressed in strong cotton garments, than in silk, if they are in debt."

This excellent counsel to the educators of girls, is happily bearing fruit. The greatest interest is being everywhere taken in household economic training. Courses of domestic science now form part of the system of every school for the advanced education of young women, and the very best results have been achieved. The judicious housekeeper is sure to have a happy home. Young people flee, by instinct, from unhappy surroundings. Not having had the benefit of a happy home training themselves, how can they be expected to found, in their turn, healthful, pleasant homes?

The school has great work to do in this direction. Girls, whatever their home conditions and surroundings, should, as soon as possible—and they are qualified to take up such instruction at a comparatively early age—be taught how homes are successfully managed and governed.

This instruction is of much more importance to the girls themselves and to the community at large than the acquisition of merely ornamental knowledge. It should be encouraged, it should be made as practical as possible.—Cincinnati Com. Gazette.

Notes From Others.

NEGRO AUTHORS.—There are many who have scarcely heard of a negro book, much less read one; still there is a bibliography made by the Library of Congress containing fourteen hundred titles of works written by negroes; two hundred of these books are exhibited on the shelves. The negroes have one hundred and fifty periodicals, mostly weekly papers, many of which were exhibited in the Paris Exposition.

THE POET LAUREATE.—There has been a Poet Laureate in England since the days of Edward IV. Lord Tennyson was poet Laureate from 1850 until his death in 1894. The word "Laureate" comes from the old custom of crowning with laurel leaves the graduates of rhetoric and verse at the English Universities. The Poet Laureate was the one chosen to be the court poet, his reward being one hundred pounds a year in money, and a hogshead of Canary wine.

INDIA PAPER.—Of the Oxford India-paper, in which the more expensive Oxford Bibles are printed, not as much is known as should be. It is a specialty of the Oxford Press, manufactured at their own paper mills. No other paper has been made that can approach it for softness, toughness and agreeable tone. A strip of this paper only three inches in breadth has been tested, and found able to support a quarter of a hundredweight without yielding, and it is almost as thin as tissue. The secret of its manufacture is known to only three living persons.—Christian Advocate.

POLITICS WITHOUT CHRIST.—The politics of our country are all in a jumble because we do not try to adjust them according to Jesus Christ. Let "this Man" Jesus be displaced in any system, party, platform or creed, and all else will be confusion. Freemasonry displaces and ignores Christ and his atonement, and becomes a dangerous system of religion. Romanism largely substitutes the Pope in the place of Christ, and has become "the great apostacy." Our fathers of the old Secession Church of Scotland, made a dangerous mistake in teaching that Christ's law and authority were limited to his spiritual kingdom, which was not of this world (see Fisher's and Brown's Catechism.) The result of such teaching was, to lead many to believe that politics was a sphere of escape from obligation to Christ's moral law.—Christian Instructor.

INTELLECT NOT A SAVIOR.—According to the report of the Chicago papers, the police of that city some weeks ago broke up a nest of tramps and outlaws in an abandoned building. From an examination which followed it was ascertained that a large proportion of them were college graduates. The saloon, the "college life" in its darker shades, but above all, the lack of proper religious training is responsible for the blasted, wasted life of many whose intellectual training would fit them for positions of trust and power. Mere intellectual college training without proper moral training will endanger rather than aid a young man's prospects in life, and may blast instead of bless his own life and the lives of others. And the moral and religious training should come first, in order that the intellectual may be built on the right foundation.—Herald of Truth.

SACERDOTALISM.—With my whole heart I believe with Dr. Arnold, that the separating of the clergy from the people, as a separate caste, endowed with some mysterious and mystical functions, was the first and most fatal apostasy—a thing which more than anything else has paralyzed the power of Christianity in the world. Presbyterianism is and ought to be a positive protest, by asserting that the only priesthood on earth is the priesthood of every true believer, a priesthood in which the humblest layman shares equally with the highest clergyman.

The truth it has to witness to is that every true believer, who is united by faith to the one heavenly High Priest is [besides Him], the only priest on earth, that ministers are not priests of the congregation, but merely office bearers and instructors in it, and they derive their functions from God in no other sense than the humblest layman derives his functions.—Principal Shairp.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The policy of the U. S. in moderating the demands of the Powers on China is supported by Japan, Russia and France; and opposed by Great Britain, Germany and a few of the smaller nations. The Administration is not disposed to join with the other Governments in making demands upon the Chinese imperial authorities which the Chinese Government cannot comply with. Senator Morgan, one of the members of the Committee of the Senate on Foreign Relations, says: "I venture the assertion, based upon investigations I have made, that all the claims for damages from American missionaries, merchants and everyone else who can legitimately ask for recompense will not exceed $2,000,000. Germany cannot ask over $100,000,000, England should receive $30,000,000, and all other nations about $50,000,000. From my point of view $200,000,000 ought to cover all that China ought to be asked to pay, and China can raise that amount in some specified time."

The Commissioner of the Interior for Porto Rico, William H. Elliott, in his annual report to the Secretary of the Interior says much expert manipulation as well as ingenuity will be needed to untangle the mass of cross titles, duplication and lapping of grants and concessions and unauthorized occupation of public lands that have grown with the centuries of rule in the interest of the favored few. The archives of the island were found in a disordered condition.

Arrangements are now being completed for the construction of steel ships on the Lakes on a large scale for ocean service. The plan is to build ships of a greater length than the present locks in the canal will carry, in sections, join them temporarily in the ship yard, run them down the Great Lakes and to Montreal, and then put them together. Orders for several are understood to be in the hands of American shipbuilding companies. It is the expectation of lake builders that they can compete, not only with the rest of the United States, but with foreign builders.

A law forbidding steamboats to carry petroleum oils and gasoline in tank wagons from Philadelphia to Camden has been applied to steam ferries in New York, Detroit, Boston and all other ferry lines and passenger steamships subject to inspection by the United States steamboat inspection service. The decision is to be applied to gasoline automobiles, and forbids their being permitted to have transportation on such ferries or passenger steamers. Without a strict enforcement of the law, the safety of millions of people might be endangered, for it is estimated that the ferryboats at New York city alone carry 200,000,000 passengers annually.

Hundreds of Indians on the Mesa Grande reservation, California, are reported to be on the verge of starvation because of the failure of their supplies of berries and acorns, due to drought.

The Isthmian Canal Commission it is reported is in favor of a canal across Nicaragua as against all other routes proposed. It favors the construction of a canal thirty feet in depth at a cost of about $120,000,000. The total distance from the Pacific to the Atlantic is 190 miles, passing through Lake Nicaragua and following the San Juan River. It is found that it will take less than ten years to build the canal, and some of the engineers estimate that during its construction at least 50,000 men will be given employment in the United States and on the Isthmus.

The past season's Klondike output of gold is estimated at $20,000,000, as against $17,000,000 for 1899.

The census returns show that of the total increase of 12,485,950 in the forty-five States of the Union, excluding the Territories, almost precisely two-thirds, or 8,121,689, is in the old free States, and only 4,364,271 in the late slave States, including the border States of Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, Kentucky and Missouri.

The use of Niagara Falls as a generator of electrical power on a large scale, followed by successful experiments all over the United States as well as in Europe, has led to the investment of enormous sums of money elsewhere for water-power schemes.

A system of American beacon lamps fitted with pressed glass lenses will, it is reported, soon be established along the Atlantic coast and Great Lakes in addition to the signal service now in operation in many ports. The new method of signaling from the lofty steel towers will far surpass all that has heretofore been done. As each beacon will be visible about twelve miles in any direction, the lights from 108 of them, which is the proposed number, would give a continuous series of warnings visible for nearly 2500 miles along the sea coast.

A wind storm on the 20th ult. caused great damage in Tennessee. More than fifty persons were killed and a hundred more injured, while the damage to houses, timber and other property will reach large figures. The storm entered the State from Northern Mississippi, and swept across in a northeasterly direction, extending also to Ohio, New York and Pennsylvania, causing much destruction in various neighborhoods.

It is said that plans have been consummated for the erection of ten plants for the manufacture of cottonseed hulls into paper of different grades. It is the intention to have the factories scattered throughout the cotton belt from Texas to North Carolina.

A dispatch from Albany, N. Y., of the 22d ult. says: "Heavy cars, each holding sixty passengers, traveled easily thirty-five miles in fifty-five minutes over the 'third rail' electric railroad between Hudson and Albany at the formal opening to-day. Power is obtained from the Stuyvesant Falls for running the trains, and will also be used for lighting towns and villages along the line and for furnishing power. The road runs through a hilly country, but the cars mount the grades without apparent trouble. The electricians present at the opening said that electricity would supplant steam on the railroads in the near future, and that the success of the new 'third rail' road would go far toward hastening the change."

A landslide half a mile long and twenty feet deep has occurred near Clarksburg, W. Va., in the coal mining region. The slide came from the hillside overlooking the entrance to the mines. Thousands of tons of rock and dirt, loosened, probably, by recent rains, slid down the steep hill, destroying the buildings around the shafts, and rolling into the valley, where the channel of a large stream was filled.

There were 426 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 13 less than the previous week and 40 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 228 were males and 198 females: 41 died of consumption; 68 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 17 of apoplexy; 13 of cancer; 13 of diphtheria, and 5 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 10½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.30 to $2.50; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.30 to $3.40; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.60; spring, straight, $3.50 to $3.85; city mills, straight, $3.40 to $3.60.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 72½ to 72½c.
No. 2 mixed corn, new, 44 to 44½c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 28½ to 29c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5½ to 5½c.; good, 4½ to 4½c.; medium, 4½ to 4½c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4½ to 4½c.; good, 3½ to 4c.; common, 1½ to 2c.; spring lambs, 3 to 5½c.

HOGS.—Best Western, 7 to 7½c.

FOREIGN.—The Ministers at Peking have, it is reported, agreed upon the terms of a preliminary treaty. It is believed that the main points are punishment for the guilty, indemnity to Governments and individuals, retention of strong legation guards and the occupation of certain places between Peking and Taku.

A despatch from Peking says Prince Tuan has been arrested and stripped of power by order of the Emperor and Empress Dowager.

Manchester, England, is suffering from one of the most extraordinary epidemics ever known. It is nothing more nor less than an epidemic of arsenical poisoning. Several breweries have for months been unwittingly distributing poisoned beer among multitudes. In Manchester at least 1,000 cases are known. The peculiarity of the epidemic is that it has been evident only among beer drinkers. Analysis has shown arsenic in the beer in poisonous quantity.

A difficulty is said to have arisen between Germany and Turkey. The Ottoman Government objects to Germany using Far San Island, in the Red Sea, as a coaling station, and wishes to establish there a Turkish depot accessible to all the Powers. Germany, however, insists that she will not abandon the island.

Paul Kruger, the President of the late Transvaal Republic, upon his landing at Marseilles, and in his progress through France has been received with great enthusiasm by the French people. In Paris the boulevards were filled with vast crowds, and a cordial welcome has been extended to him.

The Latin-American Congress at Madrid has voted in favor of compulsory arbitration. Chile was the first country to oppose the plan. The neighboring republics are alarmed at the warlike preparations of Chile, which has adopted the compulsory military system, under which every male citizen on reaching the age of 19 years must serve as a soldier. This has caused widespread concern in South America, and has led other countries to take steps toward similar military equipment. This action only favors compulsory arbitration in disputes between the American republics, but also provides that guarantees shall be given for the faithful performance of the conditions reached by the arbitration tribunal.

NOTICES.

FRIENDS' RELIGIOUS AND MORAL ALMANAC AND FRIENDS' CALENDAR FOR 1901 are for sale at Friends' Book Store, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia. Almanac without cover, four cents; with cover, five cents; postage extra. Calendars, five cents; if mailed, ten cents each.

MEETING AT MEDIA.—With the approval of Concord Quarterly Meeting, held at Media Eleventh Month 15, 1900, of a religious concern of Thomas H. Whitson, meeting for worship was appointed to be held in Friends' Meeting-house at Media, on First-day, the second of Twelfth Month, 1900, at 2 P. M., at which Friends' attenders, especially our younger members, are invited to be present.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage will run trains leaving Philadelphia 7.17 and 8.19 A. M., and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when requested. Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., twenty cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, Westtown Station or West Chester, Phone 85.

EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Sup.

DIED, Tenth Month 28th, 1900, at the residence of his son-in-law, Elhanan Healds, near Coal Creek, Iowa, J. H. HOGE, in the eighty-first year of his age; a beloved merchant and elder of Coal Creek Particular and Monthly Meeting Friends. His last illness was of several months' duration, during which time, when in a very weak state, his beloved wife, Lydia B. Hoge, was removed by death, as noticed in a former number of THE FRIEND. He was a kind partner, a good neighbor, and concerned, as expressed towards the close of his life, that all our testimonies might be retained, saying, "there is not one to spare." On one of his neighbors, an intimate friend, taking leave of him near his close, he said distinctly, "Farewell! Farewell! Farewell!"

—, at her residence, Atlantic City, N. J., on the eleventh of Sixth Month, 1900, PHEBE A. ELKINTON, in the eightieth year of her age; a minister and member of Haddonfield Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, at his residence in this city on the twenty-first of Fifth Month, 1900, OLIVER PARKER, an esteemed member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Northern District, in the seventy-seventh year of his age.

—, at her home in Trenton, N. J., Eighth Month 19, 1900, ELLEN D. MOORE, widow of Joshua R. Moor of Rancocas, in the seventy-third year of her age; a beloved and valued member of Trenton Meeting.

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 8, 1900.

No. 21.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,

PHILADELPHIA.

South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth,)

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Addressed as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

is a great favor to be possessed of the privilege of the doctrine of the everlasting gospel, as recorded in the Holy Scriptures; for which we are bound to be thankful; the faith which gives us the victory over the world, the flesh and the devil is produced by the operation of the spirit of Christ in the heart.

WILLIAM EVANS.

men deem they can do very well with religion as a science, with religion as a poetical imagination, or as a matter of taste; but that a religion which consists in the fear of God, which requires a man to deny himself, to take up his cross and follow Christ, to go to Him as his only Saviour, and to walk in lowliness and out of the spirit of the world, that is the religion that man by nature has no relish for.

The great difference between all the forms of false religion and the true one is, that the false leave the man unchanged, and build up and upon this unchanged nature; whilst the true alter changes man and builds him up, step by step, in all the graces of which man is capable, upon that new foundation, which is no more nor less than Jesus Christ.

SAMUEL TUKE.

When you hear a politician expatiating on the tendencies of a measure, he tells you greatly it will promote the interests of the colony, or how it will enrich a colony, or how it will propitiate a powerful party. . . . you hear, probably, not one word of inquiry whether it will corrupt the character of those who execute the measure, or whether it will introduce vices into the colony, or whether it will present new temptations to the virtue of the public. And yet these considerations are perhaps by far the most important in the view of enlightened expediency, for it is a desperate game to endeavor to benefit a people by means which may diminish their virtue. Even if a politician would probably assent to the proposed proposition, "the virtue of a people is the best security for their welfare."

JONATHAN DYMOND.

Counsel From Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.*

In reviewing the present condition of our Yearly Meeting as exhibited by the replies to the interrogatories addressed to its constituent branches, the assembled body was brought under deep concern by the report of several small congregations failing to assemble for Divine Worship at stated periods and the indifference of a few of the members to the duty of attending any religious meetings.

Pervent exhortations were expressed, and supplications offered to our Father in Heaven, that we might deepen in spiritual life, and a full dedication of heart to his service. The truth was impressed that it is sin, even though it be in refined form, that clouds our spiritual perceptions and that sanctification is imperatively necessary to fit us for the service of the Most High. Where this preparation of heart is experienced, a zest and fervor will be imparted to social worship, that will render meeting with each other for that object, times of refreshment from the presence of the Lord, He himself handing forth to his waiting people that bread which nourishes the soul.

Those who are concerned faithfully to uphold their small meetings, were encouraged to believe that as they reverently gather in the name of our Holy Head and High Priest, He will own their assemblies, however small, by the fulfilment of his gracious promise to be in the midst, for their strengthening and refreshment.

All the membership abiding in Christ, the true vine, would keep the channel of gospel ministry open, and at the same time tend to check a dependence on others, during the hour of devotion.

The pastors and teachers that Christ qualifies for his work do not receive their ministry from man, nor by the pre-arrangements of men, but by a revelation from himself. And such are glad to impart freely and without price to others that which they freely have received.

We were warned by the departures in some parts of those professing to be Friends from the original doctrines and practices of the Society, in establishing a system of paid pastors in their meetings, to beware of allowing any deviation from our high standard relative to ministry and worship, but to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free from the yoke of bondage to a human priesthood.

Our religious Society has been called to a high and important position among professing Christians as a witness to and for the truth as it is in Jesus. It is He who is to be set forth by us as the only head of his Church. As the way, and the truth and the life and that without Him no man cometh unto the Father. By his life-giving power, known in the heart that yields itself to Him, his further declaration concerning himself is verified in all the fullness of its blessing. "I am the light of the world. He that followeth Me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." As we humbly and faithfully live up to the manifestations of truth and duty made known to us, Friends as a body of Christian believers, will be enabled to fulfil the high mission which has been assigned them, and prove increasingly helpful to honest seekers after truths of the gospel.

*Session of 1900.

A lively concern was felt that as a people, we shall let our moderation appear in all things so that in a day wherein the desire to amass wealth, and to indulge in sumptuous living is so prevalent, we may be restricted within those safe limitations which the teachings of the gospel commend and emphatically enjoin. The providence of our Heavenly Father may be safely trusted to enable us to obtain a supply for our bodily needs, if we accept as a command the precept of our Saviour, "Seek first the Kingdom of Heaven and the righteousness thereof."

The various testimonies held by Friends respecting some of the practices and duties of life which are peculiar to us as a Christian body as set forth in our discipline were commended to our regard, as being fraught with important influences upon a growth in grace and purity of heart. Our dissent in dress, language and manners from prevalent customs had its origin in a sense of the majesty and holiness of God, and the dependence and finiteness of man calling for a denial of those indulgences in pride which would abuse the gifts of a beneficent Creator, and turn them to self-exaltation in the outward adornment of rich and fashionable apparel, and leading into a conformity to those principles of conduct which require truthfulness and sincerity, in the use of sound speech which cannot be condemned and in declining salutations that render to our fellow-creatures a homage that is due only to the Creator of all.

Many who have given their adhesion to these practices, have found great peace in their adoption, and safety from temptations to worldliness which lie in the path of all who must be associated with those whose lives are not bounded by the rule of Christ.

It was cheering to the Yearly Meeting to hear the expressions of loving regard by some of the younger members towards those in maturer life, and the encouragement by the former class to counsel with and confide in those whose long experience in the Christian path qualifies them to help others. A cordial response was expressed to this cementing feeling, and the hearts of both young and old, we believe, have been drawn by the outflow of the love of Christ to us all, into a renewed devotion to his blessed cause.

We would acknowledge that the Head of the Church has graciously condescended to be with us in transacting the important business which has claimed our consideration at the different sessions of this Yearly Meeting, strengthening his dependent ones to do his work. May the favors bestowed increase our love to him, and produce a more entire dedication to his service. And then we may confidently expect an increase of true love, one for another, and witness the bond of fellowship in the everlasting gospel to be strengthened.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE FRIENDS' TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION OF MEMBERS OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING, ELEVENTH MONTH 7th, 1900, IN EXECUTIVE SESSION.

To Whom it May Concern:

While the Association is not a political organization, and consequently does not presume to dictate to its members for what party they shall vote, it does stand for the encouragement of any person or organization whose aim is the destruction of the liquor business, and the discouragement of all that tends to the perpetuation of the same.

Accordingly we feel at this time, it is our duty to protest against the nullification by the present administration of a law of Congress, known as the Anti-Canteen Law, designed to suppress the sale of intoxicants in the army.

We would further protest against the repeal by this Congress of the Prohibitory Law of Alaska, and likewise the unparalleled extension of the liquor traffic during this administration in Cuba, Porto Rico and Philippine Islands.

These reprehensible acts have been hailed with gladness by brewers and distillers, and all others who desire the perpetuation of the liquor traffic. But we, together with temperance forces everywhere, note with sorrow, shame and fear, the growing domination of the saloon in city, state and national politics, and we desire to encourage Friends generally to give the matter conscientious consideration, before casting their votes for or giving support to persons, parties or organizations of any kind that favor the continuance of the saloon.

The Doukhobors Prospering.

F. Aylesworth, of Madoe, Ont., lately returned from the Canadian North West, gives the following "impartial account of this people:"

"The Doukhobors will be the making of those parts of the west in which they have settled. They are a thrifty, industrious people, and are taking advantage of every chance to better their condition. In the Thunder Hill reservation, in which I was working, there are thirteen villages, each of which has a population of about one hundred and fifty. Farming is the main occupation of the men, and the women give them valuable assistance. The Doukhobors are a farming people, and they look forward to the time when they will have thousands of acres of fertile land under cultivation. To this end they are steadily tending. They will stop at nothing which will help them to earn honest money for the purchase of implements, stock, etc., for the continuation of their agricultural enterprises. For this reason many Doukhobors will be found working on the railways which are being built through Assiniboia by Mackenzie & Mann. Contractors and sub-contractors are glad to get them, as they work hard and give no trouble. At first, before they understood the conditions of labor in this country, they were willing to work for small wages, but when their knowledge was increased they demanded and received the ordinary wages for railway laborers. While the men work on the railways the women and boys look after the farms. All are bent on making a competence as quickly as possible, and every means is employed which will add a few dollars to the family income.

"The living expenses are comparatively light, and the Doukhobor is enabled to lay away a tidy sum each year for investment in material for farming. In the spring he puts out a certain amount for seed, a little more for machinery and something for cattle. If he has not enough then to go ahead with his farming work he returns to the railway to earn some more money. Meanwhile the amounts invested are bringing in satisfactory returns on the farms. When the head of the family has made enough money to launch the farm scheme successfully, he will give up railway and other outside work and stick to the land.

"The Doukhobors are a peculiar people in some ways, but there is no doubting the fact that they are progressive and very much in earnest. The villages they have built are well laid out, and the houses are very comfortable. Everything is kept clean and tidy, and the individual households are extremely well managed. These people are respected by all with whom they come in contact on account of their straightforward business dealings. They are good customers for the merchants in that country, and the latter are always eager to sell to them. They are well satisfied with the Canadian west, and are perfectly content to remain there."

Pandita Ramabai.

[As many of our readers have for twelve years past contributed to Ramabai's noble work in India, it is thought that the following observations would be of interest to them, as well as to others.—ED.]

While the appalling disaster at Galveston was justly claiming the public attention, while hearts were overflowing with pity and sympathy, while hands and purses were as open as hearts, appeals for Ramabai's work and needs were held in abeyance. Now it seems right that this work, which is God's work, not Ramabai's alone, should be once more brought before her friends and the public. The following extracts from her latest letter will give some idea of the proportions to which the work has grown and of her present situation:—

"The rains have come at last. Thank God for the refreshing showers! But the poor people in Gujerat are unable to till the soil. Many of the farmers have died with their cattle. I am still gathering in the girls. There are over sixteen hundred in my charge now, so you can imagine how much work it means. But our dear Father is good. He gives us our daily bread and necessary strength. I have lacked for no good thing. The expenses of the Sharada Sadan have necessarily increased; but I have gone on economizing, and am still able to manage the expenses with the $6,000 a year, so I owe nobody anything."

The "Record" contains a tribute to Ramabai well worth quoting. One McConaughy of India writes:—

"How interested you would have been if you could have called with me to-day on Pandita Ramabai at her Widow's Home in Poona, where there are two hundred child widows! At her famine orphanage at Khedgaum, about thirty-five miles to the west, there are seven hundred and fifty orphans depending upon her. I found her on her cot with fever, which had not left her for four days, but praising God and trusting Him fully. Talk of heroes! I doubt whether the eleventh of Hebrews contains the record of any finer faith."

Ramabai's daughter, Manorama, was graduated last June at the A. M. Chesbrough Seminary, North Chili, N. Y. She was at the head of her class, received honors, and was awarded the prize by the Board of Regents, New York University. The principals of the seminary speak with unqualified praise of Manorama's ability, strength of character, good judgment, and devotion to her chosen work. Her self-poise and yet utter unconsciousness of self charmed all who met her. It was Manorama's earnest desire to enter college here, and the preliminary steps were taken; but when the child realized what she might be to her mother in her increasing anxieties and cares, she hesitated not a moment in making her choice. She has gone to her mother's sore need, to her sisters in distress, to a work that is almost appalling in its magnitude, with a spirit of consecration rarely beautiful in a girl not yet out of her teens.

What is this work? Nearly two thousand women and girls saved by Ramabai from ruin and death, to be fed, clothed, and sheltered; to be taught how to meet evil and conquer it (alas! they know too well what evil is); to be taught how to care for their own bodies and souls, that they may know how to care for others; to be placed on a self-respecting, self-supporting plane, and become object lessons to India in what Christianity, education, and honest work can do for its women, especially its "despised widow." For all this a large and an assured annual income is needed. Will not the American people, into whose hands God gave the beginning of this wonderful work twelve years ago, again respond promptly and generously to its increasing needs? Will not ministers, churches, societies, women's clubs, etc., include it in the work they are now planning for humanity? The formation of new circles, the strengthening of old circles, an increase of annual contributors and contributions, will accomplish much. Let not Ramabai's message to her friends be in vain. "He that giveth unto the poor shall not lack."

Funds should be sent to Eleanor R. Elkins, Haddonfield, N. J., who will forward them to the treasurer of the Association, E. Hayward Ferry, 222 Boylston Street, Boston.

"ENTER into child-life. Show a sympathy with its joys and its sorrows. This is the way to multiply influence and to guide and control mind and heart at a very early period in life. It is a means of cheer and comfort to the self as well as to boys and girls. It tends to keep the soul warm and fresh. It is a strong home-bond, drawing parents and children sweetly and tenderly together."

For "THE FRIEND."

What Paul Learned.

(Continued from page 135.)

But one other of the many lessons the Lord taught Paul was, "I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content" (Phil. iv: 11).

As generation after generation passes away we have the same lessons to learn, the same changeable teacher; we need all to walk in the footsteps of the flock, who followed the Great and Good Shepherd as He went before them, a perfect pattern for all who know His face and follow Him. And He who once taught His apostles around Galilee's sea, and dwelt in the quiet solitudes of Arabia, is the same who by His spirit now invites us to come to this school of Christ and to be taught of Him. He first gives us, as He did to Paul, the Holy Spirit that we may know the things of God, for the natural man knoweth only the dominion of the man, and not that of God, but the spirit searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God."

And as in natural things no one man can possibly learn what may be learned, much less can a finite man ever learn one ten-thousandth part of heavenly lore; so all life long we are learners; yet enough is daily known to do the will of the Divine, and doing, there the blessing rests. Those who thus prove faithful to the end will receive a "Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord," and if through mercy we are permitted to enter there, we then shall know of the fulness of His glory, even as we of Him are known. As Paul soon found, as all other true disciples do, a change in state, like to that of the seasons, each useful in its place. We know both how to be abased and how to abound; everywhere and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need" (Phil. 12).

The Lord Jesus himself for forty days endured this hunger, nor would He take when offered of that food which He knew was the Father's bread. "My meat and drink to do the will of Him that sent me." These are the Father's will are those, and those who are and ever have been the recipients of God's promised blessings. God blesses His children, born of God, are given spiritual blessings which no eye of man hath seen, nor ear ever heard, and which man can neither conceive nor could he contain. These are revealed alone by God's spirit, which searcheth the hidden mysteries of God. And the babes in Christ receive their daily bread, the milk of the Word, the nourishment which they grow in the inner man, and become young and strong men in the faith. But we found it to be a fight of faith, with the powers of evil, the rulers of the darkness of this world, in which conflict were it not God who is the arm of His children, they would have been overcome. Since then all are tempted, we are called; but they alone are chosen who are the government of their hearts and will of Christ, who of God is made the Captain of our salvation. He leads in the way, and all who are true soldiers of the cross follow thereunto. As Paul says, "They are the sons of God who are led by the Spirit of God" (Rom. viii: 14). This spirit empowers them to become like Christ Jesus, meek, lowly in heart, humble, gentle and forgiving.

The faith of these is often sorely tried; they are not like those who are at ease in a faith of their own conceiving. David said, "My foot slippeth; thy mercy, O Lord, held me up" (Ps. cxviii: 18). Paul and Timothy told the Corinthians of a similar experience in these words: "We would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia, that we were pressed out of (or beyond) our measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired of life. But we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead; who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver; in whom we trust that He will yet deliver us" (2 Cor. 1: 8-10). Noble words, a song of victory from a hard fought field of conflict in this fight of faith. Written that we should take courage, follow on and overcome as they did in the name of the Lord, to whom both they gave and we must always give the honor and praise of victory. As with the single undivided heart we follow in the line of duty, we too can set up our banner Jehovah-nissi.

There is no room for boasting or self congratulation here. When earthquakes rock the land and ocean breaks through its bounds, what is man with all his vaunted powers?—but a feather on the wave in a moment engulfed in oblivion. God's power which is over all alone can save, and this He can and does to those who put their trust in Him. Do we feel weak? Lo, He is strong. Are we void of wisdom or knowledge? He knoweth all. Satan would, if he could, overwhelm, but God permits him not. "He will not suffer you to be tempted above that which ye are able to bear," and this ability is all from Him, and meted out in proportion to the power permitted to the enemy in the temptation. A sufficiency of grace for the trials of each day and hour. Temptation overcome strengthens faith. One prophet says: "The just shall live by his faith" (Habakkuk ii: 4). Another says: "Lord, by these things men live, and in all these things is the life of my spirit; so wilt thou recover me and make me to live" (Isaiah xxxviii: 16).

To us in these last days the dispensation of God's everlasting covenant in Christ, it hath been permitted to read understandingly how that Christ Jesus our Lord, the Holy One of Israel, without sin, was tempted in all points like as we are, and by that almighty power He overcame, and is now (by that power) able and willing to succor all who are tempted. "I the Lord, there is no God else beside me; a just God and a Saviour; there is none beside me. Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is none else" (Isaiah xlv: 21-22). Oh then ye tried, weak and tempted ones, draw near and put your trust in God. "Hide me, O my God, under the shadow of thy wings until these calamities be overpast." And as in patience we possess our souls, holding fast the shield of faith, the tempter will be foiled, and soon will flee and disappear like the dark threatening storm before the clear shining of the sun, after the rain.

When the gold is in the crucible is not the refiner near? is not his eye upon the pot? So in temptation's hour the Lord is very near his tried ones, though in the fire's smoke they behold his face but dimly. Shall I then draw back, and conclude I have sought the Lord in vain? or that He hath forgotten to be gracious, and heareth not my cry? The good remembrancer reminds me, "the hand withdrawn from heaven's plough is unfit to work for Him." Is not the fulness of glory often found behind the blackest cloud, yet visible alone to the dwellers on the earth in its silver lining? And this gives birth to the hope of better things, and, like Daniel, strengthened by the touch of one like to the Son of Man (x: 18) we rise on the wings of faith in Him and soar above the realms of peace and joy. And if we go from grace to grace, from glory to glory, the stepping-stones are often but these very trials. Why, then, should we shun them, as though it was in displeasure our Heavenly Father veils his face? Rather let patience have her perfect work, and though in weakness our knees may tremble, hold fast that hand that holdeth thine and He will bring thee safely through.

This deep sense of need is God's chosen place for prayer, and as with single eye we look to Him, from whom alone our help does come, He inclines our heart to bow the knee, and having by His spirit made known to us our need, He teaches and strengthens us to pour out our souls in prayer. If doubts we had they disappear, our trust in Him renewed, our faith made strong, and covenant; confirmed, He teaches us that by these things the Lord does lead his children, and by these fresh incomes of His spirit we do live. Nor is the least one of all forgotten of Him, whose ministering angels are many times ten thousand times ten thousand.

W. W. B.

MAKE FRIENDS AT HOME.—Many boys and girls are very anxious to make friends among strangers, while no pains are taken to make friends of those at home. Father, mother, brothers and sisters, all seem to be beyond the pale of friendship. They may be insulted, and with impunity; no courtesy or respect is paid them; they are expected to make up at a moment's notice, no apology of any kind being offered or thought of. Brothers and sisters have become lifelong enemies from small beginnings. Bitter quarrels have resulted from unpremeditated, but nevertheless cruel, injustice. Relatives imagine themselves privileged to criticise as no stranger would dare to do.

Now this is all wrong. Brothers and sisters should speak words of praise and encouragement. Leave others to do the disagreeable—it will be done, never fear. Be as courteous at home as you are abroad. Respect your home and family as you wish to be respected. Don't save all your frowns for home. Love your brothers and sisters, remembering that love begets love. You will never regret the kindness you have shown, while your thoughtlessness and indifference to your own may reap a bitter harvest. Life would be smoother in a home if everybody would endeavor to understand his or her neighbor in the home, and if everybody were taken at the best, and not at the worst, valuation.—Union and Times.

FEEBLENESS is the main characteristic of those who flatter themselves they are good.

Some Account of the Early Experience and Subsequent Travels of Ruth Newlin.

(Continued from page 156.)

Third Month 12.—Went to Mill Creek Preparative Meeting, where I seemed to be met in a narrow way. I was somewhat like Jonah, ready to flee to Tarshish from the presence of the Lord. But I plainly saw this would not do, for by so doing I would mar the good work the committee was designed to do. Deep were my exercises indeed. How hard it is for the natural will to become anything or nothing. I felt that I had put my hand to the plow and dare not look back. This evening we visited a poor widow and her children. I had to encourage the latter to comfort their poor mother by endeavoring to walk in the path of virtue. For which I received a reward of peace.

Third Month 13.—This morning we visited a family who had a great deal of affliction. I felt a deep concern for them, that amid it all they might not murmur, and reminded them of Job and his submission to the Divine will. Attended West Branch Meeting. Here I felt called upon to encourage some to close in with the offers of redeeming love and mercy, while it was extended to them. After meeting, we visited an afflicted young woman. Here, as was expressed by Calvin Wasson, a father in Israel, there was more to be felt than words could be found to express, of the overshadowing presence of Almighty God. Retired to bed in sweet peace of mind; and could say that obedience had kept pace with knowledge throughout the day. What a blessed favor.

Third Month 14.—This morning went to Mill Creek Monthly Meeting very low in spirit. I felt entirely unworthy, even to be seen by my friends at a meeting away from home, much less to be called one of the committee. Yet I strove to keep my eye single to the great Head of the Church; humbly craving his assistance to do his will in all things; and realized the promise to be sure: "As thy day is, so shall thy strength be."

While in a very humble state of mind, I felt it to be required of me to hold out the language of encouragement to some tried ones and a warning to others, who were in a state of ease as to the salvation of their immortal souls; yet, when I took my seat, it seemed very strange to me that I should have had so much to say when so little presented before I arose. I plainly saw that if the eye of the mind was kept entirely single to the true guide, his power was all-sufficient to enable me to do all He required of me; and the cause would not be marred thereby.

First-day, Third Month 15.—I went in company with two of the committee to Morristown, where we expected to meet some more of our number, in order to visit two families before meeting. They were detained on account of sickness, (as we afterward learned.) While waiting for them, a query arose in my mind, "What is there here for us to do?" And I was about to conclude that such a poor, little weak company could do nothing, when it came with greater force, that we must not go away without collecting the family together, for there was something for me to do. But such a responsibility seemed almost more than I was able to bear, yet the exercise of my mind was so great, that I feared to go away with it, so endeavored to be faithful.

It seemed to be with me to encourage the aged parents in a very persuasive manner; and I left them in great peace of mind. We then thought of leaving the other family unvisited, except to go in and stay till nearer meeting time. Yet it did seem to me there was something to be done here also, but I concluded if others did not see it, surely I was mistaken. But the Friend soon saw that she had shut the door and had to open it, as she afterward expressed it. So there was a way made for me to relieve my mind unexpectedly; and I went to meeting in an humble frame of mind, desiring that if I had been in the line of duty, I might have a peaceful meeting, which was granted beyond what was common for me to experience; for the unwearied enemy would often, after seasons of favor, suggest what the companions of my youth or some of my neighbors would say about me, and thus endeavor to destroy my peace. But to-day all was peace within and without, and near the close of the meeting, my mind was so clothed with the spirit of prayer, that I was willing to bow down before Him, who had done so much for me, and petitioned Him particularly for the little company set apart to visit his flock, that He would continue to guide us, and not suffer us to turn to the right hand or the left hand errors, and that we might be united as one band, and be enabled to sing his praises as with the heart of one man.

Third Month 16.—Second-day morning arose with a peaceful mind, hoping to be excused from public service this day. Met with the committee on education at West Union, where I felt it my duty to encourage parents to endeavor to extend a watchful care over their children at home, believing that if this is the case, it would be much easier for those engaged in the school to keep down all that had a tendency to draw the dear children into that which is wrong. Attended Monthly Meeting at the same place, which was a very trying one to me. There was much said, and toward the close my work was to be done, and nothing short of obedience would bring peace of mind; and after withholding as long as I dared, I gave up to speak very plainly on the subject of love to God and man.

Third Month 17.—Went to Bethel Preparative Meeting, where I had again to bear the cross, but not in such a trying way as yesterday.

Third Month 18.—Went to White Lick Monthly Meeting. This was my own Monthly Meeting, and a day wherein I was deeply tried whether I would be obedient at all times and on all occasions. It had been no small trial to me to take my seat with the committee away from home. But to-day it was more trying than ever. The old enemy was very busy for some time after I had taken my seat, endeavoring to persuade me that if I said anything to-day, people would say, "I reckon she thinks she has learned how to preach since she has been out with the committee." But He that is stronger than an army with banners, was pleased to arise for my deliverance in this time of need, and filled my heart with that love that casteth out all the fear of man. Dined with our much-valued friend, Enoch and Asenath Carter. At night visited a Friend who was low with consumption. Here I felt an unusual flow of love in my heart to the blessed Redeemer, and was humbly bowed before Him in behalf of the poor sufferer, that He would give her a heart of resignation. Retired to bed with a grateful heart.

Third Month 19.—Attended Fairfield Monthly Meeting. A day long to be remembered. passed through much mental exercise, bearing my part of the burden in silence till near the close. I felt drawn forth in vocal supplication on behalf of the burden-bearers. It was a great cross to be thus engaged, and I a mere child among them, and to be heard in an assembly of so many of my childhood companions. Yet strength was given beyond what I had asked and peace indescribable. May I more and more fear God and not man. This evening brings our service to a close for the present. We parted in much love and sympathy for each other. I returned home and found my dear little children well, and peace is my reward.

Fourth Month 1.—Met with my dear Friend again, at Plainfield Preparative Meeting, where I cast in my little mite for the encouragement of those under discouragement. Dined with our dear Friend, Eleazer Bales. Visited an aged widow and daughter, where it was with me to bring to view our Saviour breaking bread and giving to the disciples and they to the multitude.

Fourth Month 2.—This was Preparative Meeting at Sugar Grove, where much lab was bestowed; may we be profited by it.

Fourth Month 8, 1857.—This day will doubtless be long remembered by many, being the first Monthly Meeting held at Sugar Grove. May she long remember the day of her betrothal.

Fourth Month 9.—At West Union Preparative Meeting. A very trying meeting to me. Came away only partly relieved.

Fourth Month 10.—Highland Preparative Meeting. Here I was enabled fully to relieve my mind in a very plain way.

Fifth Month 5.—This was our Monthly Meeting day at Sugar Grove. The committee were present, and we had a refreshing time together.

Sixth Month 12.—I was to have joined the committee to-day to visit the Preparatives longing to Fairfield Monthly Meeting; but I was best satisfied to stay and attend the funeral of a neighbor, who was suddenly killed last evening by a runaway team. I think it was more than an hour after he passed my door, usual health, until he was a bloody corpse. A solemn warning to us all. How fresh it brings to my remembrance the exercise of my mind a few weeks ago at our week-day meeting. It did seem to me that time was short to some of us, and in much fear and trembling I expressed a few words on the uncertainty of time, and this life the only chance to prepare for eternity.

Nothing more can be found concerning this important period of her life for a considerable length of time. In the fall of 1857, Friend Newlin removed with her children to Gut county, Iowa. This was an arduous undertaking for a widow woman; and especially for one of delicate constitution as she was. Her small means were well nigh exhausted in procuring a home, and many and varied were the hardships and trials which they were inevitably surrounded with in that early period. Only children's help, except that given gratuitously from the hand of kind benevolents, with few of the necessary implements for fa-wood to be obtained at a distance of seven miles. A poor house, and nothing to break the old winter winds as they swept over the bleak airies, bringing with them deep snows, which increased greatly the difficulties above mentioned. There was quite a settlement of Friends collected at this new place; though many of them were in the younger walks of life, they were concerned for the support of the cause of Truth. She has been heard to remark that she never enjoyed any meeting more, although often attended with much difficulty, sometimes riding on horseback, plunging through the snow. That outward privations and trial are conducive to simplicity, sincerity and earnestness, has been the repeated history of Christianity from time to time.

The following note alludes to this time, when we were settled in our little, rough cabin, collected around the fire, gathered into a tent waiting on our heavenly Father, we were comforted with his presence in our midst, which sweetened many a bitter cup that was my lot to partake of in those days of hardship and responsibility. And as my dear children had a share of hardship, I believe they also had a share of heavenly comfort. My greatest desire is that we may all be finally gathered in heaven.

(To be continued.)

The Real Supplants the Typical.

Friends who are not such by accident, should be supposed to have convictions in agreement with the original and continual and present purposes of the Body, the branch of Christ's Church to which they belong. It is with us, however, as with other branches, that no inconsiderable number fail to get hold of our reason for being. This is especially so where a disposition for and habit of reading does not prevail. We used to say that our position on all points of Christian belief and practice was just "Primitive Christianity revived." We need, however, to justify this claim, for other denominations make it as well. We find the very root idea of Christianity to be God dealing with the individual; that while our fellows may be very helpful in bringing us to Christ, there they must leave us, and the matter of union with Him and of individual duty must be wrought out first and always between God and the soul.

We learn that while all are to be priests unto God, no one is to be priest unto men, and that we are to be in our work and service, or perform it for us or for us the least thing to make us acceptable to God. A wiser word was never spoken by George Fox, than when he said, "Let nothing come between thy soul and God but Christ." He has atoned for our sins, and shed God's pardoning love, and promised the Holy Ghost to abide with us and in us always; and having these we have all. There was nothing of a permanent or essential nature known in Primitive Christianity beside these which we have just mentioned. Every rite or ceremony implied and required a priest, a celebrant, one between; and until the "priest after the manner of Melchisedec"—Christ himself—entirely supplants the other order of priests (Heb. vi. 14-28), the New Covenant does not take the place of the Old. This remains true for every individual. Christ and his priesthood can never "increase" as intended, in any heart, until John and his priesthood—the ceremonial—decreases. "That which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away" (Heb. viii. 13).

John the Baptist was a priest of the house of Aaron, and administered a baptism by special commission from God. He gives the reason for and limitation of his baptism with water. "That He (Christ) should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water." Israel had been taught and held together for many centuries by symbolical rites and types representing the better things to come. It was meet that in the ushering in of Christ, the fulfiller of all types, there should be a baptism directly typifying, as we are distinctly told, his baptism with the Holy Ghost—to Israel only. Others outside of the Jewish fold (including, of course, our Gentile ancestors) had no part in that symbolic training, and to them John the Baptist with his typical administration of water was not sent. It had no more relation to us, or indeed to any one after the complete manifestation of Christ, than had circumcision, or the feasts and fasts and sacrifices of the Jews. If ever it was an ordinance at all it was, like the rest, useless after Christ had come; it was contrary to us, and to every other external thing fulfilled spiritually by Him it was taken out of the way, being nailed to his cross (Col. ii. 14.) At this late day, next in absurdity to the thought that a soul can be benefited by an administration of water to the body, symbolically, while the heart is any way estranged from God, is the thought that the work of Christ the heart can be bettered or sealed, by the use of a Jewish rite. God knows it if the heart is fully surrendered to Him. It is needful to show men our faith by works, sometimes, but not God.

We believe the understanding the Friends have always had, since their rise, of the real intrusiveness of any rite or ceremony upon the finished work of the great Fulfiller, is a grand gift from God; and helps greatly toward keeping open the way to receive "the whole counsel of God."—N. Carolina Friend.

RELIGION AND BOOKS.—Religion is often a prisoner within the lids of a book. The pages are little windows through which we look at God. Books are essential to record truth, but must be limited to their legitimate uses. The Bible with all its fulness leaves much unsaid. We are told that Jesus would have filled the world with books had all been recorded which He spake. It is well that things are as we find them. Until we sound the depths of the well we have, it is folly to wish for more. Enough manna and more has fallen with which to feed the multitude. Jesus always left something for men to do. There is a revelation between the lines for all who care to read it. This is the office of the Holy Ghost; to repeat, possibly what Jesus said and yet escaped record. Our silent talks with Him are the most effective means of grace growth. Words are but pictures of the truth. They are paintings of the sunlight, and little else.—Presbyterian Journal.

STATED times for prayer and religious exercise never satisfy any whose souls are alive to God through Jesus Christ our Lord.—Henry Venn.

Selected for "THE FRIEND."

THE SEARCH FOR HIDDEN TREASURE.

Call now to mind what high, capacious powers
Lie folded up in man; how far beyond
The praise of mortals, may the eternal growth
Of Nature to perfection half divine Expand the blooming soul! What pity then Should sloth's untimely fogs depress to Earth
Her tender blossom; choke the seeds of life,
And blast her spring! Far otherwise designed Almighty Wisdom: Nature's happy cares
The obedient heart far otherwise incline.
Witness the sprightly joy when aught unknown
Strikes the quick sense and wakes each active
power
To brisker measures: Witness the neglect
Of all familiar prospects, though beheld
With transport once; the fond, attentive gaze
Of young astonishment; the sober zeal
Of age, commenting on prodigious things.
For such the bounteous Providence of Heaven,
In every breast implanting this desire
Of objects new and strange, to urge us on
With unremitting labor to pursue
Those sacred stores that wait the ripening soul
In Truth's exhaustless bosom."

—Akenoide.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Union of the Free and United Presbyterian Kirks.

Edinburgh, Scotland, Tenth Month 31st.—The formal union of the Free and United Presbyterian Churches, decided upon yesterday at the joint meeting of the Free Church Assembly and the United Presbyterian Synod, was consummated this morning. The ministers afterwards met and held the first meeting of the United Free Church of Scotland.

"A small minority who opposed the Union met in a separate hall, and constituted themselves 'The Free Church Assembly.'"

Such was the tenor of the religious news from Scotland. It is difficult, without more data, and from the distance at which we stand, to form a judgment as regards the effect of this union. It might be that our friend, John Anderson, of Ardrossan, might more clearly inform the readers of "The Friend."

As far as my recollections go the Scotch Kirk, or Church, was, until the middle of this century, a State church; both ministers of the church and school teachers in each parish receiving large stipends from state funds. Many abuses had (as in such cases is invariably the case) crept in. The government appointing these to their several offices, it was out of the power of the people to put them out of office, whether they were worthy or unworthy. On these grounds, and partly dissenting from the more severe Calvinistic doctrines, the Free Church broke off from the established Kirk. They built their own places of worship and school-houses, and paid the salaries of both ministers and teachers, wholly by themselves; the old Kirk retaining all the government grants, places of worship and school-houses. The well-known Dr. Chalmers was one of the main leaders in this movement.

If this movement merely means a return to a state church, it could hardly be looked upon as other than as a retrograde movement, but may we hope for better things. The Scotch as a nation are a solid, deep-thinking people, and few have been more conversant with Bible literature. It is an unnatural union to put church and state together, like mixing iron and clay. Christ Jesus said, "My kingdom is not of this world," why then should Christ's kingdom seek affinity with that of the world, when Jehoshaphat was reproved by the prophet for doing so with Ahab.

John Dougall, of "The Northern Messenger" well quotes, "Let all who think union of the church a good thing, and that it is sublime and beautiful to have uniformity in religion, and to have politicians make laws for the government of churches, remember the slaughter and martyrdom which uniformity cost in Great Britain. Awful is the long story of the persecution of the Scottish Covenanters."

Sad to say, the English Episcopalians also speak of their martyrs in Scotland, when these same once persecuted covenanters on coming to wield the power of the state. And how heavily our early Friends suffered in New England is familiar to us all. But to many of us, who in America enjoy such liberty of conscience and freedom from state control, for which blessing we should ever feel deeply grateful and thankful to the kind disposer of our lot in life, and which we in no small measure owe to the faithfulness and patience under suffering for the Truth's sake of our predecessors in the truth; to many of us it may be new to know that our Friends in England have to this day from forty to fifty thousand dollars collected off them annually for the support of the state hierarchy of the Church of England. See Y. M. Epistle of London, 1850. And this sum at the earlier part of the century came some years to close on $100,000.

But after all, what are dollars weighed in the balance with life? Lighter than a feather. Nor do I ever remember of a single Friend ever belying his testimony against the unlawfulness of all tithes under Christ's dispensation, whose grace is free and full to all, and who commands all those whom He commissions to preach the gospel, "Freely ye have received, freely give." After all this continuous suffering, for over two hundred and fifty years on account of this testimony, let those who believe it right to hire themselves as preachers at least do this, relinquish the name of Friend, to which they clearly have no right. We deny no man the right and liberty to think what he will, so long as his acts do not infringe on the rights and privileges of others.—A Friend.

Grip on the Masses.

Some one has said that "the Church that puts herself continually into harmony with the changing conditions of society will get the mightiest grip upon the masses." The worth of the grip will depend altogether on the "conditions of society." If society is wholly secular and insists on religion without life, and the Church accommodates herself to such demands by lowering the standard of Christian living, the grip will not be strong enough to wrest the soul of the people from the hold of sin and Satan. What is needed now is not a Church that puts herself into harmony with the conditions of society, but a Church strong enough to lift society up to the plane of gospel piety.

Selected.

As man lacks benevolence, it is on the whole well he lacks power.

MY FATHER'S FIELD.

A maiden stood where the fields were ripe,
And gathered the golden wheat;
Gaily she sung as she bound her sheaves,
And laid them about her feet.

One marked her there as she passed her by,
Alone with her hard-earned spoil,
And spoke of rest, for the sun was high,
And the reaper spent with toil.

But the maiden smiled, as her glad voice said,
"Nay, lady, I may not yield,
The work is great, but the work is sweet,
I toil in my father's field."

Gleaners of Christ, in your lonely toil,
When weary, and fain to yield,
Take comfort here, though the work is great,
"Ye toil in your Father's Field."

And the Father's house lies over the hill,
Where the sun of life goes down;
There shall ye rest, and the Father's smile
Forever your work shall crown.

—E. G. Stuart.

RECEPTION OF BARCLAY'S APOLOGY IN PALESTINE. FROM LETTERS OF DANIEL OLIVER, OF BRUMANA, SYRIA.

I must tell you how deeply indebted we are to American Friends for the five hundred copies of Barclay's Apology which they gave us four years ago. Barclay's Apology is one of the best books in the English language, and its arguments and defence of spiritual religion are most clear and convincing. I owe much to Barclay, and it has always been my desire to see it widely circulated. We have given the Arabic version to many and now have the testimony of some who have read it. All speak of the benefit and light they have received from it. One young man who is a preacher with the American Presbyterian mission, asked me for a copy, having heard of the book from others. I gave him one. Some months later I met him again. He grasped my hand so warmly and thanked me for the book and said, "It is the best and most helpful religious book I ever read, apart from the Bible; and I have read many. I have been wonderfully helped by it."

The head teacher in the high school in Schweis (another part of the Lebanon) belonging to the Scotch mission, sent me a special request to send him a copy of Barclay's Apology as "he had heard from a relative of his who had read the book that it was so helpful."

I thought that the dear Friends who have so generously helped to pay for the production of Barclay into Arabic, would be pleased to know God is blessing the book.

Tenth Month 18th.—You will be interested to hear that I have sent by this mail a copy of Barclay's Apology to a Turkish official in the quarantine service in the Persian Gulf—also a Bible and a copy of the Life of Stephen Grellet, all in Arabic. An English Friend who was traveling, made the acquaintance of this Turk and found that he was tired of Islamism and wanted to be a Christian, but not a Catholic. The English Friend wrote to me and asked me to send the Turk a copy of Barclay. Think of dear Barclay being studied by a Moslem in the midst of a Turkish harem. May Barclay help him to find Him who is "the Way, the Truth and the Life."

An Unchanged Gospel.

I exhort you not to be caught by the current delusion that this "advanced age" requires new methods and a new style of preaching, and what is absurdly called an "up-to-date gospel." This age of ours, with all its mighty mechanical inventions and its increasing mammon worship, has not advanced one single inch beyond its indispensable need of the atoning blood of Jesus and the converting power of the Holy Spirit. All the telegraph and the telephones, and all the universities with their boasted achievements in scholarship have not yet outlawed Calvary and Pentecost. Human nature has not changed; human sinfulness and sorrows have not changed; the word of God has not changed; the Holy Spirit has not changed; the precious promises have not changed; and what fallen man needed to lift him Godward nineteen centuries ago he needs to-day. Stick to the old gospel. When God gives you another preach it, but not before. Don't waste your breath in defending your Bible; it is self-evidencing.

One very probable reason why conversion have so lamentably decreased of late in you own and in other evangelical denomination is that there is less direct, pungent, loving and faithful preaching to the unconverted. Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, and unless a man is convicted of sin and feels his guilt, he is not likely to come to Christ for salvation. Toward the close of his noble Christian career Gladstone remarked that one of the worst symptoms in this age was "the general decay of the sense of sinfulness." The preacher who belittles or conceals the guilt and retribution of sin is a enemy of souls; he will make but few converts, and those of shallow experience.—Theodore L. Cuyler's talk with Preachers.

THE FIRST PRINTED BOOK.—About four years ago a London blacksmith noticed on a second hand bookstall a very old book priced at ten cents. He bought it, and, after attempting to read it, threw it aside and soon forgot it. One of his lodgers happening to see the book recently, and noticing that it was dated 1455, asked permission to show it to the British Museum authorities. A day or two later the blacksmith was requested to call, and the secretary, to his surprise, asked him what he would take for the book. In some slight confusion the man said: "What will you give?" "Will two hundred and fifty dollars suit you?" was the answer of the secretary. The blacksmith was so dumbfounded that the secretary thought he was ridiculing his offer, and the price immediately increased it to five hundred dollars, which was at once accepted. Soon thereafter he had lost the book, however, which was the first book that Guttenberg ever printed, and, therefore, almost priceless, the Museum authorities would have paid almost any sum that had been asked.

"EVERY form of courage except that which depends upon conscious alliance with God may yield to fear at last. Whatever, then, thy situation, thy hopes, thy sorrows or thy fears, wait on the Lord: be of good courage, and He shall strengthen thine heart."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

I'm Going to Do It.

Some years ago the son of a widow left his native village, and journeyed to New York in search of employment. He was furnished with letters of introduction, and in due time found his way into the office of a merchant, and told him his business. The merchant was afraid there was no opening, but he asked for the letters, whereupon the boy opened his carpet-bag, and in searching for the letters, he had to take out several articles—one was his Bible.

"What book is that?"

"It's my Bible."

"What are you going to do with that in a great city?"

"I promised my mother I would read it every day, and I'm going to do it," and then burst out crying.

It is needless to say that a situation was found, and in years after he was taken into partnership, and was the head of the firm when he died.

The triumph of the lonely boy lay in his plans, and his determination, "I'm going to do it." His Bible was his best recommendation, his inspiration was the secret of his strength, the source of his promotion, his dearest companion. The living word was in his heart, as the printed words were in his bag. A mother's plans and counsel, combined with the spirit of the Lord, made his heart a branch of the living tree.

This fatherless boy in New York kept his promise to his mother, and said: "I'm going to do it." Young reader, we want thee to admire his decision to imitate his courage and to have fellowship in his surprise.

H. T. M.

A DAY AT A TIME.—It is a blessed secret, this life of living by the day. Any one can carry his burden, however heavy, till nightfall. Any one can do his work, however hard, for one day. Any one can live sweetly, patiently, lovingly and purely till the sun gets down. And this is all that life ever really means to us, just one little day. Do to-day's duty, fight to-day's temptations, and do not weaken and distract yourself looking forward to things you cannot see and could not understand if you saw them. God gives nights to shut down the curtain of darkness on our little days. We cannot see beyond. Short horizons make life easier, and give us one of the blessed secrets of brave, holy living.—Christian Work.

Items Concerning the Society.

The Friends' Meeting-house at Plymouth, Pa., erected in 1828, was recently sold at public sale for one thousand and five dollars. Of late years Friends of that vicinity have resorted to the new meeting-house at Norristown.

Persis Halleck, from Poplar Ridge, N. Y., having attended some meetings in and about Philadelphia, was at Burlington Quarterly Meeting, Eleventh Month 27th, which was looked upon as a favored occasion throughout. After some days of service in the neighborhood of Fallsington, she expects again to stop in Philadelphia on her way to North Carolina, where considerable service is apprehended to await her.

In consideration of the desire of several members whose employment by others does not release them to attend the regular mid-week meeting held in the forenoon, Western District Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia has appointed three meetings for worship to be held at five P. M. on successive Fourth-days. About sixty men and women attended last week. The remaining one for this month is appointed for the 12th inst.

A large gathering filled the seats of Media Meeting house last First-day afternoon, the 2nd instant, when the meeting for worship appointed by Concord Quarterly Meeting took place. It was a helpful and interesting occasion, in which for about two hours the minds of the assembly seemed held under a profitable and solemnizing covering of good. The second meeting of similar appointment is expected to be held in West Chester on the first First-day of next month.

In his lately issued Life of Oliver Cromwell, John Morley says: "It was in 1654 that the Quakers entered into history. It was indeed high time, for the worst of Puritanism was that in so many of its phases it dropped out the Sermon on the Mount, and left the best texts in the New Testament to Arianising heretics. Militant Puritanism was often only half Christian. Quakerism has undergone many developments, but in all of them it has been the most devout of all endeavors to turn Christianity into the religion of Christ."

Albert Cook Myers proposes to publish a book in which he will give a list of all the certificates of removal of Irish Friends to Pennsylvania that were recorded in the records of the Monthly Meetings between 1682 and 1750. He has found one hundred and sixty-three adult members from Ulster; from Leinster, about an equal number; from Munster, forty-two, and from places of which there is no record, about as many more, making a total of four hundred and ten adult persons. He estimated that if children were counted and those whose names were omitted from the records, that fully fifteen hundred Quakers would be found to have come over from Ireland to Pennsylvania during the period mentioned.—West Chester Local News.

The Chairman of the Committee of Six of the New England History Teachers' Association, Herbert D. Foster (Professor of History in Dartmouth College), thus writes to us of a book heretofore reviewed in our columns: "I am reading with rare pleasure the delightful book of President Sharpless—'A Quaker Experiment in Government.' It gives me what I have hitherto not been able to get, the actual Quaker practice in Pennsylvania and the share it had in the life of that province. I was particularly charmed with the delicious bit of child life in the letter of Sally Brindly, and wondered if your Association could do anything towards getting the book into the hands of the secondary schools in New England.

"The book is not only a distinct contribution to scholarship, but is the sort of book New England students in school and college should read to gain a clearer appreciation of the wholesome character of the ideals and institutions of a people who had some of the virtues of the Puritans without their faults."

Notes From Others.

TOO MANY DOCTORS.—The Philadelphia Medical Journal dwells at length on the crowded condition of the medical profession, a condition which is constantly growing more aggravated. The advent of osteopathy, christian science, absent healing and similar fads, says the article, has taken away a large part of the practice of the legitimate physician and made matters worse than ever before. The editor says: "No young man should be encouraged to take up the study of medicine unless he possesses qualifications of an exceptionally high order."

In a recent address before a Methodist Ministers' conference, James W. King said: "What is the attitude of politico ecclesiastical Romanism toward civic institutions? In its claims, its relations and its methods it assumes and acts upon the assumption of the right to universal spiritual and political dominion. No one can truthfully contest that this is the claim of Romanism through its highest authorities. Rome never changes; but her people do. She would be to-day as in the Middle Ages if opportunity only presented.

"The principal harassing problem in reference to our new Eastern possessions is the relation of politico ecclesiastical Romanism to institutions as we found them existing when the Philippines came into our possession. Already demands from the Papal representative in the Philippines and other certain high Roman Catholic ecclesiastics in this country, if conceded, would be absolutely destructive to the fundamental principles of American civil and religious liberty. The United States now has an opportunity to prove in the far East that it has no alliance with ecclesiastical powers, and that absolute separation of Church and State is not only a conceded American principle, but will be maintained wherever the flag floats."

THE PEW SYSTEM EXCLUDES FREE ATTENDANCE.—At the opening of a meeting-house at Thirty-fourth Street and Woodland Avenue, Philadelphia, one Dr. Brown spoke on "The Free and Open Church." After speaking of the temple and its worship and the church established free to men by Christ he said:

"The churches that have followed Christ's teaching must be as free as the religion of Christ, and as open to men as that established by God. Without any disrespect to those who give we see that this free church is a preferable one. What underlies this principle? It is that a free gospel should be preached in a free church. It is by this gospel Christ gives salvation to men. All the world knows that you cannot buy and sell love. As Christ gave himself freely for the church, so men should give their gifts for others and for the church. By selling the gospel at so much a quarter, or introducing any unecatholic system of finance you depart from that which was Divine sanction.

"Why should the church masses in this or any other church pay for their religion? The early church had no stipulated price for religion. Where the seats are paid for it puts up a barrier. How, then, is the church to be supported? Are we to banish money from the sanctuary? No, but it is to be given as a free will offering. The pew system helps to keep the masses out of church. The church is not a social club run for the few, but a place of worship for the people.

"Why do not sinners go to church? Just because the pew system keeps them out. Let us go to work and so redeem this part of our city by a free and open church, that we may save it from being a resort for saloons and gambling dens. You will thus be blessed by following in the footsteps of the Divine Master."

From time to time Friends through their Meeting for Sufferings have addressed those in authority concerning evils of the day. We are relieved to see that the Episcopal Bishop Potter of New York has been aroused to address the mayor of that city, and that the protest seems to be heeded.

"I approach you, sir, to protest with all my power against a condition of things in which vice is not only tolerated, but shielded and encouraged by those whose sworn duty it is to repress and discourage it, and in the name of unsullied youth and innocence, of young girls and their mothers, who, though living under conditions often of privation and the hard struggle for a livelihood, have in them every instinct of virtue and purity that are the ornaments of any so-called gentlewomen in the land. I know those of whom I speak; their homes and their lives, their toil and their aspirations. Their sensibility to insult or outrage is as keen as theirs who are in your household or mine; and before God, and in the face of the citizens of New York, I protest, as my people have charged me to do, against the habitual insult, the persistent menace, the unutterable defiling contacts to which day by day, because of the base complicity of the police of New York with the lowest forms of vice and crime, they are subjected. And in the name of these little ones, these weak and defenceless ones, Christian and Hebrew alike, of many races and tongues, but of homes in which God is feared and his law revered, and virtue and decency honored and exemplified, I call upon you, sir, to save these people, who are in a very real way committed to your charge from a living hell, defiling, deadly, damning, to which the criminal supineness of the constituted authorities, set for the defence of decency and good order, threatens to doom them. . . . The situation which confronts us in this metropolis of America is one of common and open notoriety, and of such a nature as may well make us a byword and hissing among the nations of the world. For nowhere else on earth, I verily believe, certainly not in any civilized or Christian community, does there exist such a situation as defiles and dishonors New York to-day. Vice exists in many cities, but there is at least some persistent expression of its external manifestations, and the agents of the law are not, as here, widely believed to be fattening upon the fruits of its most loathsome and unnamable forms."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS

UNITED STATES—The last session of the fifty-sixth Congress began on the 3rd inst. The President in his message reviews the history of the outbreak in China, and the policy of the U. S. Government in regard to it. He adds: "I regard as one of the essential factors of a durable adjustment the securing of adequate guarantees for liberty of faith, since insecurity of those natives who may embrace alien creeds is a scarcely less effectual assault upon the rights of foreign worship and teaching than would be the direct invasion thereof. The matter of indemnity for our wronged citizens is a question of grave concern. Measured in money alone, a sufficient reparation may prove to be beyond the ability of China to meet. All the powers concur in emphatic disclaimers of any purpose of aggrandizement through the dismemberment of the empire. I am disposed to think that due compensation may be made in part by increased guarantees of security for foreign rights and immunities, and, most important of all, by the opening of China to the equal commerce of all the world. These views have been and will be earnestly advocated by our representatives. The government of Russia has put forward a suggestion, that in the event of protracted divergence of views in regard to indemnities the matter may be relegated to the Court of Arbitration at The Hague. I favorably incline to this, believing that high tribunal could not fail to reach a solution no less conducive to the stability and enlarged prosperity of China itself than immediately beneficial to the Powers." In reference to relations with Turkey, he says: "Our claims upon the government of the Sultan for reparation for injuries suffered by American citizens in Armenia and elsewhere give promise of early and satisfactory settlement." He reports with reference to the Philippines that "Progress in the hoped for direction has been favorable."

Increased needs of the army by reason of the new possessions, the country's coast defences, and new army posts, is pointed out, and the necessity in the immediate future of from 15,000 to 60,000 men in the Philippines is stated. "It must be apparent," says the President, "that we will require an army of about 60,000, and that during present conditions in Cuba and the Philippines the President should have authority to increase the force to the present number of 100,000. Included in this number authority should be given to raise native troops in the Philippines up to 15,000."

At the close of business Eleventh Month 30th the debt of the United States, less cash in the Treasury, was $1,101,174,875, a decrease for the month of $3,227,115.

The steamship Empress of China, which sails from Vancouver for the Orient, will carry a cargo of beer for the Philippines. Fifty thousand barrels are consigned to Manila.

The largest stock of gold coin and bullion ever held in the United States is now accumulated in the Treasury and its branches. The total has been rising steadily during the whole of the present year, and is now $174,108,326, or about $75,000,000 greater than at the close of 1899.

The complications in the relations of the United States and European Powers respecting China have been increased by Minister Conger, who, it is reported, in the exigencies of the situation at Pekin, has joined with representatives of the Powers, in direct contradiction of the expressed desires of his Government. This action, it is expected, will be repudiated by the United States Government. It appears that, upon inquiry directed to the Powers, some of their Ministers at Pekin have not correctly reflected their present views as to the basis of the peace negotiations, and this is regarded as warranting the prediction that the agreement must be modified or abandoned.

Secretary Hay has received information showing that, in compliance with the instructions sent Minister Conger, he has recommended negotiations contemplating a modification of the demands adopted by the foreign Ministers.

The authorities will not permit American troops to take part in any attack on peaceful Chinese, and it is believed that the attitude adopted by this Government will have a salutary effect on Europe.

Under an intelligent system of irrigation it is estimated that 12,000,000 acres of land in New Mexico can be reclaimed and made into farming land which would have no superior in the world.

A vessel has recently been chartered to carry wheat from Puget Sound on the Pacific, to Europe, by way of the Orient and the Suez Canal. This shipment is said to be the first to go by this route.

The Department of Agriculture at Washington states that the Smyrna fig is now successfully grown on the Pacific coast as a result of the importation by the Division of Entomology of the insect that fertilizes the blossoms. Over six tons of this fruit were grown and packed the past season. A scientist has prepared a life history of this insect for publication.

The "abandoned" farms of Massachusetts are fast being taken up. Three years ago there were 330 thus classed in the State. A recent enumeration shows there are now but 136.

There were 446 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 20 more than the previous week and 36 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 222 were males and 224 females; 58 died of consumption; 54 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 17 of cancer; 14 of diphtheria; 13 of apoplexy, and 6 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.30 to $2.50; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.25 to $3.40; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.60; spring, straight, $3.50 to $3.85; city mills, straight, $3.40 to $3.60.

GRAIN—No. 2 red wheat, 71 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 71 $\frac{1}{4}$ c.

No. 2 mixed corn, new, 42 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 43c.

No. 2 white oats, clipped, 29 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 5 $\frac{1}{4}$ c.; good, 5 to 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.; medium, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ c.; good, 3 $\frac{3}{4}$  to 4c.; common, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 2c.; spring lambs, 3 to 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.

HOGS.—Best Western, 7 to 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.

FOREIGN.—Prince Ching and Li Hung Chang say that they are anxiously awaiting the demands of the Powers. They declare that China desires peace at any price commensurate with the dignity of an independent nation; but they point out that, so long as a large foreign army occupies the province of Chi-Li, the problem will be harder to solve.

The German losses in China from typhoid and climatic diseases generally continue large.

A cablegram from Tien-Tsin says: "Protests and requests have been forwarded to Field Marshal Count von Waldersee by the representatives of the Powers urging the prevention of the removal of astronomical instruments from the observatory at Pekin. Most of the principal instruments have been prepared for shipment and labeled for Berlin or for Paris. Dr. Morrison, wiring to the Times from Pekin says: "In pursuance of their regrettable policy of appropriation, the French and German Generals, with Count von Waldersee's approval, have removed from the wall of Pekin the superb astronomical instruments erected two centuries ago by the Jesuit Fathers. Half of them will go to Berlin and the rest to Paris. The explanation of this act of vandalism is that inasmuch as the return of the Court is so improbable, such beautiful instruments should not be exposed to the possibility of injury when Pekin is no longer the capital."

The Provisional Government of Tien-Tsin is issuing a strong proclamation against the concealment of arms in the city and its suburbs, the penalty of disobedience being death, after five days' notice of the prohibition. Many arms have been found concealed, and numerous Boxers are living in the city in disguise.

The Pacific Cable Committee has accepted in behalf of the Governments of Great Britain, New South Wales, Queensland and New Zealand the bid of the Telegraph

Construction and Maintenance Company to make and lay a cable from Vancouver to Queensland and New Zealand via Fanning, Fiji and Norfolk Islands, for £1,795,000 the work to be finished at the end of 1902.

The record for the highest chimney is said to belong to Belgium. The Silver Works Company has just completed the construction of a shaft which is 410 feet high. The interior diameter at the base is about twenty-five feet, and at the top eleven feet.

Twenty-two hundred Filipinos have surrendered lately to American forces on the island of Luzon.

Charcoal is the great Italian fuel, Naples alone consuming 40,000 tons of wood-charcoal, at a cost of £4 to £5 per ton, the national consumption being 700,000 tons.

The Turco-German difficulty regarding the coal station in the Red Sea has been settled, Germany intimating that she only wants a station during the Chinese crisis.

The State Department has negotiated treaties with Nicaragua, Costa Rica and Colombia, giving this country full authority to build an interoceanic canal through the territory. The treaties will be available no matter what route Congress may select.

The Chamber of Deputies and Senate of France have adopted a resolution of sympathy with Paul Kruger, the President of the late Transvaal Republic. The Emperor of Germany has declined to receive a visit from him.

The General Council of the Seine has unanimously adopted a resolution that the French Government should take the initiative in the endeavor to bring about an arbitration of the issues between Great Britain and the Boers.

Japan is protected from the sea by a system of dykes even more extensive than those of Holland.

French carrier pigeons liberated at sea from the Bretagne have arrived at Rennes, having flown 370 miles, and a bird liberated on the Lorraine has flown 413 miles.

A number of encounters between the Boers and British troops in South Africa have taken place. A British garrison of four hundred men at De Wetsdorp has surrendered to the Boers. These events, with a threatened uprising in Cape Colony, have caused much excitement in England.

The London Statist, a high financial authority, urges that the war in South Africa be brought to an end conciliating the Boers. It declares that British prestige and trade is being jeopardized by a prolongation of the contest.

General Roberts has asked for eight thousand picked men to be sent to South Africa. At the same time measures are being taken to assist in the restoration of order and prosperity. The Pretoria correspondent of the Daily Mail announces that "the British are distributing orange and seed potatoes among the surrendered Boer farms at nominal prices, without which the farms would go to ruin for another year."

The total arms bearing population of Europe is about 35,000,000 men.

The beer poisoning epidemic at Manchester has spread to London. The County Council announces it is taking active measures to protect the community. Analysts are busy on samples of glucose and saccharine used exclusively by brewers. Many of these have been found to contain arsenic.

NOTICES.

Public Meeting, Lansdowne, Pa.

A meeting for worship is appointed by authority of the Chester Monthly Meeting, Pa., to be held in the meeting-house at Lansdowne, Pa., Fifth-day evening, the 28th inst., at eight o'clock.

HADDONFIELD QUARTERLY MEETING is held at Mottstown, Twelfth Month 13th. Friends coming from Camden and Philadelphia will take train leaving Market Street, Philadelphia, at 8.35, arriving at East Moorestown at 9.30.

NOTICE.—A car of goods is about being made up by the Doukhobors. If donations are forwarded at once to S17 Millin Street, care of Jos. S. & Thomas Elkins, they can be included. Warm clothing is particularly needed.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage will leave trains leaving Philadelphia 7.16 and 8.18 A. M., and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when requested. Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., twenty cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, Westtown Station or West Chester, Phone 85.

EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Secy.

DIED, at Pennsdale, Pa., on the eighth of Tenth Month 1900, JOHN RAYMOND, son of Ira J. and Rachel F. Pa. aged nineteen years; a member of Muncy Monthly Meeting of Friends.

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 15, 1900.

No. 22.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,
No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,
PHILADELPHIA.

(South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth.)

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to
JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,
No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

What are good works?
The works that flow from God's good spirit, the works that are wrought in God, they are good works. The works of the new birth, the new creature, are good works; whereas all the works of the flesh are bad, though never so finely painted. All its thoughts, imaginations, willings, runnings, hunting to find out good and heavenly things, with all its sacrifices, are corrupt and evil, having of the bad nature of the bad nature in them. Make the tree good, or its fruit can never be good; so that they only are the good works that flow from the good tree, from the good root. And these are all the works of the flesh, though never so glorious and taking in man's eye, are shut out by God's measure, by God's line and plummet of righteousness and true judgment; and every work of God's spirit, the meanest work of faith, the least labor of true love, the least sowing of life in the heart, and the giving up of the creature, is owned by God, as coming from Him, and wrought in Him, who "worketh both to will and to do of his own good pleasure." He that is gathered to the light, which God hath enlightened him with, hath received the light, walketh in the light, walketh in the light, the spirit of the living God is near him; and dwelleth with him, and worketh in him; and he that is gathered to the Light, where it is manifest they are wrought in God. But he that is out of the inward light of God's holy spirit, his works are not wrought in God, and he can but make a fair show in the flesh, to the fleshly eye, but are not good in God's sight. The erring man's ways are often right in his own eyes; ah! but blessed is he whose way and works are good and right in the eye of the Lord, in the judgment of his searching, erring Light and Spirit.—Isaac Pennington.

Inculcation of a Call.

"We will not have the clergyman," says the British Friend, alluding to a connection of Friends with theological training, "but we cannot afford to be quite destitute of his knowledge. It would mark a new departure in our Society's service if any of our members took a training of this kind for their life's work."

A West Point military training is continually breeding in its students an expectation of carnal warfare as an employment, so that, when one has thus laboriously fitted himself for war, he is ill at ease till a war can be brought about in which he can exercise his training. And so it is,—erect a manufacturing plant, and it is a pity if we do not get it into motion to produce the goods. So the acquirement of a theological training by Friends will scarcely fail in any case to breed a temptation to practice it on a meeting. "I don't regard it as a qualification for the ministry," said a member who was taking such a course in a noted seminary, "but I desire the course of study." He was told that the desire to put it to use would naturally lead him to construe it as a qualification. Whether the true qualification was added or not, the delivery of sermons by him in our meetings followed, as surely as we expect it will by others similarly trained. The scholastic course so constructed as to have the ministry always in its eye would naturally issue its annual manufacture of knowledge-made ministers. So there would be projected upon the Society a ministry of enticing words of man's wisdom as learned, as able, as brilliant, as intellectual, as it is spurious. We are behind none in appreciating the advantages of natural talents and knowledge in a well-trained mind, subordinated to Divine grace, as subsidiary to holy help in the exercise of the prophetic gift. But all special coaching systems, whose conscious onlook must be to the ministry as a goal and outcome, tend to educe a product of their own, instead of the Divine inspiration. "Would that all the Lord's people were prophets,"—faithful stewards of the manifold grace of God each in his gift and calling from on high. But no school of the prophets can make them so but the direct revelation, equipment and authority of the school of Christ.

A Remarkable Leading.

A minister who had attended a Western Yearly Meeting, lately reported in our columns, felt drawn to attend a Monthly Meeting in Indiana, where he witnessed a variety of exercises, to which, as a Friend, he was unaccustomed. At length a silence ensued, of remarkable solemnity to his feelings. Therein he was unexpectedly prompted to speak these words, without any sight of the bearing they might have on the occasion: "Is the young man Absalom safe?" Having uttered them, he found himself drawn into an application of them to the paid leadership of the flock. As Absalom was traitor to his father's administration and counsels, seeking his father's life, and undermining his influence by stealing the hearts of the people with a kiss, that he might supersede his father in power; so the pastorate system was working its way among the people under our name, to supersede the principles of our fathers in the Truth, and stand traitorous to the legitimate constitution of the Society of Friends, gathered as it was out from every phase of human priesthood. The young man was not safe, that was seeking the office of pastor; and the church was not safe in renouncing the Quakerism of its fathers, to put on the paid ministry system of other churches.

The overcoming power attending this act of faithfulness brought several of the hearers under much tenderness of feeling and confession. But the full accounting for his being thus led was not manifest to the visiting minister till later in the day, when he was informed that, two weeks before, another in the station of minister visiting that meeting, arose with the same words, "Is the young man Absalom safe?" and added, "No, he is not safe, unless you pay him his dues as your pastor. He cannot live, and support his family, and have time for study, unless you pay him for his services."—or language of this import. "How thankful I felt," says the minister whose visit followed this, "that I knew nothing of this in advance, or that it was a pastorate meeting, or how they conducted it."

We feel that comment is unnecessary. He contributed this recital to our hearing in conversation, for the honor of Truth, as a testimony to the leading of the Spirit.

AN ANNOUNCEMENT DENIED.—From another source, information was forwarded to us that in the same Indiana meeting, the visiting pleader for the pastorate system publicly announced in his sermon, that the editor of THE FRIEND had acknowledged to him that he was employed in the capacity of pastor of a Philadelphia Friends' meeting, and that he received a certain (named) amount annually as his salary for that service.

It is due to truth, for its public clearing in that matter, that the editor should declare, and he hereby does so, that the salary which his visitor thus reported, was and is solely for school teaching in a day-school, a service which, together with his other duties, largely precludes him from what are called "pastoral" services to members.

And as for the word "pastor," the editor's contention with his visitor was, that whereas the apostle charges "that the members should have the same care one for another," yet our elders and overseers, through the nature of their appointment, feel especially responsible for the care and oversight of members; that a preacher of the word has not necessarily the pastoral gift, nor do pastors, or caretakers one of another, necessarily have the preaching gift. Offices which the Head of the Church so often keeps asunder in different members, let no man force together in one person. Yet under the editor's appointment as an overseer—one with twenty others, all equally unpaid—he may have acknowledged that he shared with them a "pastoral" duty; but not on the ground that he sometimes made public vocal offerings.

In short, all this misunderstanding has as its only basis a school-teacher naming his salary, and an overseer his appointment.

Isaac Penington on Isaac Penington.

In an appreciative monograph on Isaac Penington, from the hand of John W. Graham, our attention has been arrested by the statement that it was the "intellectual poverty of the Society that was a stumbling block" to Isaac Penington in his conviction. We have been accustomed to consider that it was Isaac Penington's intellectual arrogance, or, in his own phrase, "the treachery of the fleshly wise part," that hindered him in his early conviction in this connection, and we think it may be interesting to put two passages from his journal side by side. The first is that quoted by John W. Graham as evidence of the intellectual difficulties in the Quaker path.

"As I remember, at the very first they reached to the life of God in me, which life answered their voice, and caused a great love in me to spring to them; but still, in my reasonings with them, and disputes alone (in my mind), concerning them, I was very far off from owning them. . . . Yea, the more I conversed with them, the more I seemed in my understanding and reason to get over them, and to trample them under my feet as a poor, weak, silly, contemptible generation, who had some smatterings of truth in them, and some honest desires toward God, but very far off from the clear and full understanding of his way and will. And this was the effect of almost every discourse with them. They still reached my heart, and I felt them in the secret of my soul, which caused the love in me always to continue, yea, sometimes to increase towards them; but daily my understanding got more and more over them, and therein I daily more and more despised them."

The second extract seems to us to represent the judgment of the convinced soul upon the difficulties in the way of conviction, and the reader may decide whether this was the Society's "intellectual poverty" or the pride of unregenerate human nature.

"At first acquaintance with this rejected people, that which was eternal of God in me opened, and I did immediately in my spirit own them as children of my Father, truly begotten of his life by his own spirit. But the wise reasoning part presently rose up, contending against the uncouth way of appearance; and in that I did disown them, and continued a stranger to them, and a reasoner against them, for about twelve months; and by weighing and considering things in that part, was still further and further off from discerning their leadings by the life and Spirit of God into those things. But at length it pleased the Lord to draw out his sword against that part in me, turning the wisdom and strength thereof backward; and to open that eye in me again, wherewith He had given me to see the things of his kingdom in some measure from a child. And then I saw and felt them grown in that life and spirit which I, through the treachery of the fleshly-wise part, had been estranged to, and had adulterated from. And now what bitter days of mourning and lamentation (even for some years since) I have had over this, the Lord alone fully knows. Oh! I have known it to be a bitter thing to follow this wisdom, in understanding of Scriptures, in remembering of experiences, and in many more inward ways of workings, that many cannot bear to hear." J. H. B.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

CHRISTIAN FELLOWSHIP.—Sweet indeed is the privilege of Christian fellowship; comforting and helpful because of a oneness of spiritual experience, as well as a unity of faith. Travellers together to the city of God, having been baptized with the same baptism (the baptism which is into the death of Jesus Christ) and being in measure fellow-partakers in his sufferings, having known the refreshment of the same heavenly manna and having drank of the waters of the same eternal spring of life, speak not at random but with certainty concerning that one Spirit, of the ministrations of whose grace each has tasted; and their words are as the savor of life unto life.

S.

POLITICAL CORRUPTION.—Corruption in political life is really scepticism. It is a distrust, a disease which has lasted so long that it has grown into disbelief of political principles of the first fundamental truths of the sacredness of government and the necessity of righteousness. And where has such a disbelief come from? We all know well enough. It is from the narrow view that has looked at machineries and magnified them till they have hid from view the great purposes for which all machineries exist. If a man tells me that it is absolutely necessary that such a political party should be maintained whether its acts and its men are righteous or unrighteous, or else the government will fail, that man is an unbeliever. He has lost his faith in the first principles of government, and he has lost it by tying down his study and his soul to the secular causes, to the mere machinery of party.—Philips Brooks.

Oil for Laying Dust.

The method of treating road-beds of rail roads with heavy petroleum for laying the dust was first introduced about three years ago (the Pennsylvania Railroad, and has since been adopted by a number of other roads. It has been found that when a track ballasted with gravel or cinder is well sprinkled with oil the dust is practically got rid of, and the oil the same time destroys weeds, preserves ties and renders the track waterproof. On one of the New Jersey roads the use of 2,500 gallons of oil per mile of track has effectually laid the fine sand. The Boston and Albany Railroad, whose road-bed is excellent, used 4,000 gallons of oil per mile of double track the first year, and half that quantity when the treatment was repeated. The oil is of low combustibility grade, so that there is little or no danger of fire. On one of the New Jersey roads the beginning of this season, began some experiments on some very dusty suburban drives. The oil keeps the dust down and appears to protect the road to a certain extent from rain. Of course in time its efficiency is lessened and the road has to be sprinkled anew. The great drawback to the use of oil is that it gives off an offensive smell, so that when you are out for a drive in your carriage or spin your automobile you see everything through an oleaginous miasma which is perhaps nearly as bad as dust.

THAT LOW ANIMAL, MAN.—Instead of the highest, man is in some respects the lowest of the animal kingdom. Man is the most chaste, the most drunken, the most egotist, the most miserly, the most hypocritical and the most atrocious of living creatures. The animal, except man, kills for the mere sake of killing. For one being to take the life of another for purposes of selfish utility, is not enough, conscience knows. But the indiscriminate massacre of defenceless victims armed and organized packs just for pastime is beyond characterization. The human species is the only species of animals that plunges to such depths of atrocity. Even vipers and hyenas do not kill for recreation. No animal, except man, habitually seeks wealth purely out of an insane impulse to accumulate. No animal, except man, gloats over accumulations that are of no possible use to him, that are an injury and an abomination, and in the acquisition he has committed irreparable crimes upon others. There are no millionaires—no professional, legalized, lifelong kleptomaniacs—among the birds and quadrupeds. No animal, except man spends so large a part of his energies striving for superiority—not superiority in usefulness, but that superiority which consists in simply getting on the heads of one's fellows to crow. And no animal practices common, ordinary morality to the beings of the world in which he lives so little, compared with the amount he preaches it, as man.—Humane Review.

THE ends dreamed of by self are realized in unselfishness.

For "THE FRIEND."

There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God
eb. iv: 9).

Composed after the death of a Friend in regard to whom this t was quoted.)

What is this sweet "rest" that we read of,
Which remains for the people of God?
Is it given alone when earth's pathways
No more by our footsteps are trod?
When our bodies, grown earthworn and weary,
Are lying beneath the green sod,
And our souls safely garnered forever
"In the balm-breathing gardens of God?"

Ah, more! In his love and his mercy,
Our Father hath cast up a way
For those who are striving to serve Him,
And all his commands to obey,
And to walk in the newness of spirit,
And live in his fear day by day,
To have rest in this life from the doubtings
Which beset the lone wanderer's way,

Who knows not the Arms Everlasting
Beneath him at times to uphold,
And who sees not new mercies and blessings
With each added morning unfold,
And whose faith-eye sees naught of the glories
And the joys that eternity holds,
Or those safe at rest with the Saviour,
In the city whose streets are of gold.

Oh! how full and complete the fruition
Of this "rest for the people of God,"
In meekness and quiet submission
Ye bow 'neath the chastening rod,
When under affliction's deep shadows,
Or in suffering earth's pathways are trod!
And then the sweet rest everlasting
In the city celestial, with God!

SARAH D. SEARS.

NESVILLE, Ohio.

Account of the Early Experience and Sub- sequent Travels of Ruth Newlin.

(Continued from page 165.)

Eleventh Mo. 8th, 1857.—Our certificate to the Monthly Meeting to-day. I was brought into much tenderness and brokenness of spirit, feeling the separation from my relatives and dear friends whom I had left behind in a deep trial, and the great responsibility of my children resting wholly upon me, a poor and unworthy worm, knowing that I had taken a great step in bringing them to this newly settled place, and not knowing what effect it may have on their lives. But this I must leave to God who orders all things well. Our dear Father laid before the meeting in a weighty manner the subject of appointing a committee to visit the families of this Monthly Meeting as way opened for it. After serious consideration the appointment was made. My Father was among them, which was a trial to me. I felt such a stranger in a strange land and completely unable for such important work; yet
I could not feel easy to excuse myself, and I was not to be excused from much service. The committee after meeting proposed to commence at a little settlement of Friends on Moscow Creek."

There seems to be no account in writing of this labor. The writer has heard her say that enough of much good was done. One circumstance in particular is called to mind which is related of a visit they paid to a young woman who lived isolated. Soon after they were settled in silence, she seemed to hear the noise of dancing and revelry, and felt it laid upon her to address them on this subject.

After meeting the man in brokenness acknowledged that they had had a dance in their house, but did not intend to have another.

Ruth Newlin was acknowledged a minister
by Bear Creek Monthly Meeting First Month 18th, 1859. She was near thirty-three years of age.

"In First Month, 1860, I was liberated by the Monthly Meeting to visit in gospel love Winneshiek Monthly Meeting and the meetings and families belonging to it as way opens.

"Second Month 5th.—Set out on our journey poor and low in mind, yet peaceful.

"On the sixth at Fort Des Moines.

"8th—Arrived at Eli Jessup's, where we met with a kind reception. Attended a youths' meeting at Honey Creek, appointed by James Owen, at half-past six o'clock in the evening
—a time long to be remembered.

"3rd.—Quite cold. We concluded not best to travel. Went to see a poor sick woman.
A comfortable time it was. Can say it was good for me to be there. Lodged at David Hunt's all night.

"10th.—Made an early start for Winneshiek.
Quite sick this evening, yet very peaceful in my mind. Deep humility is the clothing of my soul. I greatly desire that a blessing may rest upon my dear companions in this journey."
There were no railroads in that early day that extended as far West as this. (She traveled in a carriage, often in very cold weather.)

"Second Month 11th, 1860.—I feel quite cheerful this morning. The prospect brightens before me. I cannot remember when the beauties of nature seemed so sweet to me.

"12th.—Arrived at ——— at half-past two o'clock, feeling very poor, yet greatly desiring to let obedience keep pace with knowledge. Heavenly Father, thou knowest the very bent and intent of my heart. May thy will and not mine be done. I feel like asking my friends to come together this evening. Oh, Lord, be pleased to go before in this most trying time.
I feel the very least of thy servants.

"13th.—I believe the Lord was pleased to own our little gathering last evening.

"14th.—At Joseph Gibbon's. I do feel so unworthy of so much attention from my friends.
It was much in the cross to have a sitting with these Friends, yet sweet peace was my reward.
I think we can say, the wing of ancient goodness was spread over us. I feel that my spiritual strength is renewed.

"15th.—We had a precious season with an aged mother and her daughter and family.
The Scripture reading this morning was very satisfactory.

"16th.—At a very solitary place, and very hard work. Oh, the lukewarmness there appears in some, very hard to reach. Attended ——— Meeting, in which I believe the Great Head of the church was pleased to drop a crumb from his bountiful table, for his dependent children.

"17th.—Had a very pleasant visit with two young Friends. I feel very low in spirit. The prospect of visiting the families of this meeting seems weighty. Gladly would nature shrink from it.

"18th, Seventh-day.—Though poor in spirit and weak in body I feel like going among some of the scattered ones. Oh, Lord, go before thy poor instrument, that nothing but thy word may be delivered.

"19th.—Suffered greatly through the night.
Prospects are discouraging this morning about my being able to attend meeting. (Evening) our dear Friends ——— and ——— arrived at meeting, which was very reviving. Strength was given to perform our several duties beyond expectation.

"20th, Second-day.—Sweet peace is my portion in looking toward leaving this neighborhood. It seems like parting with father and mother to part with these dear aged friends, David and Phebe Steer. Much to my strength and comfort, we had a precious opportunity with them this morning.

"22nd.—At ——— Friends are to be informed of our being at meeting to-morrow.
Oh! how little I do feel the very least of the flock, poor and unworthy.

"23rd.—Poverty seems to be my portion this morning; I fear I lack faith. I do long to be entirely submissive to the Great Master, to be anything He would have me.

"24th.—A very trying meeting to me yesterday, but little relief. Very unexpectedly
I was impressed with the belief that it would be right for me to request for an appointed meeting at night for the youth, which I did in much fear and trembling lest I should run before my heavenly Guide. And to make it more trying Friends seemed to discourage it on account of it being the same time as the closing of their school. Yet it was plain to me that this was the right time, and if they did not give their attendance I would be clear. So accordingly word was given and the attendance was larger than was expected, and I was able fully to relieve my mind. All praise belongs to thee, most Holy Father, who putteth forth and goeth before thy poor dependent children.

"25th.—A favored Monthly Meeting at Spring Water, in which I was able fully to relieve my mind, although not until the shutters were raised at my request. Oh, this sweet peace of mind!

"26th.—The goodness of the Lord is very great to his children who put their trust in Him.
I went to meeting in much weakness, but He who has promised to be our strength in weakness was present to own and to crown our little assembly. My mind is turned to the dear youth yesterday and to-day. Oh, may there be a willingness on their part to serve the Lord in the prime of life.

"27th.—At the house of our friend ———.
Quite sick last night. Low in spirit this morning. Lord, grant more faith and strength.
Went to meeting at three o'clock, which was well attended. I was favored to relieve my mind, though poor in the beginning." The rest of these memoranda seem to be lost.

"The following summer, with a minute from the same Monthly Meeting I visited the South River and Smyrna Monthly Meetings and the meetings belonging to them." (No account of this visit.)

"In Third Month, 1861, my friends liberated me for religious service in the State of Kansas.
I visited all the localities where Friends were to be found, except one where high water prevented. We traveled, in all, over nine hundred miles in a carriage. I left my dear children to do the best they could without me.

"Fourth Month 21, 1861.—This has been a day of close trial to me. It is hard to give the parting hand to so many near and dear

Friends. The dear youth are brought very near my best feelings. I believe the Lord has a precious seed in this place [Summit Grove]. Oh, saith my soul, may it be cherished.

"22nd.—Arose early this morning. The prospect of leaving my dear children and friends to-day so overcame me, that I felt like sinking down under it, yet after a most precious, tendering season in solemn silent waiting on the Lord, prayer was offered to the Father of all our sure mercies for his holy protection and guidance, I felt my strength renewed, and was favored to leave all in his care."

When she laid her request for a minute before the meeting, a Friend and his wife near neighbors did not speak of it, but let it pass in silence, which brought her into a tried condition of mind, feeling that she could not go without the full unity of her friends. While she was feeling much discouraged, the Friend came over and informed her that he could not feel easy without offering his services in her proposed visit, that they had full unity with her, that backwardness had been the cause of their silence, and they felt that their voices were of little import. This was a great relief to her tried mind, though with this his concern ended, and she was accompanied by other friends.

(To be continued.)

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Boys' Brigade at Church.

"The annual church parade of the Toronto Battalion of the Boys' Brigade in Canada, held last evening to Cooke's church, was one of the most successful in the history of the brigade. The battalion formed at 7.45, at the corner of Jarvis and Gerrard Streets, fourteen companies, five hundred and ninety-six strong, and marched to the church to the music of the bugle bands of the eleventh, fifteenth and seventeenth companies. The battalion was reviewed on Jarvis Street by Hon. George W. Ross, Dominion president of the brigade, and by Mrs. Ross.

"At the church, which was appropriately decorated for the occasion (Rev.) A. Macgillivray preached an instructive sermon from the text, 'Quit ye like men; be strong.' Several other clergymen also took part in the services." —Toronto Paper.

Note on the above. If we sow to the wind, can we fail to reap the whirlwind? If fathers and mothers have gone wild with a war spirit, need it surprise us to see the same influencing the children? Just think of it. Professed disciples of the Prince of Peace training up their children for war. The text taken from the words of the Philistine when in battle they wrenched the ark of God's covenant with Israel from its rightful keepers (1 Samuel iv: 9). May we not tremblingly fear that when the youthful disciples of the Prince of Peace, the meek and lowly, who came not to destroy but to save men's lives, are thus by their parents and guardians offered on the altar of Moloch, the god of war, that they will become Philistines and not of Israel, and Christians will find themselves like Israel of old, bereft of God's glory. Let us not, brethren, cease to pray, "Lord, open thou their eyes, that they may see their danger and the miseries it fore-shows."

W. W. B.

A Vision.

"Go and tell my church where they will find me."

A minister of the Society of Friends,* whilst on a religious visit to Russia, had the following experience. He says: "While in the Transcaucasus my mind had been much exercised about Princess — and her son, dear Christian people of the Greek Church. He was a fine young man of about twenty years of age, who, on the occasion of our taking a meal at his mother's house in Northern Russia, had pleaded in the loving earnestness of his heart for what I felt the Spirit of the Lord condemned. As my thoughts turned toward them, while lying awake on my bed one night, it seemed as if the Saviour appeared and beckoned to me, and I rose up and followed. We came shortly to a large gateway, over which was written in bold letters: "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve."

"We passed through into a beautiful garden, where were all manner of shrubs, trees, and flowers, 'pleasant to the sight and good for food.' The air was balmy, and there was a clear brightness that did not dazzle; the song of birds and hum of happy life caused a sweetness of harmony that cannot be described; nothing jarred or disturbed the perfection of the whole. We passed on, through paths of beauty that seemed endless, till we came to a more open part, where were erected large and magnificent buildings, judged by a sense I had once known, but which now looked nothing more than the buildings I made as a boy with my little wooden bricks. One of these was called the 'Greek Church,' another the 'Roman Catholic,' and another the 'Anglican,' while spreading in all directions were smaller buildings of a similar kind, but all professedly erected for the same object. From some of them music was issuing that some might consider the perfection of harmony and sound, but it fell dead and lifeless on the ear. We entered first the 'Greek Church.' Not a seat was vacant, and priests in gorgeous vestments were attending to the duties of their Order; numberless candles lit up a magnificent display of colors, pictures and arrangements most imposing. During a little lull in the service my Companion called, in a voice of power, pity and love, 'Come to me.' A very few appeared to hear Him, but among them I noticed my friend and her son turn a responsive look. Not one of the priests did I see take any notice, except that two or three, who kept their backs toward Him, were more diligent in their respective employments. With a look of deep tenderness He turned and went out, no one following Him. Oh! that a lost world could see that look. I have seen nothing to compare it to; no pen nor pencil could describe it. We entered each building in turn, and in each the same loving invitation from his lips went forth, 'Come to Me.' In some of the smaller and less pretentious buildings the proportion of those who turned a responsive look to his tender call was much larger than in the more showy ones, but none arose and followed. He looked sad and thoughtful, but beneath it all could be discerned a Kingly power.

"We walked on, leaving these churches behind us, but there was a change in all surrounding; the garden, though still retaining much of its beauty, had lost its former freshness, and a blight and sense of oppression rested over it and over all. Presently we came to a deep, wide and extensive ditch, in which were human bones—the collection of centuries and the outcome of persecutions by the professing church. Many of them were fresh and in some cases the flesh was still decaying on the skeleton. Now He spoke to me, as we gazed on the sad spectacle, and said; 'Son of man, seest thou what these people have done and are still doing, in my name, and for my honor?'

* Now reported as recovering in a Baltimore hospital.

"Close by was a building, differing from any we had seen before. Over the doorway was written: 'I was in prison and ye visited me.' As we passed through we heard the clank of irons, and entering a cell, a prisoner, whose face was radiant with joy, rose up to meet Him as he recognized his Lord. He took his hand and sat down by him, and for the first time seemed at rest. Motioning me to leave, He said: 'Go and tell my church where they will find Me.'"

The Fatal Door.

The Chevalier, Gerard De Kampis, was very rich and a very proud man. Soon after the completion of his magnificent castle, he wished to have a house-warming, and accordingly all his great neighbors were invited to a great feast. At the conclusion of a sumptuous repast, his guests made speech after speech, in which the host was lauded to the skies, and told that he was the most fortunate man alive. As the Chevalier loved flattery, we can imagine how proud and delighted he was.

One among the guests, however, said nothing for a time. When each man had made his speech, he uttered the following singular observation upon the happiness of the host: "Sir Knight, in order that your felicity should be complete, you require but one thing; that this is a very important item."

"And what thing is that?" demanded the knight, opening wide his eyes.

"One of your doors must be walled up," replied his guest.

At this strange rejoinder, several of the guests began to laugh, and Gerard himself looked as much as to say, "This man has gone mad." Wishing, however, to have the clue to this enigma, he continued: "But which door do you mean?"

"I mean that, through which you will someday be carried to your grave," replied the other.

The words struck both guests and host, and made the latter reflect most seriously. The proud man remembered the vanity of all earthly things, and from henceforth he no longer thought only of the perishable treasure he had once gloried in. He was completely altered, and made good use of his riches.—Selected.

GREAT thoughts belong only and truly to him whose mind can hold them. No matter who first put them in words, if they come to a soul and fill it, they belong to it, whether they floated on the voice of others, or on wind and silence and the night.—Dream Life.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Plea for the Farm.

The recent census shows no abatement in the depopulation of the rural communities and the growth of the cities at the expense of the country. It is evident that this tendency towards rural decline is injurious to agriculture and the country in general. What are the causes of the unpopularity of country life?

Young men are constantly leaving the farms to earn larger wages in the cities and enjoy a more progressive life which the society here affords. Yet we hear of very few persons who have been brought up in the city leaving the bustle of business and pleasure of society to live on a farm. And this is not strange. The most intelligent boys on the farm are given the best education, often a "higher education" at college, and while they are favored in natural endowment and opportunity, are content or compelled to stick to the farm, the smarter ones have new tastes and ambitions with their new learning, and very naturally turn to the more congenial atmosphere of the city for their life's work. And considering what many farms are, where there have been bitter struggles and hard toil, who can blame the boys for turning from what they have learned to abhor to the enjoyment of culture? It is a sad, hard fact that many of our farms do not make refined happy homes. But this is not the fault of the soil.

And who is to blame for the young men's lack of rural interest? If when little boys they had had a pet lamb or a rabbit or a bit of garden to care for and call their own; if at the district school they had been made interested in bugs, birds, and plants, and led to observe the methods and mysteries of Nature; if the high-school had instructed them in elementary agricultural physics and chemistry and horticulture, and the boarding-school or college offered a technical course in agriculture; and probably more potent than all, if the father was a man of such refinement and business success as to command his son's respect and admiration, the farmer boys with a higher education might follow in their father's footsteps and choose agriculture for a profession,—and they might not. No matter what his training, in every country youth is qualified to farm. In a congenial home environment and properly directed interests at home and in school would save many lads to the farm.

An ambitious boy naturally tries to follow the example of great men, whether in business, engineering, politics, letters, art, or science, whom his studies and observations have taught him to admire, and the young man who feels latent power in these lines hopes to make his mark. He has never realized that there are other roads to happiness than fame and fortune, and that a broad one is the profession of agriculture, with its great attractions to one who loves Nature and an independent life.

In dealing with this subject Prof. L. H. Bailey writes: "Let us take the proposition that the profits of farming are so small that educated tastes cannot be satisfied and gratified on the farm. Now I grant this to be true, the measure of the satisfaction of an educated taste is money; but I deny it most strenuously if the satisfaction of an educated taste is in a purer and better life." "I do not believe that people are to become wealthy on the farm as a few do in manufacturing." "Certainly I should not go on the farm with that idea in view. But if I wanted to live a happy life, if I wanted to have at my command independence and the comforts of living, I do not know where I could better find them than on the farm; for those very things which appeal to an educated taste are the things which the farmer does not have to buy,—they are the things which are his already."

H. H. A.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

WE'LL CALL HIM LORD JEHOVAH.

Scan the starry heavens
At midnight's silent hour;
What a scene of beauty,
What evidence of power!

To give it an existence,
To cause each star to shine
Required a God omnipotent,
Omniscient and divine.

To hang a world on nothing,
In space to swing a sun—
What shall we call the being
Who has such wonders done?

We'll call Him Lord Jehovah,
Our Saviour and our King,
And to his lowly altar
Our all, with reverence, bring.

E. Newlin Stout.

"I Am The Way."

Once upon a time I was travelling in Italy with some friends. None of us could speak the Italian language. We were not familiar with the customs of the people or of the railways. And so, in order to relieve us of all bother or the possibility of making troublesome mistakes, we had engaged a young man to act as courier, or business manager, for us. He could speak all the languages needed. He had often been to all the places we were going; he knew all about the railways and other ways of travel. We just left everything to him to attend to, so that we could be free to enjoy ourselves.

But there was one man who liked to attend to things himself. He spent a great deal of valuable time looking at time-tables, and gave himself and us needless worry. One day, in Naples, he grew very anxious about the train we were going to take. "When does it leave? Where is the station? How can we tell which train is ours? Which carriage shall we get into?" And many more questions he kept asking. Then our courier said: "Doctor, I am your train, follow me. Keep close to me. That is all you have to do." How easy that was! How simple! What a lot of trouble it saved!

Well, it was just so when the disciples were worrying about a lot of things; "Lord, we know not whither thou goest; and how can we know the way?" Then Jesus said, "I am the Way, the Truth and the Life." Why, how simple that makes everything! The youngest child can get along as well as the wisest man.—Kennedy.

THE world is wide. Are men of one faith under obligation to make that faith universal? Better make it winning. Better make it humble, tolerant, brotherly, and leave the issue of predominance to Providence.

Journal of John Woolman.*

"Get the writings of John Woolman by heart," wrote Charles Lamb, and his words will not readily be forgotten by Friends. The New Century edition recently published by Headley Brothers [London], is enriched with a valuable bibliography, and a letter by Esther Tuke, wife of William Tuke, of York, descriptive of Woolman's last illness, which has not apparently been published before, together with another letter from the same hand, previously printed in parts in the Irish Friend, which is a convenience to have included entire with the Journal.

Probably no Quaker writing has found wider acceptance outside the Society of Friends than Woolman's Journal. William Ellery Channing, Whittier tells us, pronounced it "the sweetest and purest biography in the language." Men like Gladstone and John Morley have read it and appreciated its purity. The life is a story that does not grow stale. The writings may be read and re-read. As Whittier says, "Beauty they certainly have, but it is not that which the rules of art recognize; a certain indefinable purity pervades them, making one sensible, as he reads, of a sweetness as of violets." As we close the book we rise with a sense of having breathed a purer atmosphere, of having been lifted nearer Heaven. Thomas Priestman, of York, in whose house Woolman died, wrote of him: "He was a very upright, heavenly-minded man. His dwelling seemed very near the Fountain."

John Woolman was an apostle of simplicity and humanity. The negro slaves were the great charge to which so much of his life was devoted; but wherever men suffered, Woolman suffered with them, whether it were the slave on the cotton or sugar plantation, the sailor on the high seas, or the paid laborer whose excessive toil and suffering were the outcome of the luxury of a few; as in that remarkable dream when he found himself a part of the mass of human misery. He had a conscience which would probably have been termed to-day morbid or hypersensitive, but his nearness to the Source of all good gave him a vision far beyond that of his fellows. Even his fellow-believers often found his ways hard to understand. He could not drink out of silver vessels, he could not touch sugar because it was the outcome of slave labor, he did not feel free to accept the hospitality of a slaveholding Friend without offering payment.

Esther Tuke wrote after his death: "Though he appeared to us in some things singular, and the path he trod straiter than the liberty some of us have thought the Truth gives, yet I may say that I cannot help thinking it was the way Truth led him; . . . and looking at the little comfort he had, it was the cause of humbling to my mind, and brought to an inquiry what returns I had made, and whether I walked answerable to what I enjoyed far beyond merit; and I sometimes thought his singular and abstemious way, so striking and conspicuous, may be a means to draw divers others to the like examination; and I know nothing in this luxurious and licentious age more likely to begin a reformation than a solid consideration of this sort; for do we not see how pride, superfluities in meats, drinks and apparel, abound amongst us, and, like a torrent, seem to carry all before them?"

* The Journal of John Woolman, with introduction by J. G. Whittier. Also addenda Bibliography, Index and Appendix. New Century Edition, 332pp., 8vo. (Headley Brothers; 3s 6d.)

Woolman's work for the slave has been largely accomplished, but his plea for the oppressed and suffering everywhere, and his controversy with luxury, are a message as much needed to-day as when first uttered. His "Word of Remembrance to the Rich" is not yet out of date.

This edition is adorned with several interesting illustrations, and is neatly bound. A shilling edition in paper covers omits the special features.

FOR "THE FRIEND."
PEACE.

Twin Spirit of the eternal God of Love,
Thou comest at his coming, and Thy reign
Co-equal with his own doth e'er remain;
Then all things, harmonizing sweetly, move,
On earth, as in the realms of light above,
To one united, soul-inspiring strain;
As in the long ago, ere man grew vain
And slew, in wrath, the white-winged Heavenly Dove—
Wilt Thou not come to sit upon Thy throne
And reign, alone, supreme o'er land and sea,
Till wars no more—their fiendish arts unknown,
Save in the saddest hours of memory—
No more shall mock, in wildest thunder-tone
The plaintive, pleading voice of misery?
E. Newlin Stout.

WHAT THE BOOK SAID.—"Once upon a time," a library book was imagined talking to a little boy who had just borrowed it. The words seemed worth recording, and here they are:

"Please don't handle me with dirty hands. I should feel ashamed when the next little boy borrowed me.

"Or leave me out in the rain. Books as well as children can catch cold.

"Or make marks on me with your pen or pencil. It would spoil my looks.

"Or lean on me with your elbow when you are reading me. It hurts.

"Or open me and lay me face down on the table. You wouldn't like to be treated so.

"Or put in between my leaves a pencil or anything thicker than a single thin sheet of paper. It would strain my back. "Whenever you are through reading me, if you're afraid of losing your place, don't turn the corner of one of my leaves, but have a neat little book-mark to put in where you stopped, and then close me and lay me down on my side, so that I can have a good, comfortable rest.

"Remember that I want to visit a great many other little boys after you are through with me. Besides, I may meet you again some day, and you would be sorry to see me looking old and torn and soiled. Help me to keep fresh and clean, and I will help you to be happy."—S. S. Visitor.

Over the triple doorway of the Cathedral of Milan there are three inscriptions spanning the splendid arches. On one is carved a beautiful wreath of roses, and underneath is the legend: "All that which pleases is but for a moment." Over the other is a sculptured cross, and there are the words: "All that which troubles us is but for a moment." But underneath the great entrance to the main aisle is the inscription: "That only is important which is eternal."

Failing and Successful Varieties of Patriotism.

FROM "ANGLO-SAXON SUPERIORITY," BY EDMOND DEMOLINS.

We may now pass a comparative judgment of four varieties of patriotism.

Patriotism founded on the religious feeling is now confined to the Great Desert, where the Mussulman brotherhoods keep it alive with difficulty; at any rate it no longer has any action abroad. Among the Western nations, religion tends more and more to the practice of tolerance, proselytes use no longer force, but persuasion; religion nowadays only sways consciences, and no longer requires armed authority to recruit its adherents. This variety is therefore in general decline.

Patriotism founded on commercial competition has also had its day. The causes which formerly gave rise to it in the Mediterranean Sea are no longer at work. The ancient Phoenician, Carthaginian, Grecian, and after them the Venetian and Genoese cities no longer exist, or barely exist; their irremediable ruin and decay show what this kind of patriotism is worth as a social force. Nowadays, competition has become "the soul of commerce," even whilst governments do their best to weaken or limit it with custom-house duties, nations are brought closer together, and upon the whole, trade more and more freely from one end of the world to the other.

This is another form of patriotism with which we need no longer reckon, and which may be consigned with the other to the records of ancient history. Unfortunately we cannot say the same of the third variety.

State patriotism, founded on political ambition, is not dead. But it is in a worse decline than is generally supposed. It presents this unmistakable symptom, offered by most things condemned to an early end—that it can only be kept alive by artificial processes and more and more violent stimulants. Moreover, it enforces on the populations exorbitant and ever-increasing charges. It is a probability that between France and Germany, for instance, the conquered nation will in the end be the one that succumbs first to the heavy taxation imposed by a peace that is more onerous than war. But when that time comes, the victorious one will not be in a much better condition than the other.

The real conquerors will be the societies which belong to our fourth variety.

This variety, possessing patriotism founded on the independence of private life, presents all the symptoms of things that grow and have a great future.

1. This patriotism works naturally, without any necessity for exterior and unceasing stimulants. It is the product of a social state which develops in man a spontaneous need of independence and engenders dislike of all useless State-imposed constraints. Such a form of patriotism is as easy as eating and drinking and sleeping.

2. This patriotism develops wealth. It does so negatively by economy, by the absence of all the ruinous charges imposed by militarism; it does so positively, by stimulating every energy in private life. Societies of this type are undoubtedly the wealthiest on earth—and are made so by their own work.

3. This form of patriotism raises the moral standard. I must insist on this point, because our chauvinisme has inculcated in false ideas on this score. "Chauvin" says and repeats that War is a great source—perhaps the greatest source—of moral elevation and that if there were an end of all war, there would be a lowering of the ethical standard of humanity. This assumption may be useful for keeping nations ready to spring at another's throats, but it is contrary to the most elementary facts.

The savages of Southern America and Africa are constantly at war for the possession of the hunting territories, they ought therefore to have attained long ago the highest degree of moral worth; as a matter of fact, theirs is the last degree. If we consult the history of civilized peoples, we find that periods of invasions and wars, those periods when warlike patriotism reaches its climax, are at the same time those when man seems at the lowest ebb of morality. Then the historian has to deal with an accumulation of murder, fratricide, strife, and crime of all descriptions, such as can hardly be classified under the head "high moral standard." Prurient ambition and the desire of conquest and domination are enough to account for the leaders trampling under foot every moral consideration; on the other hand, the excitement and intoxication of the melee incite the soldiers to those acts of cruelty, violence, and debauchery which are common sense of the French language call "les actes d'une soldatesque effrenée."

It may be objected that the actual military regime does not imply such acts—at least, not in the same degree. This is quite true; but in our present state, the loss of moral feeling, if different, is none the less very real.

Nowadays, fortunately, the state of war is exceptional; the normal state for the soldier is armed peace. We are already far removed from the warrior whose life was spent in the midst of the fray; the present soldier spends his life in barracks, learning how to handle arms which in all likelihood he will never use. He is almost like a peaceful bourgeois, who lives on his income in consols.

Now, we do not clearly see what life in barracks can add to the moral development of the individual although we can very clearly see what such a life does to hinder it.

Comparative idleness and a life destitute of all initiative and responsibility, spent in a state of utter promiscuity, are not highly moral conditions. The re-enlisted man, who represents the soldier at his highest power, never was considered as a model of moral excellence. One of the most visible signs of a man's moral worth is his capacity to triumph over himself, by making the necessary exertions to surmount the difficulties of life—in short, in obeying the grim law of work. Well, it is a well-known fact, that military service does much to destroy this capacity in young men. The average prisoner is good for nothing but office work and police work; he finds it hard to return to his calling, whether that of an agricultural laborer or of a workman. He finds the old work decidedly too much for him. His passage through barracks has therefore perceptibly diminished his moral worth.

The officer, on the other hand, is influenced by his surroundings in a somewhat unfortunate way. There are hard-working officers, and these partly escape the enervating effects of rack-life. In this, however, their situation in no way different from that of the common herd of civilians who are also compelled to work if they would live. But there are also the officers who do not work—I mean, who merely go through the strict round of their military duties. The latter gradually yield to the temptation of spending their considerable spare time in the cafes, in gambling, walking out, visiting or in various distractions. I should like to know how far these different occupations can contribute towards making an officer superior to the “pekin,” (as the French soldiers call the civilian)?

If we now examine the nations which have got rid of those two expressions of State patriotism—functionarism and militarism—we find that they thereby escape the causes of degeneracy inherent in these two institutions. The young people, not looking forward to the easy, ready-made berths of the administration of the army, have to go in for the commoner professions, which require stronger exertion and more original activity, whilst offering security and more responsibility. At any rate, the efforts they make in creating their own careers and providing for their families, impart to them an energy and moral worth which were never produced by an idle and easy

This form of patriotism contributes to a speedier expansion of the race throughout the world.

Whilst on both sides of the Rhine and of the Alps, we are trying, by all possible means to build up a weakening patriotism whilst we are passing reviews of our troops and celebrating military anniversaries, one adversary whom we do not see, or whom we despise because he is not, like us, armed to the teeth, is quietly furrowing the seas with his innumerable ships, and gradually filling the world with innumerable colonists.

The obsolete idea lingers with us—that the strength of a race is mostly derived from the size of its public powers. If this was the true idea, the Latin races would by this time be the masters of the world, whereas they are going wrong on all points to the Anglo-Saxon races, whose public powers are reduced and peace being.

If we understand this well, we should be in the best condition for taking on Germany that is the object of which we hear so much. We should seek our revenge, not in military predominance, which weakens the conqueror as much as the conquered one, but in social predominance—the only real predominance, because it is based on work and the independence of private life.

The state of war, or the armed peace which is its corollary, is not an unavoidable necessity, but simply a natural concomitant of the different types of societies which have prevailed hitherto, all of which were more or less founded on an exaggerated importance of the public powers. With those societies which have succeeded in shaking off such social conditions, there is but an occasional occurrence; each one keeps a nominal army, so as to be able to defend itself in case of attack on the part of any of those backward societies which are still keeping to the old military system.

Now, we wish to sum up the foregoing considerations in one brief formula, we might say—

That State patriotism, founded on political ambition, is but an artificial, spurious patriotism, which leads people to ruin.

Real patriotism, on the contrary, consists in energetically maintaining private independence against the development and encroachments of the State, because such is the only way of insuring social power and prosperity for the Fatherland.

The Use and Abuse of Health.

In matters of health, paradoxical as the statement is, the battle is not always to the strong. Indeed, it is by no means rare to see cases where the direct cause of premature breakdown and death was an inherited good constitution. It is with health as with wealth—that which an ancestor has labored long to accumulate may be dissipated in a short time by a spendthrift heir; while, on the other hand, men are apt to be careful of that for which they have personally struggled.

It is an undoubted physiological fact that people who have inherited good constitutions may, if they choose, and barring accidents, live long lives; yet how often we see such people wasting this great gift in needless imprudence, priding themselves on the immunity with which they overtax nerve force on foolish pleasures, claiming that they “never take cold,” and boasting of their recuperative powers, in the possession of which they continue to insult nature.

But sooner or later nature always resents insult, and the day of retribution inevitably comes to the man who used his principal of health to gamble with, instead of contenting himself with the legitimate use of his interest.

This, of course, does not alter the fact that one man may do things with impunity that would be suicidal in another. Our parable still holds good. His principal is larger, and consequently his income is larger; nevertheless, let him be satisfied with his comfortable six per cent., and not tempt fate with wildcat schemes.

Still clinging to our metaphor, we may say that, as there are many Dick Whittingtons, who come to town with a penny in their pocket, but with careful thrift end by being lord mayors, so it may be with many who are poor in physical health. Recognizing their limitations, and living wholesome sanitary lives, they may actually create a constitution enabling them to enjoy long years of health and happiness.

This end is not to be attained by a fussy over-occupation with questions of hygiene, but by a brave determination, daily carried out, to eat properly, sleep properly, breathe properly, and pay due heed to nature's admonitions.

In this fight we have the comfort of knowing that nature herself is with us, her tendency being ever away from disease and toward health.—The Youth's Companion.

PREACHERS.—Those words you now use in making a minister receive the Holy Ghost were used among the Jews in making a lawyer. A priest has no such thing as an indelible character. What difference do you find betwixt him and another man after ordination? Only he is made a priest as I said by designation, as a lawyer is called to the bar. All men that would get power over others make themselves as unlike them as they can; upon the same ground the priests made themselves unlike the laity. Methinks 'tis an ignorant thing for a churchman to call himself the minister of Christ, because St. Paul or the Apostles called themselves so.

If one of them had a voice from Heaven, as St. Paul had, I will grant that he is a minister of Christ; I will call him so, too. Must they take upon them as the Apostles did? Can they do as the Apostles did?—John Selden, A. D. 1630.

THE CURE OF LONELINESS.—Selfishness is one great cause of loneliness. If a man builds walls around himself, so that he may keep all that he has to himself, he soon finds that he has built walls around himself which shut out all that might come in to him from others. So the cure of loneliness may be the overcoming of selfishness. The medicines for this disease of loneliness are potions of generosity, of thoughtfulness for others, of self-sacrifice, taken in large doses. Even when the loneliness comes from the bitterness of loss and sorrow, the grace which leads to and comes through forgetting self, going out of self and doing for others, is the only cure that God has given on earth for its healing. For this reason we find Jesus speaking of the life given even unto death for others as a cure for loneliness. He said, “Except a grain of corn die it abideth alone.” And he was speaking, not of wheat, but of life. Are we ever taken with times of feeling lonely? Then let us go and do something for somebody. That is the cure.—S. S. Times.

To be a “rough rider” does not require the courage necessary to live a genuine Christian life.

Items Concerning the Society.

Persis Halleck, having returned from Bristol to Philadelphia, has been attending a few city meetings, expecting to be at Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting, held on Fifth-day, the 13th inst.

Cyrus Cooper, in the course of his present religious visit to many meetings in New Jersey, attended an appointed meeting at Haddonfield, on Fourth-day evening, the 5th inst., and at Moorestown on First-day afternoon, the 9th inst.

“We have felt a fresh concern at this time, to advise all our Friends, both elder and younger, to be faithful in the support of our testimony against an hireling ministry; convinced as we are, that the running after the ‘lo heres’ and the ‘lo theres,’ and giving countenance to those who officiate in the ministry for pecuniary reward, is very much calculated to retard our growth in the Truth.”—North Carolina Yearly Meeting, Epistle of 1843.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The State Department has been informed that the foreign Ministers at Peking have reached an agreement, which was submitted to the Home Offices, and Secretary Hay has authorized Minister Conger to sign the agreement on behalf of the United States Government. As to punishments, they are to be the severest that can be inflicted by the Chinese Government, and as to indemnity, the Chinese Government is to formally admit its liability and then the matter is to be left for future negotiation.

Statistics show that China took last year in round numbers $9,000,000 worth of cotton goods from the United States—more than Europe, South America, Canada and Mexico all put together.

The town of Eatonville, Fla., is said to have 1200 inhabitants, with not a single white among them. It has its full quota of public officials, a bank and other business establishments requisite in a town of its size.

Fifty million dollars have been appropriated by Congress for the construction of warships, and bids have been received for 11 different vessels.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that the total receipts for the year ending Sixth Month 30th, were about $659,000,000 of which nearly $300,000,000 came from internal revenue, $233,000,000 from customs duty, etc., and $102,000,000 from the postal service. The expenditures amounted to $590,000,000; of this sum $98,000,000 were on account of the civil establishment, $134,000,000 for the military establishment, $140,000,000 for pensions, $55,000,000 for the naval service, and $102,000,000 for the postal service. A surplus is reported of nearly $80,000,000.

The total number of pensioners according to the report of the Pension Bureau is 993,529.

In a debate in Congress it was said 104,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine were made last year, and for the most part sold as butter at from 18 to 30 cents a pound.

The largest grape-growing region in the world is said to be not in France nor California, but in Western New York, which has 50,000 acres in grape culture. In the Keuka Lake region there are 30,000 acres in vineyards, and in the Chautauqua belt 20,000 acres. The crop this year will amount to nearly 7,500 car-loads—22,500,000 nine-pound baskets of grapes.

A very rich gold territory is reported to have been found on the Yellow River, a tributary of the Kuskokwim, 300 miles from Yukon, where $34,000 was taken from a piece of ground sixteen feet square.

In the Southern Industrial Convention lately meeting in New Orleans, the committee on Immigration submitted a report, recommending the several States of the South, through their Legislatures, to make early and ample provision for the work of immigration, distributing facts and statistics, attractively setting forth the resources and capabilities of each State, requesting the company of immigration in each State to co-operate with the railroads in the work of immigration, and asking Southern Governors to urge the importance of liberal appropriations for immigration work upon their Legislatures.

The casein contained in butter milk, which a few years ago was largely wasted, now is used in the manufacture of buttons, glue, paper, and a superior kind of white-wash and varnish.

Resolutions have been introduced into the House of Representatives, protesting against the continuation of the war in South Africa and stating, "That the Congress of the United States being committed to the principle of arbitration for the settlement of international disputes, urges upon the Government of her Majesty the wisdom of adopting this policy for the purpose of stopping the awful atrocities now going on in South Africa."

The Inter-oceanic Canal Commission stated in their report to Congress: "Europe and parts of Asia and Africa have made a declaration as to the Suez Canal, which dedicates it as an area in which war shall not exist, and the broad sweep of that decree includes all nations in its benefits and pledges all nations to its maintenance. It is the one great international act that stands in front of all others to mark the real progress of civilization. An isthmian canal in America to connect the two oceans has all the characteristics of the Suez Canal and demands like treatment. Whether we prefer it or not, this European decree will impress its just authority in time upon the American canal and we will applaud the result. Our children will assent to this, though we may refuse."

The population of Indians, exclusive of those in the State of New York and those in the five civilized tribes of the Indian Territory, may be stated approximately to be 181,939, an increase of 353 over the previous year. The five nations or tribes of the Indian Territory comprise the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, Cherokee and Seminole. The approximate area of land embraced in the Indian Territory and controlled by these five tribes is 19,776,286 acres, with an estimated aggregate population of 84,750 Indians, including freedmen. It is estimated that at the present time there are approximately between 350,000 and 400,000 white people, non-citizens, within the limits of the five nations.

Two persons in Philadelphia who had charge of a young child, and allowed it to die without summoning a physician on the plea that they "believed absolutely in prayers curing all things," were recently sentenced to three months imprisonment.

The committee of the Presbyterian General Assembly that has been considering the returns from the Presbyteries has agreed upon a report recommending "that some revision or change be made in our professional statement."

The annual report of the Commissioner General of Immigration shows that during the last fiscal year the total number of immigrants who arrived in this country was 448,572, of which 23,200 came through Canada. Of the whole number, 304,148 were males and 144,424 females. This is a net increase over 1899 of 136,857. In addition, 65,635 aliens came as cabin passengers. They swell the total immigration to 514,207.

Wu Ting Fang, the Chinese Minister to the United States, spoke in New York on the 9th inst., on "The Teachings of Confucius."

Commenting on the teachings of Jesus Christ to "Love your enemies," he said: "Such a standard of excellence is too high for humanity. There is no likelihood that many people will follow it. At this very moment Christian missionaries are calling for bloodshed and vengeance, and Christian armies are devastating the land, sparing neither age nor sex. There is indeed a vast gulf between doctrine and performance. Confuciusism does not sanction retaliation in a vindictive spirit, such as, I regret to say, is shown by some persons professing to be governed by the tenets of Christianity."

There were 376 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 70 less than the previous week and 36 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 200 were males and 176 females: 57 died of congestion of the lungs; 51 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 21 of diphtheria; 14 of cancer; 11 of apoplexy, and 7 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 10 $\frac{3}{4}$ ¢ per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.30 to $2.50; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.30 to $3.40; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.60; spring, straight, $3.50 to $3.85; city mills, straight, $3.45 to $3.60.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 72 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 72 $\frac{3}{4}$ ¢.
No. 2 mixed corn, new, 43 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 43 $\frac{3}{4}$ ¢.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 30 to 30 $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢.

BEEF CATTLE.—Best, 5 $\frac{3}{4}$  to 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢; good, 4 $\frac{3}{4}$  to 5 $\frac{1}{4}$ ¢; medium, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ ¢.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4 $\frac{1}{4}$  to 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ ¢; good, 3 $\frac{3}{4}$  to 4¢; common, 2 to 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ ¢; spring lambs, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 6¢.

HOGS.—Best Western, 7 to 7 $\frac{1}{4}$ ¢.

FOREIGN.—A telegram to Berlin conveys the thanks of Emperor Kwang Su and the Empress Dowager for the moderation of the demands of the Powers, and says "that their Majesties are anxious to return to Peking as soon as circumstances will permit, and are eager to arrive at an understanding with the nations."

Li Hung Chang has informed General Chaffee that he and all the people of the province of Chi-Li are extremely gratified at the behavior of the American troops toward the Chinese.

During the negotiations with the Powers, it is expected that Prince Ching and Li Hung Chang will call attention to the great damage caused by the punitive expeditions. Such expeditions, it is pointed out, were entirely unnecessary in view of China's action in protecting foreigners and their interests after the rescue of the Legations in Peking, and were unauthorized by international law, in view of the fact that the Powers expressly stated that they were not at war with the Chinese Government. If the right of China to present the claims is recognized, she will be able to present a bill for damages which will largely offset that to be presented by the Powers. The United States will not, however, be interested in claims growing out of the punitive expeditions, as American troops have not taken part in them.

Peking advices state that the Chinese Emperor will return to the capital if he is assured of his safety. All the foreign envoys, except the British Minister, have received instructions agreeing to the joint note embodying the demands of the Powers.

It is stated that the Belgian station, in which were 3000 converts, has sustained a prolonged siege by Boxers and imperial troops. That other stations further west are still besieged, not only by Boxers, but by Chinese troops acting under orders from the authorities, and this in spite of the assurances by the plenipotentiaries that the Government is doing its utmost to suppress outrages.

Count von Waldersee has placed the German flag on the tombs of the Ming dynasty, but he did not carry out his original intention to raze them.

General Wilson, who has lately arrived in Washington from Peking, speaking of the Chinese situation, said: "China is absolutely prostrate. The report that she contemplates making a counter claim for indemnity on account of the punitive expeditions may be true, but I have no reason to believe that any attention will be paid to it. China has nothing to say in the matter; she is on her knees, and must accept the terms the Powers decide to impose. The punitive expeditions were unnecessary, and American troops did not participate in them. Their effect was to create bad blood."

An extra session of the English Parliament began on the 6th inst., in London. The action of Joseph Chamberlain, Secretary of the State for the Colonies, was bitterly assailed, especially in regard to the policy of the government in South Africa and China. In reply, Secretary Chamberlain announced in the House of Commons that civil government will shortly be established in the Transvaal and Orange River Colonies. He said that the Government's policy now is to defeat the Boers yet in arms. That accomplished, a Crown government would be set up and a Boer self-government would follow. Farm burning and "other severe military measures" would be stopped "far as possible," and pacific proclamations would be issued.

Paul Kruger, late President of the Transvaal Republic, has received an enthusiastic welcome in Holland, but despatch received at Antwerp from The Hague says Holland has no intention to intervene in favor of arbitrat in the Transvaal troubles.

It is estimated that over 92 per cent. of the ocean floor has a temperature lower than 40 degrees Fahrenheit. Frequently, while in hot equatorial regions, the Challenger dredges brought up great masses of this icy ooze cooling the ship's drinking water.

A Danish engineer has invented a recording teleph which was exhibited at the Paris Exhibition. The principle upon which it is based is said to be extremely simple. It not only records but reproduces sounds.

NOTICES.

Public Meeting, Lansdowne, Pa.

A meeting for worship is appointed by authority of Chester Monthly Meeting, Pa., to be held in the meeting-house at Lansdowne, Pa., Fifth-day evening, the 21st inst., at eight o'clock.

FRIENDS' RELIGIOUS AND MORAL ALMANAC AND FRIENDS' CALENDAR FOR 1901 are for sale at Friends' Book Store, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia. Almanac without cover, four cents; with cover, five cents; postage extra. Calendars, five cents; if mailed, ten cents each.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage will start from Philadelphia 7.16 and 8.18 A. M., and 4.32 and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when requested. Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., twenty cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, call Westtown Station or West Chester, Phone 85.

EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Sup

Friends' Library, 142 N. Sixteenth St., Phila.

Among the books added Eleventh Month 28th, 1900 are the following:

HARLAND, Marion, pseud.—John Knox.
HARLAND, Marion, pseud.—Hanna More.
HARRIS, J. R., ed.—Life of F. W. Crossley.
HART, A. B.—Studies in American Education.
JONES, William—Quaker Campaigns in Peace and War.
LONG, W. J.—Wilderness Ways.
PENN, William—Some Fruits of Solitude (new ed.)
STEDMAN, E. C.—American Anthology 1787-1899.
THOMPSON, G. G. Stot.—Woman Tenderfoot.
WOOLMAN, John—Journal edited by J. G. Whittier (New Century edition).

Open on week-days from 11.30 A. M. to 2 P. M. and on 3 P. M. to 6 P. M. Also open from 7 P. M. to 7.45 P. M. on the evenings on which Friends Institute Lyceum Meetings are held.

DIED, at the residence of Charles Blackburn, her son-in-law, the twenty-seventh of Tenth Month, 1900, H. HOLLINGSWORTH, in the seventy-eighth year of her age. She was a member of Middleton Monthly and Particular Meeting of Friends, Ohio.

—, on the eleventh of Ninth Mo., 1900, JOB HORTON, in the eighty-first year of his age; a member of Middleton Monthly and Particular Meeting of Friends, Ohio.

—, at the home of her son, Seth Shaw, on the twelfth of Tenth Month, 1900, PENINA SHAW, in the second year of her age; an elder and member of Middleton Monthly and Particular Meeting of Friends, Ohio.

—, at his residence in Ulysses, Tompkins County, N. Y., the fourth of Eleventh Mo., 1900, CHARLES HORTON, in the seventy-seventh year of his age; a member of Hecctor Monthly Meeting of Friends. His sammon from this world was sudden, but not unexpected either to himself or his friends; and we reverently believe it was gathered with the just of all generations. His last prayerfully uttered were, "Oh, grant my deliverance, and a short time previously said, "I may say at this time that I can rejoice in the mercy of the Lord."

WILLIAM H. PILE'S SONS, PRINTERS,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 22, 1900.

No. 23.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,

PHILADELPHIA.

South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth.)

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM,

No. 140 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

The Doukhor Colonists Not Yet Past the Critical Period.

We have lately given place in our columns to accounts of the Doukhobors, written by two summer visitors who naturally brought away from them a more rose-colored view of their condition than would be obtainable at other seasons of the year. Our Friends who have been in the closest and most frequent touch with these colonies fear that such accounts may have the effect of setting Friends here in a dangerous state of ease in regard to the actual needs of that people through the coming winter. Though their industry during the summer has probably provided the larger part of them with a fair supply of sustenance for another winter, yet there have been many suffering under special disadvantages who will require the help of Friends to prevent serious suffering. It is feared that impressions received of their comparative comfort in the summer season will cause some Friends to feel excused from rendering help during the critical time now approaching, that even more lives may be suffered to perish through destitution than was the case when our sympathies were more alert.

Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting.

Hold thy peace at the presence of the Lord God; for the delay of the Lord is at hand; for the Lord hath prepared a sacrifice; He hath bid his guests" (Zeph. i: 7).

Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting was held at Crestown on the thirteenth instant. The beautiful weather, and the interest which centered in the occasion, brought a large number of visitors from other Quarterly Meetings; and together with our own members filled the new meeting-house nearly to its capacity. As the meeting gathered and settled into session, a lively concern seemed speedily to prevail; that it might be held to the honor and glory of Him whom we professed to worship, and that to Shiloh the gathering of the people might indeed be. Three young Friends in close succession very soon arose and gave vocal expression to this feeling; inviting to the true inward silence, and to the true place and manner of worship, as taught by our blessed Master at the well of Samaria. A tender and fervent plea at the footstool of Divine grace was the next offering; after which the stream of a pure living gospel ministry seemed to have course, baptizing the assembly into that oneness of spirit which is the earnest of the better life into which all are called of God. An aged Friend, who was reckoned among the deeply concerned visitors, in a powerful appeal for our submission to the cleansing and refining operation of the Holy Spirit, referred to the cross of Christ as the power of God unto salvation; also quoting the text, "The King's daughter (which is the church), is all glorious within; her clothing is of wrought gold" (Psalm xlv: 13). Calling attention to the expression "wrought gold," that it signified gold tried in the fire, and yet so carefully that not a particle of the pure metal would be allowed to be consumed in the refining process. The parable of the vine was dwelt upon by another aged Friend; special reference being made to the necessity of the pruning process upon the branches: that though it might seem wasteful, yet it was for a great and valuable purpose, namely, that much good fruit might be borne.

After several other ministering Friends had spoken, addressing themselves particularly to the younger Friends present, the first session of the meeting closed, under a feeling of thankfulness for the privilege of being so bountifully fed from the Master's table.

The session for business was also a season of deep instruction and interest, wherein the affairs of the Church were transacted in a large measure of that "spirit and wisdom of Jesus, and love of each other" which is the badge of true discipleship.

Among the subjects claiming the attention of the meeting were the reports of the committees having the oversight of the indulged meetings at Atlantic City and Merchantville. The attendance at the former of these had at times reached two hundred persons during the past summer. Several Friends, not members of the Quarterly Meeting, expressed their sense of the value of this meeting, not only to our own members when sojourning there, but also to individuals not of our religious Society, who may at times avail themselves of the opportunity to attend a meeting for worship held after the manner of Friends.

Though the outlook for the meeting at Merchantville did not appear encouraging, it was thought best to continue it a further period of six months, in the belief that there were some to whom it would be helpful and tend to strengthen their life in best things.

Near the close of the meeting a young minister who had for some time past been visiting, in the love of the Gospel, its various subordinate branches and some of the families thereof, feelingly alluded to the fact, that he believed the work to which he had felt called was now accomplished; and that as he had passed among us, he had been encouraged with the belief that a renewed visitation of heavenly love was being extended to the young people of this Quarterly Meeting, the overflowings of which extended beyond the borders thereof. Under the feeling of solemnity which arose through these remarks, and the renewed sense to which they gave rise of our individual responsibility, that nothing might be suffered to hurt or destroy in the Lord's holy mountain until the knowledge of Him should fill the earth as the waters cover the sea (Psalm xi, 9), the meeting closed.

The appearance of such a gathering in these days, when some begin already to speak of the decadence of Quakerism, could not fail of being a real comfort to those whose desire is for the upbuilding of Zion; that her borders may be extended, and her strength increased. Did any one seek consolation in galleries filled from end to end with plain substantial Friends, they must have found it there, where sixteen approved ministers sat, showing forth by thoughtful face or word of exhortation the blessed effects of the Gospel of Christ. Did any one long to see, as of old, the spiritual life of the meeting arise and flow as from vessel to vessel, until the assembly was baptized into solemnity, they found it here, where it seemed as though the Lord of life and glory did move upon the hearts of the people and touch the lips of his ministers as with a live coal from his holy altar.

WHEN God intends to fill a soul He first makes it empty; when He intends to enrich a soul, He first makes it poor; when He intends to exalt a soul, He first makes it humble; when He intends to save a soul, He first makes it sensible of its own miseries, wants and nothingness.

Our Saviour in the end of his beatitudes, speaks, "Great is your reward in heaven," but in the beginning of them, He first saith, "Blessed are the poor in spirit." God deals in the spiritual building, as men do in the artificial building, the higher they intend to build, the lower and deeper do they lay their foundation.

If God intends to lift you up to Christ, and mercy, and grace, and glory, He will then bring you low in the sense of your sinful miseries and spiritual wants, and self-nothingness and unworthiness.—Flavel.

THE recognition of friends in heaven is a sweet doctrine to many, but the recognition of Christian brethren on earth ought to be equally precious. Many go off in raptures over the former, who practically ignore the latter.

FOR "THE FRIEND"

Noble Words of a Dying Indian Chief.

Martha Craig, an adventurous, talented young Irish woman, whose forefathers for the last three hundred years have dwelt in the same mansion in Belfast, Ireland, after having herself sojourned six years, working and mingling with the people among the vineyards in the south of France, eventually came to Canada, settling on the shores of the Georgian Bay amongst the Indian aborigines, at a place called Garden River Reserve, twenty miles from Sault Sainte Marie.

Here she met with Begnuginini, the last hereditary chief of the Ojibeways, and son of the warrior, Shingwauk, who fought for Geo. III. at Niagara and Mackinac. She formed a deep friendship with old Begnuginini, and was adopted into the tribe under the name of Enookwashooshah (a brave woman).

At first she was compelled to carry on her conversation with the old chief through an interpreter. She soon learned that it was Begnuginini who had supplied Schoolcraft with the Indian traditions which appear in Longfellow's great poem. 'Hiawatha,' it seems, is the Ojibeways' Christ, who, they believe, went to heaven, and there received the religion which still prevails among the tribe.

One of the sayings of Chief Begnuginini, who was somewhat of a socialist was, "The land belongs not to the red man, nor the pale face, but to the Great Spirit."

Chief Begnuginini has been dead for about nine months. "His last words to me were," she said, "While the sun shines by day and the moon by night, while the waters flow to the sea, while the grass grows green, my pale face daughter, living or dead, I shall never forget you. Think good thoughts always, and the Great Spirit shall dwell around you and protect you from all evil; and who knows but that we shall meet in the land beyond the portals of the setting sun."

Martha Craig has the distinction of being both a princess of the Ojibeways and Winnebagos, and possesses some interesting photographs of herself taken in native costume. She has obtained no end of Indian lore during her sojourn among the red men, and hopes to convert it into reading matter later on.

Modern Heroes.

There are some who think that bravery died with the Romans, that art has been decaying since the end of the palmy days of the Greeks, that all the noble virtues have long ceased to find lodgment in the human heart. . . .

The Youth's Companion tells of a young collegian, imbued with the pessimistic spirit, who was lamenting the decay of the higher virtues of the times. He had much to say now of Sidney and Sir Thomas Moore and other brave and chivalrous gentlemen, dead long ago.

"Where will you find such men nowadays?" he cried. "Nowhere. We are sordid and commonplace. We care for nothing but making money!"

Presently his father told the story of Walla Tonaki, the Navajo boy who was condemned to death two years ago by his tribe; but such was their confidence in his honor that he was permitted to travel alone and unguarded for hundreds of miles to fulfill an engagement, giving his parole to return and be shot at the set time.

"And he was there," said the squire. "The tribe was in waiting, and at the very hour set the Tonaki appeared and quietly faced them ready for death.

Then Tom's mother recalled the story of the burning of the Charity Bazaar in Paris, and of the Duchess d'Alencon, who, with the roof dropping in flaming fragments around her, when a way was opened through the shrieking, struggling mass for her escape, drew back, saying:

"My guests go first," and remained till the charred, dead body was carried out.

"Courtesy and high breeding in the old time touched no loftier mark than that," his mother said, with tears in her eyes.

Some one else recalled Prof. Max. Muller's account in his "My Indian Friends" of a Christian convert, Goreh, among the Hindus. His father was a high-class Brahmin, obliged by his position publicly to curse his son for his change of religion. He loved his son, and to avoid the necessity of pronouncing the curse, took a vow of perpetual silence. He retired into the forest and never uttered a word again.

"Here were a poor red Indian, a princess, and a Hindu who could touch hands with the great men of past ages, Tom," said his father. "Human nature can rise to as great heights now as it ever did. And the opportunities come every day. Make ready to use them, and waste no time bewailing the golden age." —Christian Standard.

Great Men and Their Bible.

The want of Bible knowledge among university students has been frequently commented upon. But, if it be true that misery loves company, then the under graduates may take heart, if the following after-dinner conversation of high officials is correctly reported:

A party of very distinguished men—Cabinet ministers, Senators, diplomats, scientists, generals, and high officials—were earnestly engaged in an after-dinner conversation, in Washington, when the conversation naturally drifted from politics to the proposed revision of the creed of the Presbyterian Church. Much to the surprise of each other, and to themselves perhaps, no one of the party was able to name the "Five Points of Calvinism" upon which the theological system of so large a community is based. Several undertook rather bravely to explain for the benefit of their less learned companions what Calvinism meant, and a Justice of the Supreme Court was able to name four points of Calvinism to his own satisfaction, although his accuracy was questioned by others, and he could not remember the fifth. His four points were:

1. Original sin or total depravity.
2. The freedom of the will.
3. Predestination or election.
4. The perseverance of the saints.

Then somebody remarked that he once sat in the Union League Club at New York with Roscoe Conkling, Chester A. Arthur, and several other distinguished gentlemen who had been carefully educated in religious families, and that none of them was able to name the twelve Apostles.

"That's easy," said a Senator, brashly, beginning "Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John bless the bed that I lie on, Paul, the tw Jameses, Jude, Barnabas—" and there he stopped, with some embarrassment.

"Timothy," suggested a major-general, who is a vestryman in an Episcopal Church.

"Nonsense," answered a senator. "Timothy was a disciple of Paul's. He wasn't one of the twelve Apostles."

"Nicodemus," suggested one of the company.

"Jeremiah," suggested the third. "Judas was one of the Apostles," meekly came from a voice in the corner.

He was a disciple," came the curt reply.

"Weren't the disciples and the Apostles the same thing?" inquired the meek voice, getting a little bolder.

"Bartholomew" was suggested and accepted by several.

"What's the matter with Peter?" exclaimed a modest young member of the Diplomat Corps who had hitherto been silent.

"How many does that make?" somebody asked, and they counted up ten for sure, with as many more doubtful.

"Let's look in the Bible," somebody suggested, and the Good Book was overhauled in vain. Then an encyclopedia was appealed to, but it was not entirely satisfactory, for it excluded Thomas and Andrew in the list, and the Justice of the Supreme Court and two of the Senators were positive that Andrew was an Apostle. All of which shows that great and learned men may know more about the science of earthly government than about the kingdom of heaven.—Zion's Watchman.

RITUAL (Rom. i: 20.)

True love, as leader in God's mystic strife,
Outruns the tethered range of worldly life.

Examine well that phrase!

Deem it no cant that worldliness must cling
Where'er the symbol supercedes the thing.

Above all worldly ways,

Right reason were not free for service true
Did she once drop the metaphoric clue

Lent man, from error's maze

Sound riddance to afford. To no high use
Can age, sex, rank, or any gain conduce

Until it so displays

Love, from the semblance to the substance sure Leading all lovers of communion pure.

FOR "THE FRIEND"

INSPIRATION ALONE THE POWER.— In view of the much speaking and long doctrinal sermons that have in these times of creative activity so largely occupied the hour of worship in many of the Friends' meetings, I have felt that there might be a lesson to some in the testimony of one who has passed his life more than three score years, but has never been a member of any religious society, and has been unacquainted with Friends the most of his life. He said: "I am convinced that no man could for six months regularly attend silent Quaker meetings, and not be a changed being—no better man."

"There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding;" and I am persuaded were there no speaking but by this inspiration our meetings would be larger and more vitalizing. For if the word quicken, we shall be quickened indeed.

Some Account of the Early Experience and Subsequent Travels of Ruth Newlin.

(Continued from page 172.)

"We started on our journey at half-past one o'clock. My heart is filled with sweet peace, and joy that I have been enabled to leave all for the great Master's cause.

"23rd.—A very cloudy morning, rained till near noon. Yet it has been a pleasant day to me. Distributed a number of tracts which I have a hope may be a benefit to some poor wandering souls.

"24th.—Reached Bedford at two o'clock. Very unexpectedly met with a pleasant reception from two families of Friends in this place.

"25th.—I had rather a sleepless night on account of the military disturbance here. Oh! what an awful thing for men to be preparing to slay one another.

"26th.—At Maryville. But little rest. I feel very unwell and rather depressed in spirit. I need no wonder, considering the condition of the excited public. Have written a letter to my dear children. I feel for them as for myself. Oh! Holy Father, stretch forth thine all-protecting arm for our preservation in this time of tears.

"27th.—I see no way for me to get along, but more and more firmly to put my trust in thy divine protection. My natural weakness is acutely felt at this time of trial.

"28th.—First-day morning. We arrived here at the city of Atchinson yesterday. At the house of —, who kindly received us. His wife and her mother are members of our society. I had only thought of having an opportunity with the family, but now feel it required of me to have a public meeting for the citizens of this place, which is a great blessing to me.

"29th.—After a laborious though favored meeting at Atchinson, among a people who know nothing of our mode of worship, we made a drive of twelve miles. Oh! Father be pleased to turn the hearts of the people more unto thee and thy kingdom, that they may depend on thee on man.

"30th.—Arrived here at the house of our dear friend, —. Had a meeting yesterday at Pardee, a very exercising time, yet I believe, I had a good meeting. We have concluded to meet in this neighborhood. My companion, Hannah Chantry, is very unwell. Evening.—I have spent the day in social visiting among acquaintances and relatives, and hope it has not been altogether unprofitable. I well remember in days long gone that pleasant words from a friend whom I believed desired my welfare, came to me as a little brook by the way.

Fifth Month 1st, 1861.—Attended Kansas Comparative Meeting, and I believe many of us would say that we had received a little refreshment from the sure Fountain of all good. Spent a very pleasant evening and night with my dear cousins Moses and Martha Harvey. It seems that friends can not do enough for us wherever we go, of which we feel very unthankful. May they have their reward.

"2nd.—At Jonathan Mendenhall's; came twenty-five miles.

"3rd.—We had a small meeting here; religion seems to be at a low ebb. The most so in any place we have visited in the State. Oh! Lord, rouse the lukewarm that they may not only profess but possess a life in thee.

"4th.—Arrived at Friends' Indian Mission.

"5th.—First-day. At the usual meeting we met with the few Friends here and the Indian children they have in charge. We had a precious meeting. Several Indians came in from the neighborhood this evening to attend a meeting we felt like having with them at four o'clock. A very solemn season to me to meet with so many of these poor wild people. Yet I do believe there are tender hearted ones among them.

"6th.—We visited the school this morning. I was surprised at the improvement these poor children are making in their studies, and the interest manifested by them.

"We have an appointed meeting at Shawneetown, two miles from the mission, at five o'clock this evening, for those who are not in profession with us. I have visited the grave of my beloved friend and doctor, Jesse Harvey, who was laid here thirteen years ago. He spent the most of his last years for the benefit of the Indians and colored people in his native State, Ohio.

"7th.—We had a very orderly and pleasant meeting last evening. The first ever held in the town by Friends.

"8th.—Arrived at Eli Wilson's last evening in good time. I feel very low. The most so since leaving home. Almost ready to call in question my being here. Yet I see no light on returning home. Oh! for more faith in thee and resignation to thy will, Oh! Heavenly Father.

"9th.—Notwithstanding the low state of mind in which I went to Monthly Meeting, yesterday, I have great cause to adore and praise Him who opens and no man can shut. The peace and comfort granted me since meeting, is beyond description. May I learn day by day to put my whole trust in the Almighty Arm of power. Started for Spring Grove Monthly Meeting. Arrived at the city of Lawrence in time of a rain storm, which raised the waters so that we were obliged to stay at the town all night, at a very large hotel. But little sleep on account of the great excitement about the war. I do not remember feeling so nearly enveloped in gross darkness. My blood chills at the thought of the wickedness in this place.

"10th.—Had rather a wearisome journey. Though met with some very kind young Friends, where we took dinner, being water-bound a few hours at noon.

"11th.—Still high waters and considerably detained on that account. A ferryman not being at his post detained us two hours, and when we came to the Pottawattamie River, it was brimming, and no ferry, so we were disappointed about getting to Spring Grove Meeting.

"12th.—A very hard rain last night, and all the little streams are swollen. In the evening it ceased raining, and we crossed the river in a little skiff to the settlement of Friends, where we were kindly received.

"13th.—My way seems quite closed up yesterday and to-day. Very closely tried in mind. See no way but to be still.

"14th.—Very poorly this morning. The way looks clear for us to have general notice given to Friends and others of our expectation of being at meeting to-morrow.

"15th.—A pretty good attendance, yet I was not able so fully to relieve my mind, as at some other times.

"16th.—Arrived at Jesse Henley's late this evening, feeling very unwell, but thankful that the Great Physician of value is round about and though the outward man is weakened by affliction, the inner man is strengthened in peace and praise.

"17th.—Quite weak in body, but feel like having a meeting here with Friends and others this evening at three o'clock.

"18th.—Had a favored meeting last evening. Many tender people present, who I trust were encouraged on their heaven-bound journey.

"19th.—After a very fatiguing day's journey reached here late last evening at Curtis Hiatt's. Very weak and low spirited. Rode seven miles to meeting and found quite a number collected. And I believe we had a favored meeting, wherein the Shepherd and Bishop of souls was felt to be in our very midst, unworthy as we are.

"20th.—This has been a trying day to me throughout, owing to an impression made on my mind that duty calls me to visit the Caw Indian tribe. My whole nature shrinks from it, for we are informed that I would have to speak through an interpreter. I fear I can not speak slowly enough for any one to follow me. Yet there seems no way for me to obtain true peace, which I so much desire, without obedience to my heavenly Father's will."

[Here seems a fitting place to allude to this, her greatest difficulty, in speaking in public. The rapidity with which her discourses were delivered bothered some to keep up with and understand her. Consequently she was often spoken to in regard to it, and sometimes harshly. In speaking of it in private, she called it "the old song" and said she believed it had been wrong for her to desire so much to be able to please people. Her Friends thought she did improve in this line, though she said she could not so fully throw off the burden as when she spoke in her natural way.]

"So with humble heart and trembling steps I and my Friends (four in number) repaired to the woods, where about one hundred of these poor, distressing-looking people were seated or lounging on the grass. Before we reached the place my very heart yearned for this degraded and afflicted people. Very soon after we were seated on an old rotten log, my heart was filled with the love of God to their poor souls. A young Indian boy, by the name of Thomas Jefferson, interpreted the best he could; I have heard that the Indians were well pleased with the meeting. By their expressions of satisfaction at the end of each sentence, I have no doubt they understood most of what was said to them."

[It was with difficulty that these Indians could be induced to assemble even in the woods. They had been having trouble among themselves, and a few of their number were killed in the fray. They thought they were going to be reproved for their conduct and were shy and sour at first. But soon after the speaking commenced, the smoke from their pipes began to ascend as a signal of good will. And by the time the meeting ended, they had crept up close to the Friends, and so many came forward to shake hands that Ruth's glove was spoiled. The love of God proved sufficient to bring into subjection the wild Indians, some of whom were equipped for war in their own fierce and formidable style. Under other circumstances the timid nature of the speaker would have shrunk from such an encounter.]

(To be continued.)

WEARING BLACK OR DRESSING IN MOURNING.—This, to my mind, is a subject of considerable importance. Shall we conform to this custom or not is a question that requires consideration, and it is much better to give it the needed thought when the pressure of preparation for the funeral services of some dear friend is not upon us. I had scarcely given the subject a thought when my dear father was suddenly, without a moment's warning, called hence to be with us no more. In common with the prevailing custom I supposed I must put on black clothing or I would not appear to honor or respect the dear departed one. I had but recently finished my school days and had just commenced teaching. I had an abundant supply of clothing for a year, but not one black dress had a place in my wardrobe. In debt for my education and but just beginning to help myself, I could ill afford the extra expense incident to a change of apparel. But I thought I must, so went forward and arrayed myself in black, at not less than thirty dollars extra expense, though I economized to the utmost of my ability, borrowing what I could, etc. My experience convinced me that change of apparel for the dead is a very oppressive custom, to say the least. How often the poor widow feels compelled to increase her indebtedness in order to show due respect to her dear departed companion.

Shall we not as Free Methodists come out from the world and be separate in this respect as well as from all other fashions and customs that we cannot follow to the glory of God?—M. H. Freeland, in The Free Methodist.

THE SOFT AIRS OF NANTUCKET.—There are some queer facts about it, which, perhaps, all the world does not know. For instance, that it belonged in its early historical days to New York State, and its settlers preferred and petitioned to become a part of Massachusetts; also, that it is the only place in the Eastern Hemisphere where the Scotch heather grows. It has, in other respects, a flora peculiar to itself, which botanists have decided to be due to two causes. The first and most important, of course, is its mild and balmy climate, produced by its envelope of warm air and water, which are tempered by the proximity of the Gulf Stream. The second cause is the stretches of common sands on which the virgin soil has never been disturbed by cultivation, and which are a garden of wild flowers blooming in lovely profusion. These lands were the undivided property of the original grantees of the island, and are the common and still undivided heritage of nearly all the natives of Nantucket, who are their descendants. The winter climate of the island is 20 degrees warmer than the mainland, and is said to be much like that of the Isle of Wight. 'Indeed, some sanguine property owners are endeavoring to boom the town as a winter resort, so confident are they of the beneficent effects of its climate.—N. Y. Evening Post.

No pure, true, loving heart ever gets beyond being strengthened and warmed to nobler service by words of honest and sincere appreciation. Flattery is contemptible; only vain spirits are elated by it. Insincerity is a sickening mockery; the sensitive soul turns away from it in revulsion. But words of true gratitude are always to human hearts like cups of water to thirsty lips. We need not fear turning people's heads by genuine expressions of thankfulness; on the other hand, nothing inspires such humility, such reverent praise to God, as the knowledge which such gratitude brings, that one has been used of God to help, or bless, or comfort another life.—J. R. Miller.

Richard Shackleton to John Conran, About to Join the Society of Friends.

BALTIMORE, 12TH of Fifth Month, 1772.

Dear Friend:—I have been favored with thy very friendly and obliging letter, and if my correspondence could prove of any service to thee, my new friend and old pupil should be heartily welcome to the best that it might afford. I have no doubt but that, as thy letter very sensibly intimated, the first great work of the inward creation has been, in measure, effected in thee, and the great first moving cause to every right religious sense has said, "Let there be light." By this light I believe thou hast seen the great superiority which future eternal happiness has above temporary gratification, and thy mind has been stirred to aspire after the experience of those things which make for thy present and future peace. Well, dear friend, keep to this light, and walk in the shining of it, and thereby thou wilt know, in the progress of this inward work, a being more and more separated from the darkness.

Religion consists in knowledge and practice, hearing Christ's sayings and doing them. Our great duty then is, diligently to wait on the motions of his Spirit in our own hearts, and faithfully to obey its requirements.

It is not the accumulation of even right religious notions in the head, it is not a facility of writing or speaking about them from such conceptions: it is not a good capacity by which we may give a reasonable plea for our religious sentiments and conduct, and by which we may defend them from the attacks of others—it is not in these things that our stability and growth in religion consists. We may be clear in the head, and yet deceived in the heart. While our eyes are roving about in speculation in these matters an insidious adversary may lay snares for our feet, and he that thinks he stands may too late be convinced of his weakness by his fall. Let us, therefore, my dear friend, walk cautiously and circumspectly as in the day. Let us keep in the child's state while we are but children waiting patiently to be fed in due season with food convenient for us, not seeking to be anything in form or degree, but as the inward operative principle of life shall gradually make us. The inward, as well as outward creation is, I had like to have said, infinite in its variety. Let us, therefore, not be so solicitous to model our conduct after the example of others, as desirous in simplicity to be what the Lord would have us to be. If we are passive enough in his hand to be squared, fashioned and fitted by Him, there is no fear but that in due time He will bring us into our proper respective places in his church.

In the meantime let us keep a watch over the wanderings of our own imaginations, and know a limitation to them, as well as a bridle to our tongues. There is a laudable parsimony and frugality in religion, especially suitable to young beginners in this commerce. We should not be lavish of the main stock, but rather imitate the woman who took the leaven (received the precious visitation) and hid it in the three measures of meal till the whole body, soul and spirit, was leavened. David also saith, "Thy word have I hid in my heart that I might not sin against thee." And the closer this is put up in our own breasts, like fire in a close oven, the sooner and the more effectually it will consume the chaffy and the transgressing (which is the combustible) matters, and then be as a flame of joy, purifying, keeping clean, enlightening and enlivening the mind through all its faculties.

Importations of India Rubber.

More than one hundred million dollars' worth of India rubber has been imported into the United States during the past four years, a more than sixty million dollars' worth in the last two years. A decade ago the annual importations of India rubber amounted to about fifteen million dollars; now they exceed thirty million dollars and are steadily increasing. Practically all of the importations of rubber come in crude form for use of manufacturers who are constantly extending its application to various new lines of industry. Northern Brazil, Southern Mexico, the West Indies, Central Africa, India, the Straits Settlements, and the Dutch East Indies supply this increasingly important feature of our importations. Probably no single article has made a more rapid growth in its relations to manufactures, and consequently commerce, in the past few years than rubber. As a consequence, attention is now being given to the cultivation and systematic production of the various plants and trees from which it can be produced.

The above statement is suggested by a receipt by the Treasury Bureau of Statistics of a publication detailing the systematic efforts being made for the cultivation of India rubber trees and plants in the British colonies, especially those of Central and South Africa. This, coupled with the well-known fact that our own Department of Agriculture has already begun experiments and inquiries in this line in the island territories of the United States, adds greatly to the interest in the question and to the possibility that the thirty million dollars a year which we are now selling out of the country for this product may be expended under the American flag among American producers. The fact that Southern Mexico and Central America are natural producers of India rubber in considerable and increasing quantities, and that large quantities are produced in and exported from the islands and mainland immediately adjacent to the Philippines, suggests great possibilities in this line, both in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands.

India rubber is not, as is generally supposed, the product of a single tree, but is produced from a variety of trees and plants. Some of these flourish only in a moist soil and atmosphere, while others thrive on stony soil, provided they receive ample though intermittent fall; though in most cases a tropical or subtropical climate is requisite. Most of the India rubber of South and Central America and India is from trees, but in the islands of the Indian archipelago the supply of rubber is chiefly from a gigantic creeper, which in five years' growth attains a length of two hundred feet and from twenty to thirty inches in circumference, and which yields annually from twenty to sixty pounds of caoutchouc. Java, Sumatra, Penang, Singapore, and French Indochina are already large producers of crude India rubber or caoutchouc, and its production in the West Indies has been sufficient to indicate the entire practicability of its being made an important industry in Cuba and Porto Rico, as well as in the Hawaiian, Philippine and Samoan Islands.—Christian Advocate.

GIANT TREES.—The Department of Agriculture has issued a report on investigations of the big trees of California that brings out some interesting and new conclusions. It shows that the dimensions of the big trees are equalled; that their age makes them the oldest living things. They are described by the report as "the grandest, largest, oldest and most majestically graceful of trees," and "the rarest of known tree species, with the extreme scientific value of being the best living representatives of a former geologic age."

The report says the bark of the big tree is two feet thick and almost non-combustible. "The oldest specimens felled," it says, "are still sound at the heart and fungus is an enemy unknown to it. Yet the big trees apparently have not increased their range since the glacial epoch. They have only just managed to hold their own on the little strip of country where the climate is locally favorable."

The most recent investigations, according to the report, confirm the estimate that these giant trees probably live 5000 years or more, though few of even the larger trees are more than half as old. The average rate of growth is estimated at one inch of the diameter for every twelve years. The report also corroborates the statements of one authority who says that one tree, on which he counted 4000 rings, was undoubtedly in its prime "swaying in the Sierra winds when Christ walked the earth." The report states, among other things, as the result of the official investigations:

"The only place in the world where the big tree exists is in ten isolated groves on the west slope of the Sierra Nevada Mountains. The species, however, represent a surviving prehistoric genus of trees once growing widely over the globe. The Southern groves show some reproduction, through which there is hope of perpetuating these groves. In the Northern groves the species hardly holds its own."

THINGS TO FORGET.—If you would increase your happiness and prolong your life, forget your neighbor's faults, says an exchange. Forget the slander you have ever heard. Forget the temptations. Forget the fault-finders and give a little thought to the cause which provoked it. Forget the peculiarities of your friends, and remember only the good points which makes you fond of them. Forget all personal quarrels or histories you may have heard by accident, and which, if repeated, would seem a thousand times worse than they are. Blot out as far as possible all the disagreeables of life; they will come, but they will grow larger when you remember them, and the constant thought of the acts of meanness, or, worse still, malice, will tend only to make you more familiar with them. Obliterate everything disagreeable from yesterday; start out with a clean sheet for to-day, and write upon it, for sweet memory's sake, only those things which are lovely and lovable.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee: and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire thou shalt not be burned: neither shall the flames kindle upon thee (Isa. xliii: 2).

For not a sparrow falls without thy notice,
As true to-day as in the days gone by,
And in the stream of bulrush and of lotus,
The infant Moses still is guided by thine eye.

Thy constant love to us has ne'er abated
From Adam's fall, down through Judea's plain,
And of the creatures which thy Word created
Not one has ever come to thee in vain.

Boundless thy mercies, as the sand in number,
In justice meted, to the sons of men.
They follow us to dawn, through midnight slumber,
And every morning are renewed again.

Third Month 11th, 1900.

An Hour with an Ant.

If you want to know how to accomplish a hard task, come with me and watch a little ant for an hour.

She was a small, black ant, and seeing a brown worm eight times as large as herself, she was seized with an ambition to take it home in triumph.

Now will you tell me how she knew that she could have no power over the worm while he was on his ten feet, that stuck to the sidewalk like glue? Before she attempted anything, she fastened her mandibles into his side and turned him over on his back just as you see Bridget turn the mattress. Then running to his head she again fastened her mandibles and dragged him for a couple of inches. While she was pausing to get her breath the worm took the opportunity to get on his feet once more. The ant did not seem to notice the change in position till she tried again to drag the body. As soon as she felt it sticking, around she ran to the side, over went the worm in a trice, and once more the two started on their journey. Now they were close to a crack in the broad sidewalk, and I, thinking to help the little worker, in whom by this time I was quite interested, lifted the worm across the crack.

Did you ever try to help some one and find too late you had done exactly the wrong thing? Then you know how I felt when that little ant began rushing around as if she were crazy, and when she got hold of the worm again began to drag it back across the very crack I had lifted it over. Can you guess why? She was taking a bee-line to her house, and I had changed the direction. But how was she to get that big body across a crack that could swallow them both? That was what I waited anxiously to see. Soon the worm felt himself going down, down into a dark abyss, and of course caught hold of the side to save himself, and when he once felt he had a hold on life, how he did hold on! The ant was not to be daunted; balancing herself on the edge, and holding on by her feet, she reached down her mandibles and dragged him by main force straight up the perpendicular wall to the top; nor did she stop till he was carried far enough from the edge not to get down again.

In this way three cracks were safely crossed, and it was plain to see the worm was losing heart, although every time the ant paused for breath he would get over on his feet and have to be tossed back again.

And now a new difficulty arose. The worm had been dragged about eighteen inches over the boards. Fourteen inches more would bring them to the ant's house, or, rather, hill. But the way was now off the sidewalk, and no sooner did the worm feel the stubble under him than he gathered all his strength, turned over on his feet, and held on to every spear of grass for dear life.

Indeed, it was his last chance, and I felt tempted to snatch him from the certain death awaiting him, but curiosity to see how this new obstacle would be overcome induced me to wait. The ant now felt justified in calling for assistance, and soon a dozen ants had come to help. Only five could work to advantage, so the rest, for ants never like to do the "heavy looking on," left to find other employment.

The first thing to be done was to get the worm on his back, and this proved no easy task. He could fasten his feet just as fast as the ants could unfasten them. At last two ants went to one end and two to the other. Each one of the four seized a foot in her strong mandibles and held it out as far as possible, while the fifth one turned the captive. It was the funniest sight! It was easy now to drag him two or three inches, but breath had to be taken, and again the worm fastened. In vain they tugged and pulled. He had evidently learned their tactics and knew how to defend himself. Suddenly his body moved along an inch and a-half, as if by magic? Was it magic? Not at all. One little ant had run up on an overhanging blade of grass, and, reaching down, holding on by the wonderful feet spoken of before, grabbed the poor creature in the middle, raised it right up from the ground, and, keeping hold, ran along overhead till the end of the spear of grass was reached.

This was the last struggle of any importance. The worm gave up discouraged. It was now only a question of time till they had dragged him through the stubble up to the door of the house in the hill, and I saw only a faint quivering as of dread as his body passed through the mysterious opening. I could not help wondering if the ant who started the capture received all the praise she deserved, or if the other four took the glory to themselves.

At any rate, no one could take away her own satisfaction in overcoming and winning in the struggle.—Harriet Woodbridge, in "Birds and Nature."

A larger life still reigns!
Religion, drawing her essential force
Neither from nature's nor from reason's course,
O'er both the rule retains.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Vision of the Broad and of the Narrow Way.

The following experience or vision of a religiously inclined man, several years since deceased, is thought worthy a place in print:

"I looked toward the east and saw a great wilderness, and in a moment I was transferred thither and was walking in it. I soon came to the mouth of a cavern, which I entered and proceeded to explore. I had not gone far when I observed the light was growing dim, but regardless of danger I pressed onward. At length when I thought of returning, I found myself enveloped in total darkness. Thoroughly alarmed, I groped about in the darkness for a long time, trying to make my escape, but all in vain. At last, wearied out, I gave up in despair. At this moment my brother, who died at the age of nineteen years, stood by my side clothed in white raiment. Taking me by the hand, he said, 'Brother, you can never make your escape from this dark cavern by the way in which you entered it: go with me. So saying, he led me a little way in the opposite direction from that in which I had been going, and then pointing upward to a narrow crevice in the rock, far overhead in the roof of the cavern, through which the light was streaming, said, 'That is your only way of escape,' and then immediately vanished through this opening. I succeeded at last in climbing up the rocky sides of the cavern to the opening, and for a long time endeavored to force my body through, but found it impossible, the opening was so narrow. At length my footing gave way, and I hung suspended by the ends of my fingers over the rocky bed far beneath me. At this moment I cried out, 'Lord, save or I perish.' In a moment a hand was extended from above firmly clasping my own, and I was helped to make my escape, but not without having my clothes torn from my body, and yet I was unharmed. I now stood on a broad, firm rock by the side of my deliverer, and as I looked upon him I knew he was my Saviour. At my right was a mountain of solid white granite, almost perpendicular, and so high that its summit seemed to pierce the clouds. At the farther extremity of this mountain, which extended a great distance, I beheld a country of such surpassing beauty and loveliness that language would fail me to describe it. In the side of this mountain, starting from the rock on which I stood, throughout its entire length was hewn a narrow path. This path and all the mountain above it shone and glistened with a light that was like that of the sun, and yet I could see no sun but all below it was shrouded in total darkness. In this path I saw here and there a traveler. They all were clothed in white raiment and a soft halo of light encircled their heads.

"I longed to travel with them to that beautiful land, but the way was so narrow I feared to venture, and I saw there was no other way possible. The mountain could not be scaled, and the abyss below the path was so dark and terrible as to forbid the faintest ray of hope. Then I looked to the left, and a little way from where I stood I beheld a large circular lake—and over this lake hung a dark forbidding cloud that to a large extent excluded the light. I saw that the surface of the water was greatly agitated, and when my eyes became accustomed to the darkness I saw the cause. It was filled with human beings, who all seemed to be struggling in the agonies of death. Then I saw a very broad, smooth road leading down a gentle incline to this lake. It was filled with men and women walking in great haste toward the lake. I observed they were nearly all well and fashionably dressed, all being clothed in black, and as they came to the lake they plunged in, so that there was a never-ending and never-ceasing stream of humanity flowing into this lake every moment of time.

"The crowd was so great that they constantly jostled each other, and I wondered greatly when those who were behind saw the fate of their companions that none turned back. Sick at heart in beholding this terrible picture, I turned once more to the right, when my Deliverer addressed me as follows: 'Thou hast been rescued from the horrible pit and thy feet are upon the rock, but thou canst not remain here in idleness. The two ways are before thee—thou seest the travellers therein and their final destination. Choose which of these ways thou wilt walk.'"

[The Friend to whom we are indebted for the above relation writes: "I was well acquainted with the person [giving his name], all through his younger life, he having a birth-right in our Society, but never living near Friends or any Friends' meeting. Consequently he went with the Methodists for a time, but becoming uneasy with some of their practices he left them and was not in connection with any religious body, but an exemplary man, I am told, in the neighborhood where he lived. He sent this account to one of my sisters not long before his death, informing her that he had never showed it to any one, but felt like placing it in her hands, and she gives me the liberty of offering it to thee."]

THE WEATHER BUREAU ON LIGHTNING.—In view of the presence of the cyclonic period of the year when thunderstorms are of almost daily occurrence a report prepared by Prof. Henry of the United States Weather Bureau on the subject will be read with peculiar interest. It is unpleasant at the outset to note that the number of deaths from lightning stroke is increasing. For the year 1899 it was the largest on record. During the twelve months five hundred and sixty-two persons were killed instantly, or received such injuries as speedily resulted in their death. In addition eight hundred and twenty received shocks more or less severe, from which they ultimately recovered. Some of these recovery cases presented peculiar features. In several instances the clothing of the person struck was set on fire and their bodies were badly burned, yet they ultimately experienced complete recovery. In some of the fatal cases there was no outward injury visible, while in others discoloration of the skin was observable all over the body.

Some valuable hints are given in the report regarding the precautions that should be taken to avoid danger while a thunder-storm is in progress. Many housewives are partial to wire clothes-lines, and insist in having them strung across their back yards. By so doing they not only subject the laundress to danger, but imperil any building to which the wires may be attached. One dozen persons were killed last year either in the act of stripping such clothes-lines or by coming in close proximity to the wires during the storm. Several fires were started through wire clothes-lines being stretched between trees in the yard and the house. It is never wise to take shelter under a tree during a thunder-storm. About eleven per cent. of all deaths that occurred last year were caused in that way. People in the house during a storm should keep away from the chimney and should not sit between open doors or by open windows. Riders should dismount from their horses and stand as far from the trees as possible during the storm.—Chicago Evening Post (Eighth Month).

The Annatto Plant.

R. T. Clayton, United States Consul at Para, Brazil, states that the specific name Bixa (the annatto plant is the native name of the Indians of Darien, and the Brazilian name of the plant is urucuara, or-plant bearing urucu the latter being the Brazilian name of the pigment annatto. There are probably two species in Brazil, Bixa orellana and Bixa urucurana, the former being indigenous to the West Indies but the two are very much alike, and it is hard to say which species is grown in the Amazon Valley; probably both are found, but they resemble each other so closely that to the ordinary observer they are undistinguishable. The species usually considered as producing annatto is Bixa orellana. This species is a small tree or large shrub growing from fifteen to twenty-five feet in height, bushy from the root or forming a single stem. He has never known the plant to be met with growing wild though it is often many miles from any habitation, but it always marks the site of a farm house or plantation. The two species, or perhaps only varieties, grown in Brazil differ only in the color of the flower and fruit, which the one are pink and red, respectively, while the other has white flowers and greenish-yellow fruit. The coloring matter seems to be of the same shade in both, and there is no appreciable difference between the two kinds in the quantity produced.

The tree is cultivated in the whole Amazon Valley, and is always seen around the houses of the Indians. It appears to attain a great age, but never becomes very large; the trunk of the largest measure about eighteen inches in diameter at the base. Nor is any particular care required in its cultivation, further than to grow them in full sunshine, and to keep the plants when young quite free from weeds. Three years after they are propagated from seeds the plants begin to bloom. R. T. Clayton suggests that the plant might also be propagated by cuttings, a suggestion which seems to have a sound basis, for sometimes the plants grow so freely that they form suckers around the parent, making a dense bush with many stems. In Brazil the fruit matures rapidly after flowering, and is ready to gather in about two months; if gathered as soon as mature, the tree at once makes fresh growth, and flowers and fruits anew. The practice, however, is to allow the fruit to remain on the tree until wanted for use; it dries, and as the capsule does not readily burst, the seeds remain long in good condition. Within a few months the tree is again in bloom, and usually one sees flowers and both immature and mature fruit on the tree at the same time. With st careless culture two full crops can be gathered every year.

The preparation of the pigment is very simple. The seeds are macerated in water until the pulp, which is readily separated, is removed. The water is then passed through a strainer made of strands of palm to remove the seeds and fibre, and is then evaporated in the sun until the mass becomes thick. This mass is then rolled in leaves, producing roll annatto, which is evaporated to dryness and made into cakes, producing mass annatto. Sometimes the seed as taken from the pod is simply dried in the market and forms what is known as Urucu grao.

The pigment is extensively used by the Indians in dyeing the threads of hammocks and the wild Indians for painting their bodies, by mixing it with turtle-oil or the fat of the ce-bois (manatee). In Pará it is sometimes used to give color to cooked rice, but it is not used on the Amazon. An infusion of the leaves drunk hot is considered by the Indians a remedy for jaundice. From inquiries made on behalf of R. T. Clayton, it appears that there is no systematic cultivation of the annatto plant in the Amazon Valley between Pará and Guaitos. The tree grows freely near the villages, but the natives do not prepare the annatto unless for their own consumption.—Chemist and Druggist.

AND THIS LITTLE PIG STAYED AT HOME.—A New Jersey farmer tells this remarkable story and vouches for its truth: "I had more than I wanted to keep, so I sold one to a man living in the neighboring village. The pig had been living in the pen with his brothers and sisters, and had never been out of it until the man who bought him put it in a basket, tied down the cover and put it on his wagon to carry to the new home. Late in the afternoon the farmer who sold it saw something coming across the swamp meadow toward his home. He watched it struggling through the wet places, climbing the knolls, until he could see that it was his little pig, all covered with mud and very tired. He went straight toward the barn, against which was the only place he recognized. The money was returned to the man who bought it, and the little pig stayed at home."

Faith in Ice.

A convert came to a missionary on the west coast of Africa, and said: "Teacher, what are these sailors here! Why, one of them told me to-day that up in his country, at the end of the year when it is hottest down here, the earth becomes solid and they walk across the snow just as we walk on the land. I can't believe any such yarns as that, and I told him so. Then he said, 'Go ask your teacher!' " "What should the missionary do? He could not explain to that untutored savage the law according to which liquids are solidified by cold. He could not even make him understand what cold was. And yet he must not tell him a lie. The savage had faith in him, and he believed the gospel story when he told it, and he had accepted the unseen Christ as his Saviour. So he replied: "Brother, what the teacher told you about water becoming ice is true. I have seen it. I have walked on it."

This is a big world that we live in, and there are a great many things in the different parts of it. You must not think that it is everywhere just like it is here on the Gaboon."

The dusky listener looked at his teacher at first with wonder. He could hardly believe that he heard aright. Then, as one waking from a dream, he cried: "If you say it is so it must be so. I know that you are wise and good. You would not, you could not, deceive me. Strange as it seems, unreasonable, incredible, I will doubt no longer. I am certain now that there is a place where water becomes ice and men can walk on it."

Now, that converted African was right in taking the word of the missionary. He had such faith in him that he could not doubt the truth of anything he taught, no matter how strange and even impossible it seemed. And yet there are men who will not believe God unless they can comprehend and demonstrate the truth of what He says.—Herald and Presbyterian.

OUR SERVICE NOT COMPLETED.—Once more the Friends are asking themselves whether they have not yet a mission and a message to deliver to the world, and to many there appears to lie before them a field white already unto harvest. We cannot predict what the future may have in store, but whether the next awakening of mankind shall come from the Society of Friends, or from newer seekers after the deep things of God, who may present his truth in some form more easily appreciated by the modern spirit, I firmly believe that the essence of the teaching must centre around the same fundamental doctrine of the Spirit of the Creator making itself felt in the soul of each one of his creatures, guiding, restraining, and leading into all truth. Names matter little. Call it, as the early Friends did, indifferently, "the power of God unto salvation," "the indwelling Christ," "the inward Light of the Holy Spirit," or, if you will, "the power within us, not ourselves, which makes for righteousness." If men, as George Fox said, will cease to dispute concerning it, and strive only to obey it, then the world may at last realize that ideal church which shall combine perfect catholicity with perfect individual liberty and perfect mutual care and responsibility; a church in which the bond of union shall not be intellectual but spiritual; not exact agreement in dogma, but in the presence of a spiritual life—the Almighty ruling in his kingdom on earth as in heaven.—Australian Friend.

WE have all set up rows of bricks or blocks, to watch the first one which we push topple down all the rest; it is so with the first falsehood, the first glass, or the first impure thought. Don't knock down the first brick.

Items Concerning the Society.

On a public occasion in a Friends' meeting-house in Philadelphia last week, twenty-seven recorded ministers are said to have been present; and at Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting, held at Moorestown, eighteen recorded ministers. At a recent gathering by the invitation of the ministers and elders of Western District Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia, extended to all who have at times spoken in its meetings for worship, no less than thirty-three of that class were counted.

Another continuance of six months has been given to the Friends' meeting, held at Merchantville, N. J., under the care of a committee of Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting. The constancy of a few, though not members in attending that little meeting, as well as of the three or four members, is a comforting example, which has been responded to by an equal constancy of members of the committee in coming often long distances to meet with them. May the Master of assemblies crown all their faithfulness with satisfying increase!

In Haverford Meeting, last week, President Hyde, of Bowdoin College, is said to have addressed the students and others very impressively on the superior value of Friends' manner of public worship, as compared with the usual church attendance everywhere for the hearing of a minister or other human voices. A company gathered in devout silence, for communion with the Father of spirits was acknowledged to be an impressive sight and an instructive testimony, and it would be well for gathered churches to enter into that practice more extensively.

The following letter has been addressed by the Western District Monthly Meeting to its members. Its exhortation is applicable to a wider range,—wherever among Friends there are mid-week or other stated meetings for worship besides those of First-day mornings:

"This meeting having taken into consideration the marked difference in the attendance of our First-day evening meetings for worship as compared with those of the morning hour, desires to commend our evening meetings, especially to those who have overlooked the privilege and importance of attending them. We feel encouraged by the increase of late in the attendance on these occasions and bear witness that the meetings held at 7.30 P. M. have been particularly blessed in their solidity and helpfulness. We record it as our judgment that if Friends will persevere in their attendance at these times, though at some personal sacrifice, they will feel amply rewarded for their faithfulness, and we earnestly appeal to our members, seriously to consider whether they can afford to absent themselves voluntarily from such opportunities for inward communion and spiritual development.

Our time is the Lord's, and to Him we must account for it. Let us use it to his glory and in his service by assembling for his worship oftener than once on that day on which we are released from business cares and duties. And in the living opportunities of our evening meetings, we shall gather inspiration and strength for the responsibilities and labors of the coming week."

Notes From Others.

General Breckinridge estimates that the expense of each soldier to the Government in time of peace is $700; in time of war $1000.

There are 23, 778 young men in the medical colleges of the United States; less than half as many—11,874—in the law schools, and only about one-third as many—8261—in the theological seminaries.

It is becoming a question who will be reckoned as the real barbarians of this age by the future historians, whether the Christian (!) nations or the untutored inhabitants of the jungles.—Christian Instructor.

The only place in which the United States, as a nation, can intervene to protect the lives of black men is in the Philippines. Our soldiers there habitually describe their present occupation as "nigger-killing."—The Nation.

The Presbyterian Witness sharply remarks:

"Ritualism abhors 'private judgment,' and the universal priesthood of believers. It wants a return to the religious thought and practice of the Dark Ages, and to bring the Church of England into submission to the Church of Rome. Whatever becomes of the Anglican clergy it is very certain that the English people will never submit themselves to the rule of an alien or a native priest-caste. At least they cannot do so till they have flung away their New Testaments."

The French Government is tiring of priestly domination. The recent declaration of its policy toward the Roman Catholic Church by Waldeck-Rousseau, is a revelation to many, and must have a far-reaching influence. He calls it to account for training up one-half of the Republic to manhood in such a way that "it cannot mix with other citizens as citizens. It raises an exclusive class which works to its own advantage and to the disadvantage of the State." In future it is proposed to curtail and limit the acquisition of property by religious congregations and not to admit those who have been educated after the 'clerical methods' into the public service.

Desperate moral conditions of society require radical measures to correct them. Satan will never be converted. He is the active cancer on society. He must be cast out before there can be moral health.

It is truth, not soft sentimentalities, that bring reformation. It was truth, not music, that pierced the heart of Luther with convictions of sin, and led to the Reformation. It was the light from heaven that struck Saul blind and helpless on the way to Damascus and led to his ministry, by which the world has been made better in all ages. Why are men so reluctant to resort to the power of God for the salvation of man from all his corruptions? They will hunt in vain for a substitute. Their labor will be in vain till they return to the old paths of God's word for the salvation of the world.—Christian Instructor.

The marriage of Anna Gould to the spendthrift Frenchman may have been a love match, but it has certainly been a very expensive affair. The Count Castellane and his wife have made the Jay Gould millions fly, and, had not a halt been called, it would not have been many years before the wife's share of the immense fortune would have entirely disappeared. Their extravagances have been limitless, and when one London bric-a-brac dealer has a claim of nearly half a million of dollars against them some idea of their reckless waste of money can be obtained.

How much better are the views of Helen Gould, a sister of the Countess, on the best use of wealth. The American published recently a letter from her on this subject, in which she said:

"The Christian idea that wealth is a stewardship or trust, and not to be used for one's personal pleasure alone, but for the welfare of others, certainly seems the noblest; and those who have more money or broader culture owe a debt to those who have had fewer opportunities. And there are so many ways one can help."—Baltimore American.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A proposed treaty with England to facilitate the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, has engaged the attention of the Senate for several days. It has been much altered in that body by amendments.

Some changes in the joint note of the Powers to China has occasioned delay in the negotiations. A dispatch from Washington, says: Instructions were cabled to Minister Conger to accept the change suggested. The authorities are very much concerned over the seeming unwillingness of Great Britain and Germany to close the negotiations. The Administration has decided to leave to the Ministers in Peking the decision as to the amount of indemnity. It is thought it will not exceed $200,000,000, and will be divided among the Powers in accordance with the damage sustained and the expenses undergone. In case of failure to agree the matter will be referred to The Hague Conference for determination.

Robt. W. Wilcox, of Hawaii, a delegate to Congress from three islands, has taken his seat in the House of Representatives. He has the swarthy skin of a native Hawaiian and speaks with a slight native accent. It is said he will propose some changes in the Hawaiian law, including an amendment, whereby the Hawaiian language may be used in the courts as well as the English language.

The officials of the Weather and Hydrographic Departments of the Government assert as a general proposition, the rainfall is no greater or less, and the streams of the country, except in rare instances, carry as much water as they did when white men first settled along their banks. This theory of an unchangeable average advanced by the water experts is sustained by the records of every part of the world, no matter how far back they may go. In every section where man has been afforded an opportunity of observation it is found that there is a normal average of rainfall, which, however exceeded in one period of years, will be maintained in a following period by an equal decrease. European observations extend back several centuries, long enough to cause the weather experts to admit the possibility of drawing accurate deductions, and in even the comparatively brief time covered by observations in the United States the European experience has been repeated in succeeding periods of drought and moisture.

A dispatch from Washington says that the recent experiments with mosquito inoculation have been entirely successful in 80 per cent. of the cases under treatment. These experiments are being conducted by Dr. Read and other surgeons of the army near Havana. They are based upon conclusions reached by Major Read and other medical officers recently appointed to conduct scientific investigations with reference to the acute infectious diseases prevalent in Cuba. So far the inoculation has been confined to Spanish immigrants intending to settle in Cuba and desirous of making themselves immune to yellow fever. These persons have voluntarily presented themselves for inoculation with a full understanding of the nature of the experiment.

The world's output of gold for the calendar year 1899 was $306,584,900. The production of the United States was $71,053,400, a great increase over the preceding year.

Two gigantic skeletons of the extinct species of lizard, called the Dinosaurus, have been lately found near Fort Meade, South Dakota. One is in perfect preservation and is part of an animal forty feet long.

Some at least of the great redwood trees of California will be preserved, the State having recently come into possession of about four hundred acres of redwood forest through the will of the late J. B. Armstrong, of Cloverdale, Sonoma county. The tract is to be held as a public park.

Telephoning without wires has been accomplished by transmitting the voice across the Mississippi River, near Minneapolis, a distance of over 1000 feet.

There were 369 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 7 less than the previous week and 76 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 206 were males and 163 females: 47 died of consumption of the lungs; 55 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 14 of diphtheria; 15 of cancer; 12 of apoplexy, and 4 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 10¢ per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.30 to $2.50; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.25 to $3.40; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.60; spring, straight, $3.50 to $3.55; city mills, straight, $3.45 to $3.60.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 73½ to 73¾c.
No. 2 mixed corn, 42 to 42½c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 31c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Best, 5¼ to 5½c.; good, 5 to 5¼c.; medium, 4¾ to 4¾c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Choice, 4½ to 4¾c.; good, 3¾ to 4c.; common, 2 to 2½c.; spring lambs, 4½ to 6½c.

HOGS.—Best Western, 7 to 7½c.

FOREIGN.—A general state of anarchy is reported to exist in China, and numerous encounters have taken place between the Boxers and the European troops, attended with loss of life. A despatch from Peking says: "The Russians have purchased $700,000 worth of rice, which is being given to destitute Chinese. General Chaffee, the American commander, is also having a large amount of rice issued, and the other nations are displaying liberality. DeGiers, the Russian Envoy, says that Russia is making no exception in favor of Christians, because the latter have the least needs."

A despatch from Paris says: "By order of the Government a number of cases filled with Chinese loot, sent to President Loubet and others by General Frey (commander of the French marine force in China), will be embargoed at Marseilles when they are unshipped. This action of the Government of France is evidently an outcome of the protest of General Chaffee against looting, which called attention to the fact that the military forces were spoiling China of works of art. The Government has come to the conclusion that the articles in the cases cannot be considered prizes of war, and that, therefore, they do not belong to the soldiers who seized them."

An ex-German Court Chaplain says the Emperor of China has incurred the enmity of the Dowager Empress by accepting the Christian faith.

Secret societies in China threaten an uprising to drive out all foreigners.

An exploration by Prof. Markgraf, of the Yenesei Obi Valleys in Siberia, has lately been made which disproves the commonly accepted notion that the Siberian plain grows more and more flat as one approaches the Northern Ocean. He found the exact contrary true, the coast country being rugged and in places almost mountainous. There are forests of leafy trees to the edge of the sea, and Prof. Markgraf believes 2,000,000 boards could easily be cut out by water every summer. There is an abundance of fish and excellent grazing for cattle. There are no roads and the building of railways is advised.

During the unprecedented rainfall at Calcutta in the third week of Ninth Month 12 people were killed and 182 buildings, besides 409 huts, fell to pieces. The rainfall one week was 45 inches.

According to reports presented to the English Parliament there have been 15,625 cases of typhoid fever among the British troops in South Africa, of which 3,300 proved fatal.

General Kitchener, the British commander in South Africa, reports the defeat of General Clements' forces by the Boers in the Transvaal, and that 555 men are missing from the British troops. General Kitchener is reported to have sent a fresh and urgent request to the Government to send out every available mounted man. Subsequently fighting appears to have taken place, in which the Boers lost heavily.

In thirty-two years there have been granted by Parliament and the courts but 271 divorces in the whole Dominion of Canada. There has not been a divorce in Prince Edward Island, population 100,000, in thirty years.

The Gokteik viaduct, in the Shan Hills of British India, the highest railroad bridge in the world, has just been completed by the Pennsylvania Steel Company and formally handed over to the Burmah Railway Company.

Thirty bridges in Africa are to be built by American companies, the contracts for which are said to require 135,000 tons of steel.

During the year 1899 no fewer than 3607 vessels, with 221,000 passengers, passed through the Suez Canal. Of these 2726 were merchant ships, 736 mail steamers and 145 warships and transports.

A balloon fitted with automatic instruments was sent up recently in Paris and came down safely. The instrument showed that it had risen to 56,000 feet, or over 100 miles. At that height the temperature outside the balloon was 102 degrees below zero.

The largest match factory in the world is the Valmuth match factory, at Tidaholm, Sweden. It employs nearly 1200 men, and manufactures daily 900,000 boxes of matches.

Railways use up over 2,000,000 tons of steel a year, and most half the world's product.

NOTICES.

SARAH T. SMITH has been appointed agent for THE FRIEND, in place of Sarah Huestis, released at her own request. Address, Chester Hill, Morgan Co., Ohio.

TIME CHANGED FOR HOLDING MEETING AT WEST CHESTER, PA.—With the approval of Concord Quarterly Meeting held at Media, Eleventh Month 13th, 1900, of a religious concern of Thos. H. Whitsom, a meeting for worship is appointed to be held in Friends' Meeting-house, at West Chester, on First-day, the sixth of First Month, 1900, at 2.30 p. m., at which Friends and especially the young members are invited to be present.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage will train leaving Philadelphia 7.16 and 8.18 A. M., and at 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when required. Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., twenty cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph Westtown Station or West Chester, Phone 85.

EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, S. C.

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting-house, Whittier, Lincoln, Iowa, on the twenty-second of Fifth Month, 1900, A. HOWELL MOTT, son of Richard and Sara Mott, of Iowa, and CAROLINE EMBREE, daughter of Samuel and Mary Ann Embree, of the former place.

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 29, 1900.

No. 24.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,

No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,
PHILADELPHIA.

South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth.)

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

The Priesthood of Days.

Superstition consists in expecting from things made by the Creator powers that ought to be expected directly from God alone. "The invisible things of Him,—even his eternal power and godhead,"—are, indeed, in some measure understood by the things that are made, by those who 'look up through nature unto nature's God;' but those supernatural powers do not proceed from the things that are made. It is to things, chiefly externals, that superstition looks, as being themselves charged with modes of supernatural efficacy,—for instance articles called charms, magic characters, figures, gestures, formulas, attitudes, mysteriously treated liquids, selected days and times, and so on,—till there is, perhaps, not a questionable created thing from which some supernatural virtue, grace, or power has not been looked for by some human beings.

If we may venture to distinguish between superstition and idolatry, we may observe that idolatry looks upon certain things as gods. It constitutes real or imagined things or beings as the true God; while Superstition ascribes to things some special divine powers above nature. One can be superstitious without being necessarily an idolater, but he cannot be an idolater without being superstitious. As soon as Superstition worships an object that is made, it becomes Idolatry, and the object an idol. The idol may be visible or invisible, outward or inward; a creature, a quality, or a conception in itself good, bad, or indifferent. Yet so that in heart or worship it usurps the place of the Creator himself, it becomes an idol.

Certain conventional days are defended as objects of devout observance, because of the graces and benevolent qualities of heart which they are supposed to inspire. No matter if Christmas-time was observed under other names, the days began to lengthen in the year, and by seasons however heathen, long before the advent of Christ personally on earth; no matter whether the day is of Scriptural appointment or not, we will cherish it, say its advocates, for the good-cheer, the unselfishness, the thankfulness, and other graces that it is charged with, and that come out of it. "No matter if 'Thanksgiving Day' is of human appointment, we will observe it for the spirit of thanksgiving that we ought to get from it. No matter if Fast Day is appointed by the same governor's proclamation, we will—well, that is a self-denying day, and so we forgot to remember it." This virtually has been the language of conduct or of speech.

The point is, that wherever a day is depended on for grace, that attitude of mind is a superstition. For a day is the source or giver of no grace, but God is "the Author of all grace." "We cannot command one of the days of the Son of Man," nor one of his graces, nor reduce a single fruit of the Spirit by injunction. We cannot have love to order, joy by adjournment, peace by prescription, praise by announcing the number of a hymn, prayer by a man's call to lead therein, or thanksgiving as the creature of a day. These, all, in their own seasons, are the immediate gift and inspiration of the Holy One,—good and perfect gifts coming "down from the Father of lights" to hearts that have been so doing his will as to be open to his in-breathing and inspeaking. "My times are in thy hands," that thou mayst rightly divide thy word unto my soul's condition, as thou givest to each his portion in due season. "My soul, wait thou only upon God; for my expectation is from Him." While this is the believer's attitude of spirit, as his days so shall his strength be, so shall his experience and observance of the birth of Christ be, so shall his testimony be that "Christ is indeed come, and has given him an understanding, to know Him that is true." He will not regard a day as sacerdotal, or a Mediator of grace, usurping the place of Him who is declared to be the "One Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus." No day, or created thing or man, should intervene between the soul and God to rob Christ of his own place as the Mediator,—with us "all the days, even unto the end of the world,—and through his Apostle warning the Judaizing Church, "Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years. I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed labor upon you in vain. Now after that ye have known God, how turn ye back again to the weak and beggarly rudiments whereunto ye desire to be in bondage over again?" (Gal. iv. 9: 10).

Some Account of the Early Experience and Subsequent Travels of Ruth Newlin.

(Continued from page 180.)

"My pen cannot describe the consoling peace I was favored to enjoy last evening and night. I thought perhaps I might look toward home to-day. But this morning I felt as if my work (or rather the work I am entrusted with) is not done in this part of the land. Had a meeting appointed at Americus at three o'clock this evening where there never was but one Friends' meeting before. We were a little late. The people mostly gathered in the house as quiet as at a Friends' meeting. And I believe the Great Head of the Church was pleased to own our assembly. Thou hast cause, Oh my soul, to bow down with reverence before that Almighty Being who has been thy support in all thy trials and close provings, in leading thee about among his visited children.

"22nd.—Last evening before our meeting broke the way seemed clear for us to have a meeting at Toledo which was well attended by Friends and others. I believe many hearts rejoiced that the Lord is still mindful of the workmanship of his holy hand in this part of the land.

"23rd.—Oh! how miserable and distressed I feel this morning. No one to blame but myself. Oh self! how loth to submit to the cross and how hard to subdue. Night before last while at Toledo it seemed as plain as spoken words: 'Go to Emporia and tarry not.' This was a little town ten miles from where we were and six miles beyond Cottonwood meeting, where we expected to attend at their usual hour the next day, which would make twelve miles travel, for what I could not see, 'Go to Emporia' this evening was repeated. Yet I queried and reasoned it away. It looked so foolish for us to make this extra traveling, when we could take it as it came. I consented to stop, yet I felt so depressed that I retired and tried to make the best of it I could in my own reasoning way. My companion came to me and said he felt like going on if I was not easy to stay. Here the way was made easy for me, yet I tried to satisfy him and myself with the same reasons. My companion, Hannah Chantry, was taken very sick and I passed an almost sleepless night. He who does not keep his anger forever will in his own good time speak peace to my poor tried soul when he sees that it is sufficiently humbled under its weight of sin and corruption. Went to Cottonwood meeting in much weakness and fear, leaving my sick companion with a good nurse. The attendance was good. The silence was sweet to my soul, for I thought, Not one here has more need of a renewal of spiritual strength than myself. But very soon found that my peace consisted in obedience to the Divine will, and though much in the cross to my natural mind, I endeavored to be faithful and was favored to return to our boarding-place in peace and found my companion better. [They afterward learned that a troop of soldiers was at Emporia the night Ruth was so impressed to go there, which was the only interpretation they could apply to the call, but they had moved on by the time they reached the place.]

"24th.—This has been a day of close trial to me. Almost ready to sink down under the weight of my sins and backslidings. Dear H. C. is gaining, though not able to travel. The spirit of heaviness is my portion.

"26th.—Awoke this morning with a quiet, peaceful mind. Praise the Lord, Oh! my soul, for this deliverance from the hand of despair! This is the third meeting I have attended at Cottonwood. To be detained calls for patience. I have many things to learn in the school of Christ.

"27th.—I believe we were much favored at meeting yesterday, after which we took a solemn leave of many precious Friends to whom we were nearly attached in Christian fellowship. In the evening my mind was drawn to visit a family a few miles off the road, which I gave up to, and peace was my reward.

"28th.—I feel my mind relieved, and clear permission to return homeward. How wonderful are thy ways, oh! Lord; past finding out!

My way seems closed up before me. No call to turn back, and to stand still is a great cross, having thought for some time past that there is distress at home, either in my family or in the neighborhood. After the Scripture reading I became entirely resigned to stay or do anything that my heavenly Father required of me. Soon after the sun appeared clear and the dark, misty clouds were dispelled, and we had a meeting appointed at Emporia at five o'clock, which was said to be a favored one. Though I did not feel relieved as at some other times.

"29th.—Had a sick night and am in a poor condition for traveling. We came forty-seven miles yesterday, which was rather much for me. We are all anxious to get home, and are favored with peaceful minds.

"30th.—Traveled twenty miles yesterday, put up at a Friend's house for dinner. Endeavored to take a little rest. I have been too anxious to get home for the good of my health. There are a few Friends here, but the things of this world seem to have the uppermost seat in their hearts. I was so depressed that I could not take much rest, so left them with a heavy heart. We have traveled over very rough country to-day, and crossed the Kansas river the fourth time since we have been in the State. Crossed the Delaware reserve which is a beautiful tract of land. Ate dinner on the grass by the side of a little brook, as we have done many times since on this journey.

"31st. At a very indifferent inn last night. Not able to travel till nine o'clock. Came ten miles and took dinner at our kind friend's, Benjamin Ball's.

"First of Sixth Month. In leaving the city of Atchinson, we passed the Methodist meeting-house, where we had the first meeting in this State. My soul is bowed as at the feet of Jesus in thankfulness for the many blessings extended to us on this journey. O, merciful Father, thou hast been my guide in a strange land. My staff when weakness prevailed; my comforter when storms did almost overwhelm. This evening we crossed the Missouri at St. Joseph, into a State of slavery bonds and chains and cruel taskmasters. Oh! Father, hasten the day when the poor African can say, I am chained no longer.

"Second of Sixth Month, 1861.—First-day morning. Staid at a slave-holder's house last night. I do feel for this poor, down-trodden people, who seem to look upon us as if we were higher beings than they. I felt like taking as little of their labor for my comfort as possible. Scattered a few tracts among those who seem to have little to do. The man of the house was so excited about the war that his conversation was very uncomfortable to our feelings; we were glad when the time came to start on our journey. Our carriage seems more like home to us.

"4th.—Stayed at—'s last night. They are members of our Society remotely situated, so they cannot attend meeting. Many for the sake of gain in this world's goods, settle themselves so distant that they cannot attend a place of worship, and by so doing, grow colder and colder toward their soul's interest; so much so, that it can be felt at the very entrance of the door.

"Fifth of Sixth Month.—I was very sick last night, yet my mind is so peaceful that I am entirely resigned.

"6th.—We traveled only twelve miles yesterday on account of my ill-health.

"7th.—We traveled near thirty-eight miles yesterday, and reached the house of John Ramsey, only to find it wrapped in mourning. Dear Dorcas is prostrated on a bed of sickness, and kind friends doing all they can for the poor, sinking frame. I never can forget while I retain my faculties the solicitude she manifested in my behalf after I was seated in the carriage to start on this journey. She took my hand in hers and pressing it as a tender mother parting with a child, 'Dear Ruth, it is a trial for us to part. I feel like I must say to thee, if I never should see thee again, that I greatly desire thy welfare. Be faithful and entirely willing to do all thy Master calls for at thy hands, so thou may return to thy dear children and Friends with the reward of peace.'

"8th.—Our dear Friend is weaker. She asked me when I first came home if I would not stay with her as much as I could, while she lived. She said she had prayed to live till I came home. It was our Quarterly Meeting and with her consent I went; when we arrived at the meeting-house, I had the great pleasure of meeting my dear aged father, who was moving to this country. Dear father and all his living children met after a separation of eight years.

I cannot describe my feelings of thankfulness on being permitted to return home to my dear children and Friends, and above all with the unmerited reward of peace.

"12th.—Attended Monthly Meeting and returned my minute.

"Fourteenth of Sixth Month, 1861.—My dear Friend Dorcas Ramsey quietly passed away without a struggle, and all around is clothed in deep mourning, but we believe our loss is her eternal gain."

(To be continued.)

All thy children shall be taught of God.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Friends and Politics.

I have noticed some articles in THE FRIEND that seem to me to encourage Friends in mixing up with the people of the world in political strife. We may have Christ without politics and we may have politics without Christ, but we cannot have both party politics and Christ at the same time.

Early Friends tried that in the government of Pennsylvania; but as soon as party politics were suffered to come in, although the State was in its infancy, that spirit was strong enough to overthrow their peaceable government.

And to-day it is strong enough to overthrow the peaceable reign of Christ wherever it is suffered to come into the hearts of his children. And I have noticed with sorrow, that whenever Friends join in party strife, instead of raising politics to a higher plane, it has lowered the spiritual life to a level with or beneath that of other professing religious denominations.

R. H.

The Social Secretary.

Before the industrial revolution, when enterprises were small and master and man worked together, it was easy for the employer to know not only the men in his shop, but the families also. Cases of sickness, accident or death were sure to come to his attention. So disposed, he had every opportunity to be personally helpful to those in his employ.

The rise of the factory, however, and the development of the corporation and the trust have almost eliminated the personal element from our industrial system. The interests of business have become so vast and varied that the work of administration monopolizes the time and strength of those who are responsible for it. No matter how well disposed the officials may be, they cannot know personally the many hundreds, and even thousands, in their employ, nor can they give much time to the study of the physical, intellectual and moral welfare of their operatives. Hence the estrangement of the employer and his employees, the impression that their interests are separate, and even antagonistic, and the result of misunderstanding and mutual suspicion becomes easy.

These new conditions have created a new need,—that of one who can devote his whole time to becoming acquainted with the employees and promoting their general welfare; one who looks after sanitary conditions, seeks to increase the general intelligence, fosters a healthful social life, and strives to improve the general morale.

There is a rising demand for a new profession, adapted to both sexes. A year ago an interview with the secretary of the League published in the New York Tribune, pointed out the above mentioned need, and christened the new profession as that of the "social secretary." This suggestion, like a handful of seed tossed into the air, was scattered as by the four winds, and took root in several different states. Already has it been demonstrated that the social secretary is a good business investment, and the prophecy of a year ago that the time would come when such a secretary would be an indispensable adjunct of every well-pointed establishment gives promise of speedy fulfillment.—Social Service, 11th Month, 1900.

The Business Man's Prayer.

In a foreign exchange we noticed the other day an interesting incident in connection with the Earl of Hopetown. He had an heirloom which he prized highly. It was an old brass-bound, leather covered ledger. It belonged to the founder of his family, John Hope, who resided in the High Street of Edinburgh, Scotland, more than two hundred years ago. What made so precious to the possessor was not so much its antiquity and quaintness and personal association, as the following prayer which appeared its first entry: "O Lord, keep me and this book honest."

That old Scottish worthy had a true conception of the situation. He saw that without God's help he could not live and do business honestly. The temptations in commercial life are enormous, and it needed a strong conscience, a resolute soul and a pure spirit to rise above them. He wanted no stain upon his character, and no record on his ledger that would not bear the closest scrutiny, and so he made his prayer for divine guidance and help, and it might constantly remind him of his duty.

Two centuries have elapsed since he prayed for an honest life and an honest ledger, and the need for them has not diminished by the lapse of time. Never was business so exacting in its demands. Competition presses on every side. Slow gains are discounted. There is a haste to be rich. The tendency is to achieve success at all hazards. Little regard is paid to the means employed. Men are ready to take advantage of time and place. Selfish interests dominate. The main chance is largely the governing motive.

Coming in contact with it, the man of probity runs many a risk and experiences much difficulty in adhering to his principles in all his transactions. It requires both courage and determination to stand by his moral convictions. Honesty has many a battle to fight with greed before it becomes a life-force. Many persons think when they start in trade that it is an easy thing to buy and sell honestly and yet make money, but they soon come in contact with the sharper who gets ahead of them. This discourages them, and they begin to think that if they are not to be left behind, they will have to adopt his methods. Advisers tell them that they are not up to the times, and that business is business. Refined moral objections in commercialism are out of place. That bargaining counts. If you want to forge to the front and succeed, you must not only keep up with the shrewdest, but improve on their plans. It is the glory of numbers that they turn a deaf ear to the tempting voices that would lure them from their integrity; but many say, "This is business and I must do so particular about the morality of what I do, and so gradually succumb to the maxims of the world and resort to tricks, subterfuges and practices that at one time would have shocked them. Hundreds who are honest in their hearts, and everything else will take any advantage that comes to a bargain.

Divine grace is always needful if one is to be manly and upright; it is imperatively required for the moral safety of those who are in the rush and competitions of trade in our daily life. It is not necessary to write one's prayer for special help in his ledger, but he should offer it in his closet at the beginning of each day's labor and should allow his soul to go up silently in his counting-room, or by the wayside, in seasons of special temptation, or in hours of pressing trial. He who takes God into partnership in all his enterprises and conducts his affairs in an honorable and upright way may not make the most money, but he will have no regrets on his death-bed over others wronged, and no dishonest gains to trouble him at heaven's bar. Christianity calls for the honest man and the honest ledger.—Presbyterian.

The Pacific's Bottom.

For the last year or two the Government has been diligently conducting surveys in the Pacific Ocean, with the object of determining the most feasible route for a cable connecting the United States with the Philippine Islands.

Some new and very interesting facts have been discovered by these surveyors, and a more comprehensive knowledge has been gained of the country which lies beneath the waters of the Pacific, between the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippines. Last year, for example, a new submarine abyss, deeper than anything hitherto known, was discovered, and at the time the bottom, could not be sounded. This year, the spot, which has been named Nero Deep, was again visited, with greater success, for bottom was found, though at the enormous depth of 5269 fathoms, or 31,614 feet. This abyss is of great extent.

According to the annual report of Rear Admiral Bradford, there is an almost level plain of soft mud of a nearly uniform depth of 2700 fathoms, extending from Honolulu to the Midway Islands, and another about five hundred fathoms deeper between the latter and Guam, broken by submarine reefs and mountain ranges. In this territory, also, was discovered a huge, isolated mountain, which rose to within eighty-two fathoms of the surface.

From a scientific standpoint one of the most interesting discoveries made was that of a submarine mountain range about five hundred knots from Guam, which apparently connects with the one which extends from the coast of Japan to the Bonin Islands. In this range was found a single peak which came to within four hundred and ninety-eight feet of the surface, and a careful survey of it developed the fact that it closely resembles in outline the famous volcano, Fujiyama, near Yokohama, Japan. To the north of this range, according to the report, the bed of the ocean slopes gradually to the eastward into the great Japanese Deep, which for years held the record for ocean depths. It is this great range which seems to be the chief obstacle to the establishment of a successful cable line. If a way can be found to cross it, there is said to be a fine plateau, broken here and there by unimportant reefs, which extends all the way to the Philippine Islands, which will afford an ideal resting place for a cable.—Phila. Ledger.

ARCHBISHOP LEIGHTON feeling very unwell, was persuaded by his family not to go to meeting, he answered, "Had the day been fine, I would allow my ill-health to keep me at home, but as it is stormy, I must go, lest I be thought to countenance by my example, the irreligious practice of letting trivial hindrances keep us back from public worship."

A Touching Incident of Real Life.

"Prisoner at the bar, have you anything to say why sentence of death shall not be passed upon you?"

A solemn hush fell over the crowded court room; not a whisper was heard anywhere and the situation had become painfully oppressive when the prisoner was seen to move; his head was raised, his hands were clenched and the blood rushed into his pale, care-worn face; his teeth were firmly set and into his haggard eyes came a flash of light. Suddenly he rose to his feet, and in a firm, low voice, said: "I have, your honor; you have asked me a question, and I ask, as the last favor on earth, that you will not interrupt my answer until I am through. I stand here before this bar convicted of the wilful murder of my wife. Truthful witnesses have testified to the fact that I was a loafer, a drunkard and a wretch; that I returned from a long debauch and fired the fatal shot that killed the wife I had sworn to love, cherish and protect. While I have no remembrance of committing the fearful, cowardly and inhuman deed, I have no right to complain or condemn the verdict of the twelve good men who have acted as jurors in this case, for their verdict is in accordance with the evidence. But, may it please the court, I wish to show that I am not alone responsible for the murder of my wife."

This startling statement created a tremendous sensation. "I repeat, your honor that I am not the only one guilty of the murder of my wife. The judge on his bench, the jury in the box, the lawyers, and pastor of the church, are also guilty before Almighty God, and will have to appear with me before his judgment throne where we all shall be righteously judged.

"If twenty men conspire to the murder of one person, the law power of this land will arrest the twenty and each will be tried and convicted for the whole murder, and not one twentieth of the crime. I have been made a drunkard by law. If it had not been for the legalized saloons of my town I never would have become a drunkard; my wife would not have been murdered; and I would not be here now, ready to be hurled into eternity. Had it not been for the human traps set out by the consent of the government, I would have been a sober man, a tender father, and a loving husband. But to-day my home is destroyed, my wife murdered, my little children—God bless and care for them—cast on the mercy of a cold and cruel world, while I am to be murdered by the strong arm of the State. God knows I tried to reform, but as long as the open saloon was in my pathway, my weak, diseased will power was no match against the fearful, consuming, agonizing appetite for liquor. For one year my wife and children were supremely happy and our little home was a perfect paradise. I was one of those who signed a remonstrance against re-opening the saloons in our town. The names of one-half the jury can be found to-day on the petition certifying to the good characters of the rumsellers, and falsely stating that the sale of liquor was necessary in our town.

"The prosecuting attorney in this case was the one who so eloquently pleaded with this court for the licenses, and the judge who sits on this bench and who asked me if I had anything to say before sentence of death was passed upon me, granted the license. I began my downward career at the saloon bar—legalized and protected by the votes of this commonwealth—which has received annually a part of the blood money from the poor, deluded victims.

"After the State had made me a drunkard and a murderer, I am taken before another bar—the bar of justice (?) by the same power of law that legalized the first bar, and now the law-power will conduct me to the place of execution and hasten my soul into eternity. I shall appear before another bar—the judgment bar of God—and there you who have legalized the traffic will have to appear with me. Think you that the Great Judge will hold me, the poor, helpless victim of your traffic, alone responsible for the murder of my wife? Nay, I in my drunken, frenzied condition have murdered one, but you have deliberately and wilfully murdered your thousands, and the murder mills are in full operation to-day with your consent. All of you know in your hearts that these words of mine are not the ravings of an unsound mind, but God's truth.

"The liquor traffic of this nation is responsible for nearly all the murders, bloodshed, riots, poverty, misery, wretchedness and woe. It breaks up thousands of happy homes every year, sends the husband and father to prison or the gallows, and drives countless mothers and little children into the world to suffer and die. It furnishes nearly all the criminal business of this and every other court, and blasts every community it touches. You legalized the saloon that made me a drunkard and a murderer, and you are guilty with me before God and man for the murder of my wife. Your honor, I am done. I am now ready to receive my sentence and he led forth to the place of execution and be murdered according to the laws of the State. You will close by asking the Lord to have mercy on my soul. I will also close by solemnly asking God to open your blind eyes to the truth, to your individual responsibility, so that you will cease to give your support to this hell-born traffic."—Christian Instructor.

GOOD MANNERS AT HOME.—Practical jokes are rarely indulged in by persons of nice perceptions, and teasing passes the bounds of good taste when it ceases to be a matter of pure fun on all sides. Inquisitiveness is always bad form. "Whom is your letter from?" "What makes your eyes so red?" are interferences with one's rightful privacy. A closed door should be respected and given assurance of seclusion.

One who is so disloyal as to repeat to any outsider, however intimate, anything to the discredit of the family, deserves to forfeit family rights and privileges.

There are no terms strong enough to condemn the vanity of a parent who will allow a daughter's charms, prospects and advantages to be advertised in the public prints.

Society requires that whatever their private relations, husband and wife face the world as a unit, harmonious and with interests identical. One thing good form imperatively demands—that by no mischance, no loss of self-control, shall family discords be revealed to strangers, children or servants.

An uncontrolled voice is always unmannerly and undignified.

A readiness to give up little things is the most tactful appeal possible for a return of courtesy at other times when the matter may be of importance to us.

Personalities that are made to do duty as family jokes are never funny to strangers.—Ladies' Home Journal.

THE SILENT BATTLES.

Sages and history, a wondrous story
Have ye revealed, through all the ages down,
Of strife and peace, of battles and of glory,
Of cross and crown.

Brave men have risen to heed the call of duty,
True souls have grappled with the shape of wrong,
And through their wars have come, in martial beauty
Unspoiled and strong.

But in your tomes I find nowhere recorded,
Nowhere endowed with its honors due,
One tale of valor, tested and rewarded—
One tale that's true.

It is the unconfessed, unuttered story,
Repeated in each life from sun to sun,
Of man's long, silent struggle, and God's glory,
When right has won.
In all the record of the past, oh, never
Is God's right hand more manifest and strong,
Than when, by prayerful, earnest, firm endeavor,
Man masters wrong.

F. W. Hutt, in S. S. Times.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Other Tragic Endings of Initiations and Hazings.

The incident of the death of the West Point cadet, Oscar L. Booz, due, it is alleged, to brutal treatment received at the hands of his cadet associates, has made more of a stir than is usually accorded tragic matters of this kind. A strict governmental inquiry into the particulars of this serious and disgraceful occurrence is likely to answer the demand which on all sides has been made for it. It is at the same time pertinent to point to the fact that there have occurred not a few fatal, or well nigh fatal, terminations to hazing and initiation transactions in places not under the authority of the United States government, as in educational institutions and secret, oath-bound lodges.

Personally, the writer takes the view that it were greatly to be desired on various accounts that such fraternities did not exist; but inasmuch as they are a matter of fact, and, as stated, deaths do now and then occur, in connection with their permitted procedure, it is to be hoped that the present moral shock occasioned by the West Point incident, may have the result of bringing popular condemnation upon similar inexcusably foolish and brutal proceedings everywhere.

Not desiring to animadvert here upon any special order, fraternity or institution, it may be permitted me to call attention to several tragic occurrences happening within a few years, in connection with hazings and initiations.

In 1895, at Kansas City, a jury in the Circuit Court, awarded the sum of $10,000 damages to a married woman whose husband received an injury from which he will never recover, while being initiated into a certain secret order. The testimony showed that the lodge officers, wearing masks, and in long black, red and white robes, having made the applicant take an oath that he would never reveal the secrets of the order, and having blindfolded him and put a heavy pack upon his back, proceeded to run him through what they called "a three year's warfare." The long and harrowing experience ended with his being forced to march up an incline and then ordered to jump, refusing to do which, he was pushed off, and received the injury which cost the lodge very dear for their "fun."

Less than two years ago, the Chicago paper gave detailed accounts of the initiation of Swede into a lodge in that city, a man who, as his wife testified, had, previous to joining the order, never been afflicted mentally, a seldom was physically ill, but who, after taking the third degree, came home a mental wreck and was soon taken to an asylum. Haunted by the terrors of his initiation, he would scream, "You can't kill me! you can't kill Swede!" In the course of a little over two weeks he was released by death from his mental agony. More immediately fatal was the case of the initiate at Evansville, Indiana, who met a horrible death by jumping upon supposed rubber spikes, which proved to be real iron spikes that had not been removed.

At Des Moines, Iowa, in the latter part of 1896, a candidate for initiation into a lodge, was placed, as alleged, in a chair, intended to be heated, and from which it was expected he would jump when the heat became unbearable. This he did not do, even when the smoke was seen issuing from the chair. His death ensued a little later. Accepting the most charitable account of the occurrence, I quote from the St. Louis Globe Democrat, which stated: "The story of how his injuries were contracted was given out to-night by members of the — Lodge, after a more sensational story had been current. It was that instead of a heated chair, he was placed on an electrical chair, and a light current turned on to the expectation of making him squirm. He manifested no discomfort, and the current was increased several times, without producing any apparent effect. Then the smoke was seen and he was taken out half electrocuted."

A little more than a year ago, a student of — College, in the State of New York, died under circumstances which, said the New York World at the time, "should be explored to the bottom," adding, "This is the second case in which a student of that institution has come to his death in the process of initiation into one or other of the secret orders that — has enthusiastically commended as a peculiarly valuable adjunct of the institution's] instruction. There are particularly distressing features about the death of young B—. He was nineteen years of age, six feet tall, splendidly built, and a fine, hearty, intelligent boy, with the courage of a lion. He was an only son, the single hope of perpetuating a family which for many generations had been distinguished." It then stated the particulars of the tragic occurrence. Young man, who had been only six weeks a student of the college. Briefly stated preliminary test of fitness for initiation into the Greek Letter fraternity, he was sent straight across the country to fasten a slip of paper on which was inscribed a meaningless message to a railroad bridge. His dead body was little later at the bottom of a canal which y across the line of his imposed route, and which he would need to struggle across or swim through in order to reach the goal. Columns of details of similar incidents could be given, but these few may suffice to support the protest against all so-called hazings, initiations and like procedures of a brutal character, which will not bear the light. Liable many of these are to eventuate in serious wounding or death, they are as unmanly as they are uncalled for, and their abandonment should be demanded by the general public, as well as those who are more immediately interested. Yet is it to be feared that, in many cases, the fraternal affiliation with societies and organizations such as herein alluded to, has made it too easy for the sons to follow along in the like direction. The church at large is manifestly and fatally weakened by such alliances.*

JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

Business and American Fathers.

The editor of Harper's Bazar draws a clear picture in a story told by the captain of a police precinct in New York. One evening a man came to the station-house asking if any lost children were there. Three were asleep in a back room, and the man went in to see if his son was among the number. He awakened a boy between two and three years old and asked him if he were Johnny So-and-so. The little fellow being very sleepy and frightened, could not be made to answer, and the man turned away saying he would have to send his wife for him. "What! do you not know your own child?" the police official asked. "To tell the truth, I don't," the man replied. "I work on the — line of street cars; the children ain't with me when I go away in the morning, and they're tucked up when I get back at night. I never see them." Later his wife appeared and identified one of the children. It was not the one the father had picked out!

This represents a condition of life resulting inevitably from the pressure of money-making by men. And it is not confined to the stratum of society in which long hours of manual labor practically annihilate a man's social relations to the point of unfathering his children while he lives. Such are the complexities and competition of business: well-to-do city men are so far separated from their families by the struggle of bread-winning that their office of paterfamilias is finally reduced to the matter of settling bills. Thus men lose nearly all the actual joy and most of the benefits of paternity,

* A minister, D. B. Gunn, writing to the Christian concerning a visit paid some months ago to a well known college in New England, refers to its earlier history when it was noted for its evangelistic teachings, missionary spirit, frequent revivals of religion and the conversion of its students." He now observed a marked change in the way of spiritual decline. "Any one looking closely at the working of the many secret societies maintained by the students will see," he says, "that they have much to do with it. The college is honeycombed with fraternities. The college register numbers less than five hundred students, but there are fourteen Greek letter fraternities! Ten of these have fine buildings, costing from ten thousand dollars to fifty thousand dollars each. The money for their erection and equipment has been supplied by former graduates who were members of these orders and have acquired wealth." He refers also to the excessive attention given to intercollegiate sports, to the times engendering feuds, silly and wicked displays, to the bruised and maimed who resort to the infirmary and the sad tale."

and thus, too, there falls upon the mother a responsibility that is all but impossible to discharge. The whole burden of parental accountability, in so far as it relates to morals and education, rests on her. Add to this abnormal feature the further one, that the stress of life to-day more and more imposes upon women also the burden of much work outside the family, either in industry or in social reform, and we have the children in a sense both unfathered and unmothered by the demands of modern civilization. The commercial aim of the American people is surely to be distrusted when in individual lives it works out so that men's toil in factory, shop and counting-room represents the man's entire achievement, while to women and children, in the main, is left the struggle of securing the morals of society. Statistics showing how much time out of a week the average American is permitted by this method of making a livelihood to devote to his family would doubtless show good ground for a business-reform movement looking to the restoration of the American father to his own.

On the other hand modern styles of living should not be made so costly as to keep the wage-earner so much away from home in striving to pay for them.

Ellen McCarty.

The following was obtained by Jane Peirce from Ellen McCarty, during one of her visits at Ellen's home:

Ellen McCarty was a baptized and much esteemed minister in the Society of Friends, living at Elklands, Pennsylvania, a remote and rather isolated district, even now, and sixty or seventy years ago abundantly more so.

In the early periods of her religious life she underwent great hardships and sacrifices. Living six miles from the meeting she attended, generally going thither on foot, often leading a little child, and carrying another in her arms. On one of these occasions, a heavy snow-storm overtook her on her return. Her discouragements were so great from the difficulties she met with, that she thought it could not be required of her to undertake the same again; but when the next meeting-day came she persevered, and in that meeting was her first appearance in the ministry. Continuing faithful to her Divine Leader, she became a clear and convincing minister, evidencing the true anointing. Hearing that a company of militia had been assembled by their captain to exercise on a ground some miles from her house, and feeling her mind drawn to visit the muster-ground, and seek a religious opportunity with the captain; she believed if she would be faithful, a Friend and neighbor, named Hoagland, would be willing to accompany her. So she dressed and walked towards the neighbor's house, when to her astonishment, she found the Friend standing in her door with cloak and bonnet on waiting Ellen's arrival, though entirely ignorant of her concern by any outward channel. This great confirmation increased her faith. When they reached the muster-ground Ellen had a powerful interview with the captain, who laid down his arms, never again to resume them. P. H.

1870.

If religion has done nothing for your temper, it has done nothing for your soul.—R. Clayton.

Learn to be Content.

An account of the close of the life of Thomas G. Taylor in the peace and triumph of the gospel, who died a prisoner in Anamosa Penitentiary, Iowa, in 1900, appeared in THE FRIEND, vol. 64, page 387.

He is the subject of the interesting tract entitled, "The Prisoner Delivered from the Bondage of Sin," which is number 162 of the series published by the Tract Association of Friends of Philadelphia.

A ministering Friend who often visited him and to whom he entrusted some of his writings, has forwarded one of his written exhortations, which, though addressed "To a Fellow Prisoner," seems to us appropriate to the condition of all. It is as follows:

"If thou art one of the many whose daily cry is, 'Oh! I can't be content in a place like this,' then let me remind thee of the fact that contentment is possible. Open thy Bible and turn to Phil. iv: 11, where St. Paul says, 'I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therein to be content.' This means that he was not always able to say, 'I am content in my state.' This was an attainment he reached by struggle and discipline, by learning in the school of Christ, just as all of us have to learn it, if we ever do, and any of us may learn it if we will. One step towards it is patient submission to unavoidable ills and hardship. No earthly lot is perfect, no mortal ever yet in this world found a set of circumstances without some drawback. But sometimes it lies in our power to remove the discomfort, for much of our hardship is of our own making, and would require but little energy on our own part to cure it. We surely are very foolish if we live on amid ills and frets, day after day, which we might change for comfort if we would.

"True there are trials which we cannot change into pleasure, burdens which we cannot lay off, crosses which we must continue to carry. And when we have those trials, why should we not sweetly accept them as part of God's best way with us. Discontent never made a rough path smoother, a heavy burden lighter, a dark way brighter, or a sorrow less sore—it only makes matters worse.

"If we would learn the lesson of contentment, we must train ourselves to live for the higher things. No earthly misfortune can touch the wealth a Christian holds in the Divine promises and hopes. Just in the measure in which we learn to live for spiritual and unseen things, do we find contentment amid earth's trials and losses. If we live to please God—to build up Christ like characters in ourselves, and to lay up treasures in heaven, we shall not depend for happiness on the way things go with us here. The lower desires are crowded out by the higher. We need this world less as we get more of God and heaven into our hearts.

"This was the secret of the contentment of the ancient prisoner whose written epistles are so well worth considering. He was content in any trial, because earth meant so little and Christ meant so much to him. He did not need the things he did not have, he was not vexed by the things he lost, he was not vexed by the sufferings he had to endure, because the source of his life was in heaven, and could not be touched by earthly experiences of pain or loss.

"These my friend, are hints of the way thou mayst learn in whatsoever state thou art, therein to be content. Surely the lesson is worth learning; One year of sweet content amid earth's troublous scenes, is better than a life-time of vexed restless discontent—the lesson can be learned, too, by any who truly is Christ's disciple; for did not the Master say, 'Peace I leave with you; My peace I give unto you.'

"In the cleft of the rock is the home of content."

T. G. TAYLOR.
Anamosa Penitentiary, 1888.

The immense growth of luxury is not merely due to the facility afforded by modern machinery. Luxury helped to ruin the ancient world, where much of this machinery did not exist. Luxury, one feels is ultimately due to an insane rivalry and spirit of competition among individuals and classes. The desire to get ahead of somebody else is the chief cause of the demand for luxury. This is so because, in modern society riches constitute the sole means of indicating what is supposed to be a higher social position. In early communities men are counted superior because of personal wealth. This man can fight better, and he is elevated to the highest post in the tribe or nation. In the middle ages personal bravery on the one hand, the spiritual excellence on the other were the conspicuous qualities which raised men in the secular and religious spheres. Even after mediæval society had decayed a long line of noble descent gave to a man a peculiar distinction. But modern society is founded on money and the possession of money is the criterion generally accepted by all classes as the test of a man's position.—

It may have been only a cheerful word,
A grasp of the hand in meeting,
But a hope revived at the message heard,
Or courage came from the greeting.
How fine to think of a soul waxed strong,
Of a burden lighter growing,
Because you happened to come along
When life made its dreariest showing!

For this is the true comradeship
In the life we live together,
That holds to a friend with a firmer grip
The rougher the way or weather;
That sings to gladden the hearts of all,
Till, with the echoes blending,
The tranquil shadows of twilight fall,
And the road has reached its ending.

—R. D. Saunders.

DOING OUR BEST.—A lady once crossed a street where a little boy was busily sweeping the crossing; she noticed with pleasure the care with which he did his work, and smiled as she said to him, "Yours is the cleanest crossing I pass." He lifted his cap with a gallant air and quickly said, "I am doing my best."

All day the words rang in her ears, and for many days afterward, and when a friend, a rich, influential man, inquired for a boy to do errands and general work for him, she told him of the little fellow at the crossing. "A boy who would do his best at a street crossing is worth a trial with me," said the man; and he found the boy, engaged him for a month, and at the end of the time was so pleased with him that he sent him to school and fitted him for a high position, which he filled with honor. "Doing my best at the street crossing made a successful man of me," he was wont to say in after years.—Ex.

Clergy and Laity.

A Churchman's View of a Separate Class as Conductors of the Divine Spirit.

Dr. Magee, the late bishop of Peterborough, a prelate of insight as well as humor, once declared that clergy and laity in England were "thinking on separate planes," and expressed his apprehension that they would, therefore, one day come into collision. Dr. Dibdin, Chancellor of the diocese of Durham, is apparently of the same opinion, for he told the Church Congress that "a variety of circumstances—e. g., more careful and specialized training—had combined to make the English clergy, far more than formerly, a separate class, distinct not only in dress, but in feeling and interests, from the lay citizen. Whether the change was an improvement or otherwise, the point was that the clergy were, on the whole, and as a body, less able to see things as laymen saw them, and more likely to take up a different point of view. Could anything be worse? The conflict of church parties was mischievous and humiliating enough; but there was one thing more deadly, and that was a war of clericals and anti-clericals." We agree with the bishop and the chancellor in their opinion but not in their apprehensions. The "war" they apprehend will not, we conceive, occur. The party among clergymen which believes men in order to be priests in the Brahminical or Roman sense has gradually won the day, until at present probably three-fourths of the whole body, of all shades of opinion except the very broad, hold that they belong to a caste set apart by the divine will, and possessed either of miraculous powers, or of an authority which is not professional merely, but in some sense supernatural. They can either, in their own belief, perform a miraculous act, or they are depositories of a truth which only they are fully authorized to impart. At lowest, they are distinguished by a "succession," or spiritual pedigree, which those who lack something of vital importance. This opinion, so far from decaying, as most forms of self-importance decay, under the influence of modern distrust, tends to become deeper, partly because the clergy are more earnest, and therefore more eager to be sure of a divine commission; partly because, as their rivals in the world grow more intelligent and richer, the clergy are compelled to preserve their self-respect and dignity by falling back upon their supernatural claim. It is becoming rare to meet a clergyman, whether of the "high" or the "low" parties, who, if pressed, does not avow this belief about himself, not as a rule with arrogance, but with a certain placid security of conviction widely distinguishable from the sensitive pride of other professional experts. The English laity, on the other hand, as a body do not admit this pretension at all. They think little upon the subject, which does not sincerely interest them, but in a passive but immovable way they reject sacerdotalism altogether. Here and there a few men may be found who, out of logic or from a mental predisposition, accept the Roman theory on the subject; but as a rule, even though they believe the Apostolical succession to be historically a fact, they attach to it no more importance than they do to Legitimacy as a claim to sovereignty, or to ancient birth as a claim to social consideration. Many even of those who believe in the Real Presence, question the right to call Christ to the altar is confined to a caste, while the remainder hold that caste to be entitled to reverence just as the judges are, and in no other way. They have been appointed to exercise certain highly important and honorable functions, and they ought not to be interfered with by men not so appointed but they are bound, as the condition of lay obedience, to perform them rightly. So far from holding that the power of the clergy is independent of character or conduct, just as a light is pure whatever the medium through which it is transmitted, the laity as a body hold character and conduct to be of the essence of the priestly capacity, and even consider that capacity liable to be forfeited by extreme unwillingness. They do not proclaim this view loudly because they think it discourteous, but it came out with quite curious abruptness in the discussion and voting on the act which enables the clergy to secularize themselves. On the sacerdotal theory, that act, passed as it was by laymen, without the intervention of any spiritual authority, was simply a lay impertinence, no priest being able to divest himself of a character imposed on him by divine authority; but laymen could not even see wherein the objection lay. Why, they asked, should not the clergyman cease to be a clergyman as a soldier ceases to be a soldier? In deed, immense numbers of them go further and hold that there is something positively wrong, or at least excessively doubtful in a man performing a "sacred" function who is unwilling to perform it, an argument which has repeatedly checked the legislature—e. g. when passing divorce acts—from requiring the clergy to exercise their functions. There is no doubt in this clash of opinion as to the clerical prerogative a latent possibility, as Dr. Dibdin intimates, of "war" between the laity and the clerical profession.

There is a very similar difference in regard to the authority of the clerical order to teach on matters of faith or morals. Almost every clergyman thinks in his heart that on such matters he has a commission apart from his intelligence or his learning; and that the layman should defer to him as to one appointed not only to argue but to decide. The pretension is rarely put forward offensively, for the English clergy are gentlemen and have the dislike of the cultured for overbearingness and verbal controversy but it is felt none the less to be well founded and is often the secret root of an unexpected confidence and firmness of opinion. The layman, as a rule, does not entertain it. He listens to the clergyman's opinion as to that of any other professional expert, weighs its value, and accepts or dismisses simply on what he judges to be its merit. It adds nothing to its value because of the "commission" and, indeed, has a most curious and unfair inclination to underrate its importance as being necessarily tainted with insincerity—"a professional opinion," in short rather than a sincere deliverance of the speaker's thought. "One knows what the rector will

"is the common remark which indicates it with him who utters it the rector's saying I be of uncommonly little effective weight. You see the operation of this feeling in an almost ludicrous way in the comments on the public utterances of the bishops. Those utterances are seldom denounced but unless they be so intellectual or so well-worded as to extort praise they are seldom treated as serious contributions to the discussion. The writers of papers or letters quote them as evidences of opinion, accept or answer them very briefly, and go on, not minding greatly, to what they concern the pith of the discussion. This is true even when the subject is purely spiritual or ecclesiastical, while outside those two departments of thought there is not only no disposition to concede extra reverence to bishops, but they are habitually treated, and this by members of their own church, with the gross-unfairness; the common assumption that a man of any profession is sure to be, or to have been, specially qualified by general intelligence and knowledge being wholly ignored. In this matter again—the teaching authority of the clergy—there is between the laity and clerical order a deep and permanent cleavture. At a social reform meeting in New York, Eleventh Month 27th, 1900, Bishop Potter affirmed the above view as follows: The absence of Bishop Potter occasioned surprise. The chairman read a letter from the bishop stating that an ecclesiastic is not the best instrument of a meeting whose aim is to unify forces on the side of law, decency and protection of the weak. "The clergy," he said, "may fitly exercise the prophetic office of rebuking, warning, entreating; but in social and political movements their best service is to be in the ranks, where, as in times of war and siege, they may patrol, mount guard, and watch, but leave to others the task of leadership."

Caught in a Net.

Prof. Max Muller's account of his Indian adventures in the second volume of his "Auld Syne," he has given a striking sketch of a very talented and cultivated young man, of the highest caste, who had been brought to London in Christ in India, and who came to London in order to study Christianity in a Christian school. When asked about the thought or experience that had made him a Christian, he gave this remarkable testimony: "I can explain to you why I rejected Siva and Krishna and Allah, and tell you everything that kept me back from Christianity as preached to us in London, and made me reject the New as well as the Old Testament as unsatisfactory to a young man. But why and how I became a Christian I cannot explain. I was caught as in a net, and I could not get away from Christ." This is an illustration of our Lord's own words, "For I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." There was something in the Spirit of the Lord quite distinct from the presentation of his teaching, which attracted and held his acute mind and inquiring heart. Indeed, it was a case of heart drawing against mind conviction. . . . A Samaritan woman of Samaria persuaded the men of her town to come and see the man who told her all she had ever done. And they said "Now we believe, not because of thy saying, for we have heard Him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world."

But there was another testimony of the young Hindu. He had come to London, hoping to find the concrete exemplification of the life and doctrine of Jesus in a Christian civilization. But what he actually saw was so different from his ideals that he said to Prof. Muller: "If what I have seen in London is Christianity, I want to go back to India; if that is Christianity, I am not a Christian."

It is a severe indictment of our practical living of the gospel, but it was a judgment that the Hindu had the right to pronounce. Christians are the living representatives of Christ. It is through their life that the gospel is made known to the world far more than by their word. The Hindu had been drawn to Christ by what he had learned of the Master himself. He was repelled again by the imperfect life of the Master's professed disciple.—W. A. Brooks.

Words of Wisdom.

Could we but brush the cob-webs of prejudice from our eyes, how many beautiful visions might be seen in the light of truth. The following selection from the writings of Gautama Buddha, who taught the precepts of his religion to his devoted disciples over five hundred and twenty-five years previous to the beautiful age when the "Word" of "Truth" "was made flesh and dwelt among us" for our sakes: "upon whom the ends of the world are come," will serve to illustrate the principle of an "Inner Light"* which has been combatted so bitterly by many persons who have been victims of prejudice, and who have failed to see anything valuable or worthy of praise in any system of thought not held by themselves. Above all things, Buddha was a lover of peace, and positively forbade the shedding of blood. Drunkenness was regarded by him as next to murder, and was forbidden in the same manner. According to his teaching he received his knowledge of truth and virtue by "immediate revelation;" and while much that is crude has intruded into his doctrine, are we not warranted in meditating on that which follows, and concluding that our great God and Saviour saw fit to reveal to the inner eye of Gautama Buddha a wide vision of truth as it is in its own Divine nature. And while holding fast to our own revelation as it is in Christ Jesus, may we not be profited by a reverent study of such wisdom as has been revealed by the same spirit through another instrument?

As there are some things that appear to be somewhat similar to our Lord's "beatitudes," first declared upon the mount, in the fifth chapter of St. Matthew, the following have been designated "THE BEATITUDES" OF GAUTAMA BUDDHA, or "The Wise One," written some five hundred and twenty-five years before Christ.

* Compare the following passage from the Retractions of Augustine, as reproduced by the late Professor Max Muller: "The very thing which is now called the Christian religion existed among the ancients, and was not absent from the beginning of the human race until Christ came in the flesh, whence the true religion, which already existed, began to be called Christian."—Ed.

"To shun the company of the foolish: to pay deference to the wisely learned; to worship what ought to be worshipped; these are blessed things, mark them well.

"To dwell among good men; to have with one's self the consciousness of good deeds done; to guard well all one's actions; these are blessed things, mark them well.

"To hear and see much in order to acquire knowledge; to study all science that leads not to sin; to make use of proper language; to acquire knowledge of propriety of behaviour; these are blessed things, mark them well.

"To treat parents with tenderness and affection; to nourish well one's wife and children; to perform no action under the influence of sinful temptation; these are blessed things, mark them well.

"To make offerings and give abundant alms; to act in accordance with the precepts of the law and of virtue; to assist relatives and friends; to perform virtuous actions; these are blessed things, mark them well.

"To avoid sin; to be most instant and strenuous in such avoiding; to abstain from spirituous liquor; to remember always the principle of accumulation of merit; these are blessed things, mark them well.

"To pay respect to all those who are worthy of regard; to be ever humble; to be ever contented; to be grateful for favors received; to listen to the preaching of the sacred law at the proper times; these are blessed things, mark them well.

"To be patient and endure suffering; to rejoice in edifying discourse; to visit holy men when occasion serves; to converse on religious subjects; these are blessed things, mark them well.

"To practice religious austerities, to continue firm in the sublime truth; to study always how to act in the most virtuous way; to keep the eyes firmly fixed upon the attainment of "the great peace;" these are blessed things, mark them well.

"To be of tranquil mind; to be exempt from passion; to be perfectly composed and fearless amid all earthly dangers; these are blessed things, mark them well.

"Who so possesses and observes these thirty-eight blessings, shall never be overcome, and shall find happiness in all things; mark them well. So shalt thou enjoy the peace of the "Wise ones."

ARTHUR W. DOWE.

WHENEVER one sees the Christian disposition manifested in any emergency, his judgment and conscience approves it; he does not have to argue himself into commending it, says the Advance. The disposition is so unmistakably excellent and worthy that it compels admiration, and that from those who are not Christians themselves, as well as from those who are. This is a unique power of Christianity that the dispositions it inculcates are so manifestly excellent that they do not have to be defended by argument.

WE may keep our life if we will, carefully preserving it from waste, but we shall have no reward, no honor from it at the last. But if we empty it out in loving service, we shall make it a lasting blessing to the world, and we shall be remembered forever.—J. R. Miller.

ARABIA.

I went into Arabia.—Paul.

Welcome the silence of the sandy plain,
Thrice welcome, calm environment of God!
Here let me rest beside the desert stream.
Too short my sounding line to reach the depths
Of knowledge, power and mercy infinite,
Too deep—yet I may drink and be refreshed,
And with a vision purified descry
Fresh beauties in the future's glowing dawn.
O, anchorage divine! O, love, untold
Hold thou me evermore! O light of life
And life of light, arm me for holy strife,
And ceaseless labor of a life-long love.

—H. T. Miller.

“WHAT you learn from bad habits and from bad society, you will never forget, and it will be a lasting pang to you. I tell you in all sincerity, not as in the excitement of speech, but as I would confess, and have confessed before God, I would give my right hand to-night, if I could forget that which I have learned in bad society.”—John B. Gough.

WHOSOEVER desires to persevere and increase in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, to live and die in hope that maketh not ashamed, must be diligent in secret prayer; must constantly read the Scriptures, begging Him to explain them, and give faith in them, and must walk with those who walk conscientiously before God, in whose manner, spirit and discourse, there is what reaches the heart, and tends to humble, quicken and comfort the soul.—Henry Venn.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS

UNITED STATES.—The mistranslation of certain despatches sent by the Administration at Washington to Minister Conger at Peking has apparently caused the latter to act in direct violation of the policy of the Administration on some points of importance, particularly in retaining the word “irrevocable” in presenting the demands of the Powers; and which commits them to it as an ultimatum. The United States are looked upon by the Chinese as the only Power really desiring to retain the integrity of the Chinese Empire. The other Powers are regarded as desirous of breaking it up, with the possible exception of Russia, who, the Chinese think, merely favors a postponement in order eventually to secure a larger share.

The joint note of the Powers has been signed by the foreign ministers at Peking.

Speaking of the terms formulated and signed by the foreign Ministers in Peking, Wu Ting Fang, the Chinese Minister at Washington said: “The demands are hard, but China is disposed to meet the Powers half way in bringing about an early settlement. There will be no delay in Imperial action. I am sorry that the efforts of the United States to eliminate the word ‘irrevocable’ from the agreement were not crowned with success, but I hope that the Powers will not be inclined to interpret that word in its strictest sense. China’s willingness to comply with the wishes of the Powers had repeatedly been shown since the beginning of peace negotiations. She has punished the eleven Princes and officials designated by the Powers, and will administer to them the severest punishment, as required by the Powers. She is also willing to pay a reasonable indemnity, as demanded.”

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty with England respecting the Nicaragua Canal has passed the Senate of the United States by a vote of 55 to 18, after certain amendments were adopted intended to control the canal in the interests of the United States. As thus amended it must receive the approval of Great Britain before it becomes operative. By this treaty it is agreed that all vessels shall pass through the canal on the same terms as those of the United States, and in war between other Powers the United States agree to preserve the neutrality of the canal toward all belligerents.

The legal status of the Philippine Islands is now under consideration in the Supreme Court of the United States, and its decision as to whether the Constitution of this country is in force there, is awaited with great interest.

A Seattle, Wash., despatch says: The Great Cascade Railroad tunnel, 13,813 feet long, was opened to travel on the 21st instant. The first train passed through it in eleven minutes.

The annual report of the Commission of the Five Civilized Tribes says that, with the improving conditions, it is hoped by a uniformity of political institutions to lay the foundation for an ultimate common Government. The hostility to any change in the old ways, coupled with an inability to comprehend any benefit to them, encountered at first by the Commission, has gradually relaxed. Practically all the citizens of the tribes are now in co-operation with the Commission in the endeavor to bring to a speedy conclusion the original undertaking of the Commission. The Commission finds that the allotment of the lands will be difficult and complex. Title to the land in each of the tribes differs, so that there can be no common rule applicable to all. The enrollment of citizens is progressing with accuracy.

The United States, Russia, Great Britain and France claim 23,000,000 of 51,000,000 square miles, including by far the most valuable parts of the world.

The Baldwin Locomotive Works, in this city, which began in a small way in 1821, has grown to be the largest establishment of the kind in the world, with an estimated capital employed of $10,000,000, an annual output of $17,000,000 and turning out four locomotives for every working day in the year.

The recent census shows that about 12 per cent. of the population of the United States is colored.

Petroleum of high grade is reported to have been found at Linglestown, Dauphin county, Pa., in sufficient quantity to encourage the drilling of a well.

The proposed ship channel from Lake Michigan at Chicago, towards the Mississippi River, has been unfavorably reported on by the Board of Engineers appointed to make a survey and estimate of cost who say that a waterway for lake vessels extending only to the mouth of the Illinois River will not develop commerce that will justify such an expenditure, and that this improvement by itself is not advisable. The Board, therefore, recommends that no further surveys of the Desplaines and Illinois Rivers be made unless in connection with a project to be authorized by Congress which shall include provision for a corresponding depth of water in the Mississippi below the mouth of the Illinois.

There were 463 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 94 more than the previous week and 50 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing, 225 were males and 238 females: 65 died of consumption of the lungs; 64 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 20 of diphtheria; 16 of cancer; 11 of apoplexy, and 10 of typhoid fever.

COTTON closed on a basis of 10 $\frac{1}{8}$ ¢. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.30 to $2.50; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.25 to $3.40; Western winter, straight, $3.40 to $3.60; spring, straight, $3.50 to $3.55; city mills, straight, $3.45 to $3.60.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 70 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 70 $\frac{3}{4}$ ¢.

No. 2 mixed corn, 42 to 42 $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢.

No. 2 white oats, clipped, 30 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 31¢.

BEEF CATTLE.—Best, 5 $\frac{3}{8}$  to 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢; good, 5 to 5 $\frac{1}{8}$ ¢; medium, 4 $\frac{3}{4}$  to 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Choice, 4 $\frac{1}{4}$  to 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢; good, 2 $\frac{3}{4}$  to 3 $\frac{1}{4}$ ¢; common, 2 to 2 $\frac{1}{4}$ ¢; spring lambs, 4 to 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢.

HOGS.—Best Western, 7 to 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢.

FOREIGN.—The Medical Faculty of the University of Heidelberg has made a very interesting report on the effect of incandescent light (gas or electrical) on the eyes. After having carefully weighed all the evidence on the question, the verdict is that the incandescent light is not harmful. For lighting large halls or places of entertainment, electricity is especially recommended from hygienic points of view.

In addition to the French order directing that the cases filled with Chinese loot, sent to President Leubet and others, by General Frey, in China, shall be embargoed at Marseilles, the government has decided that all objects seized by the French expeditionary force shall be restored.

Recent advices from Finland show that a systematic effort is being made to Russianize that country. All papers in the Grand Duchy which had criticized the Government in any way, whether printed in Swedish, Finnish or Danish, were being suppressed.

It is said that the press censorship, the suppression of recognized organs of public opinion and the loss of legislative autonomy will be followed by the proclamation of the Greek Orthodox religion as the State religion, notwithstanding the fact that 98 per cent. of the population belong to the Lutheran Church. It is also understood that Russian is to be made compulsory as the language of instruction in the secondary schools.

In an interview with Paul Kruger in Holland it is said he is emphatic in disclaiming any desire to involve other nations in war in behalf of the Boers. What he asks is that the Governments which at The Hague declared their determination to use their efforts to secure amicable settlement of disputes by means of mediation and arbitration should make a united effort to bring the verdict of the civilized world to bear on Great Britain. He avers that the provisions of The Hague convention and the laws of usages of war are trampled under foot, and he wants to know whether the signatories of this convention have anything to say on the subject.

The Boers have invaded Cape Colony, where there are fears of an uprising among the Dutch settlers against Great Britain. The troops at the disposal of the British authorities do not appear to be sufficient to cope with the extensive spread of military operations.

Fighting is reported between the Boer and British forces in Cape Colony, in which the British retired “with losses.” Virtually all the districts of Cape Colony in the vicinity of Orange River are in more or less open revolt.

Great Britain is taking steps to send troops to South Africa to reinforce Kitchener in repelling the invasion of the Boers in Cape Colony, where fighting has occurred. The Colonial police will be increased to ten thousand men.

A despatch from Glasgow says: “Clyde ship built recently placed orders for 150,000 tons of plates in United States, at a saving of $250,000.”

The depression in the Scotch steel and malleable trades is acute. Fourteen furnaces will be damped at the end of the year. The steel works are talking of closing indefinitely.

In England a decline in the price of pig iron has caused a considerable decline in production.

General MacArthur has issued a proclamation warning the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands that hereafter strict compliance with the laws of war will be required of non-combatants.

The leaders of the projected Autonomy party in Manila have had a conference with the Philippine Commission, which has approved of the movement. The plan is to form United States Territories, including candidature for Statehood. A native Legislature would elect members to the United States Congress.

Sixto Lopez, the Filipino agent who has been in Philadelphia for some days, issued a “letter to the President and people of the United States,” in the course of which he says: “At this season of peace I plead for peace. I plead on behalf of the wife and mother down whose cheeks are coursing the silent tears; on behalf of the maiden who has met with her first great sorrow; on behalf of the little faces, too young to realize what has happened; on behalf of those who know that the one who occupied that vacant chair will never more return; on behalf of the patriots who, for good or ill, have laid down their life for their country; on behalf of the brave soldiers marching under their own flags; and in the name and for the sake of Him, the Friend of the oppressed, who suffered unjust condemnation as a rebel against the Lord of Hosts, I plead for peace. May this plea, written with the blood and tears of our people, reach the hearts of all who share the same good-will of the Herald Angel’s song on this, the Christmas of the century.”

The discovery has been made by Dr. H. Goldschmidt, of Essen, Germany, that an intense heat is produced by mixing together powdered aluminum, thoroughly mixed with a metallic oxide, such as iron rust. The mixture is ignited by a strip of magnesium. The mixture burns fiercely and a little of the molten substance will melt chert and a bar of steel. It is expected that steel rails, pipes, etc., may be welded by this process. The temperature may be regulated by the addition of sand or siliceous substances.

NOTICES.

RACHEL G. HALL, plain milliner, 1328 Vine Street, Philadelphia, on and after Twelfth Month 29th, 1900.

TIME CHANGED FOR HOLDING MEETING AT WEST CHESTER, PA.—With the approval of Concord Quarterly Meeting held at Media, Eleventh Month 13th, 1900, of a resolution of Thos. H. Whitson, a meeting for worship was appointed to be held in Friends’ Meeting-house, at West Chester, on First-day, the sixth of First Month, 1901, at 2.30 P. M., at which Friends and especially the young members are invited to be present.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage will leave Philadelphia 7.16 and 8.18 A. M., and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when required. Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., two cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, Westtown Station or West Chester, Phone 85.

EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Prop.

WILLIAM H. PILE’S SONS, PRINTERS,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A Religious and Literary Journal.

VOL. LXXIV.

SEVENTH-DAY, FIRST MONTH 5, 1901.

No. 25.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications received by

EDWIN P. SELLEW, PUBLISHER,
No. 207 WALNUT PLACE,
PHILADELPHIA.

(South from Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth.)

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to
JOHN H. DILLINGHAM.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

Christ the Century's Necessity.

Nothing that we can say in review of the last century can change its influence, which is now past recall; and no speculations that we can at the birth of the new century make of its future, can avail to change it into what ought to be. But the same rule for its true glory and salvation is set, as for the century yesterday and of the centuries forever,—Christ Jesus, the same through all. "For me, to live is Christ;" and "To-day, if ye will not give up, harden not your heart," remain the true laws of life for each and every one of the century's days. It is a century to be lived the day, and He is the Christ to be lived the day, if the increase of his government and peace is to be manifest.

That the spirit of Christ has made conspicuous gains over the world during the century now past, must be manifest to all who know history, by whatever name any may choose to name that power unto better life. Though the foremost Christian nations (if any such there be) have been choosing to baptize the close of the late and the opening of the new century in blood, we believe that there has never been a more wide-spread, though secret revolt in the hearts of thoughtful men against carnal warfare than now. These wars are being used in the light of Christ's countenance to show unto man himself; to expose the depth of the degradation of the natural man under the fall, however refined his veneer of civilization; to strip off the mask of the original savage that man without a Saviour is at heart discovered to be.

There are signs of these disclosures of what is in man once more beginning to open the eyes of many to the sinfulness of sin. May man's alarm about himself increase, till Christ is manifested as the necessity to man's condition!

Christ is a necessity for us. Therefore, as we, in many ways, brought to necessity. Wars may be overruled to expose to the conscience of so-called Christian nations the hollowness of their self-righteousness, that they may be turned to take refuge from spiritual death in Christ for their Saviour, then this shall count for another of the Lamb's victories, where men meant not their cruelties for that. May it, indeed, be true that another apology of nature is found having its counterpart in grace, according to words lately quoted, namely that "it is one of the larger truths of biology that in every period of degeneration there is a higher type preparing, which finds its opportunity."

Man's extremity has many times been confessed to be "God's opportunity." Have we of the Society of Friends been held in reserve as reinforcements for God's opportunity—spiritually preparing to come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty? It is not enough for us to say, "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal." The farthest from faithfulness can say that. But of what kind are our weapons? Can we say, "they are mighty through God?" Are we as his soldiers, bringing every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ? If so, we shall be found in our place in the ranks of the coming opportunity. "Wherefore take unto you the whole armor of God" (Eph. i: 10-20).

People are increasingly coming to recognize Christ as the Word of God. Some would read his "character" as the word of God to them some regard Him as the expression and message to man of what God is like; and of what they themselves should be; some as the continuous revelation from the Father of the Divine Spirit to man and in man; but whatever their views of the Bible and of the Church, there is a growing dissatisfaction with any authority short of the living Christ. The letter is insufficient, tradition is a broken reed. "the Church" stultifies itself as being the authority of Truth—nothing satisfies but the witness for truth in the heart of men, which they are increasingly willing to discover as the inspeaking word and identical with the Christ of the everlasting gospel, "who liveth, and was dead, and behold" is "alive forever more!" In all this tendency there seems to us to be a coming opportunity for the ministrations of life through such as will be faithful to the Word of Truth as committed to the Society of Friends from the beginning.

Let his opportunity be our opportunity; for of such a Christ-bearer unto the daughter of Zion, the signs of the times seem to say, "The Lord hath need of him."

The Rise of the Society of Friends.

BY PRESIDENT ROBERT ELLIS THOMPSON.

Nothing is harder than to discriminate between the influence of individuals and the general tendencies of society, in determining how great the share of each in shaping a historic movement. Luther did not create the Reformation; Wesley did not originate the Methodist movement; there were Calvinists before Calvin, and Darwinians before Darwin. There is indeed but one unique and originative personality in history of whom we can see that he gave history a new direction, in which it moved with a new impulse.

The part played by George Fox in the rise of the Society of Friends is another illustration of this difficulty. "The Society of Friends from the very first shrunk back from calling George Fox their founder. Their usual designation of him is 'our honorable elder,' and they speak of him only as one among many." Thus Thomas Hancock; but I cannot follow him in the reason he gives for this, namely, that they wished to claim a purely divine origin for the movement. They had a more definite reason.

The rise of the Society of Friends in the seventeenth century in midland England, like the rise of the Friends of God (Gottesfreunde), in the Rhine valley in the fourteenth century, was the fruit of a popular reaction against the dominant tendencies in the church of each country and period. In the latter case, the church had grown worldly through its battle with the empire for supremacy, until it had come to value victories of war and diplomacy as the most satisfying of achievements. The worship of the church had become hollow and formal, the intervention of the priesthood between God and the soul had become systemized. Then it was that devout men yearned for escape from forms and shadows to the reality, to the direct contact of the soul with God. Master Eckart, John Tauler, Henry Suso, Jan Ruysbroek, and the unknown author of the "Theologia Germanica," called themselves the Friends of God, because they had escaped from the slavishness of the servant into the freedom of the friend. They called God their Friend, just as the Muslim Soofees had come to do, long before this, in their reaction against the hard dogmatism and legalism of Islam.

In England, in the seventeenth century, there had been a sudden and complete triumph of what is called Puritanism. That form of religious thought had great merits, and rendered great services to England and to America. But it too was dogmatic and institutional. Its emphasis lay on the intellectual side of religion, and the fine distinction drawn by its polemic theologians in their warfare with Romanism, Anglicanism and Arminianism. It valued victories in the polemic field as the first of achievements; and next to these it placed victories over the enemies of a godly reformation, won on the field of battle.

Against this intellectual and masculine temper, which occupied faith with precise and nicely distinguished doctrines, a very general revolt arose in the very hour of its apparent triumph. Not on one line but on many, men fell back on the mystical faith which seeks God behind all forms and opinions, and will not rest short of the immediate vision. Some took as their masters the Platonists inside and outside of the early church; others found guidance in Tauler and the "Theologia Germanica;" others yet discovered their guide in the German theosopher, Jacob Boehme, who had been but twenty years dead. Most notable of all was the group of the Seekers, which probably grew out of the visit of Roger Williams to England in 1643-44, as they represent the position he assumed after his membership of a few months in the Baptist Church of Providence. They declared that the true interpretation of Scripture and the right order of the church were both lost, and that the direct and supernatural interposition of God was needed to restore these. They spoke of themselves "as sheep unfolded, and as soldiers unrallied, waiting for a time of gathering." William Penn says that "as they came to the knowledge of one another, they sometimes met together, not formally to pray or preach, at appointed times or places according to their own wills, as in times past they were accustomed to do, but waited in silence, and as anything rose in any one of their minds that they thought savored of a Divine spring, so they sometimes spoke." Some of them, he says, "ran out into their own imaginations," and became the pantheistic party of the Ranters, who rejected all distinctions between good and evil, between God and man. Thomas Edwards, in his Gangrena (1646), enumerates among their "errors" that men ought "to preach and exercise their gifts without study and premeditation, and not to think of what they are to say till they speak," and "to pray only at such times as the Spirit moves them."

In a word, the England of 1641-51 was a seething cauldron of religious disturbance at the very time when the Long Parliament and the Westminster Assembly thought to settle all things upon the model of "the best Reformed Churches," namely, of Scotland and Geneva. Everywhere men went forth seeking for a treasure they did not find in the hands of the recognized teachers of the people. The most notable of these was George Fox, who in the years 1643-47 was going to and fro among men of all ways of thinking, to see if there were any who could speak to his condition, and show him where to find light and rest. As the period drew to a close, he found himself drawn off from these outer teachers to One who spoke to him from within. It is under the year 1647 that he first records his meeting with any one who roused sympathy, and not antagonism, in him, and whom he describes as "friendly people." From this time begins his mission as a preacher who calls men from the outward and the formal to the inward and the essential in the spiritual life. But he begins the year with the statement that "during all this time I was never joined in a profession of religion with any."

Was the year 1647 that in which the Society of Friends began to exist under that name, and with the essential notes of character which have belonged to it ever since? This is assumed by the historians of the Society,—by Gerard Cœsius, William Sewell, Samuel Janney, Professor Thomas of Haverford, and others. There is, however, no necessity for that assumption. The Society grew out of the craving of the heart for fellowship and friendship with God, and not out of the work of any man. It grew out of men's weariness with theological refinements and distinctions, which occupied the minds, but could not satisfy the hearts, of that generation. As William Penn shows, this mystical craving in the Seekers had assumed a form which approached so closely to the usages of Friends as to suggest an easy transition. Nothing more was required than the confidence of having found, after long seeking.

[Here the writer argues that the Society of Friends was substantially a direct continuation of the society of the Seekers—an argument to which we are not prepared to give place here.]

There is, however, a sense in which George Fox was the founder of the Society of Friends as we know it in history. He was the strongest mind in its membership, and the most potent personal force in giving it shape. Especially is this true of the Discipline of the Society, established between 1666 and 1675, by which, as Professor Gummere says, Fox laid the abiding foundation of the Society [as an organization]. This he did not effect without opposition from an extreme party among the Friends, who possibly stood for the Seeker principle. At any rate the opposition was strongest in Westmoreland, where the Seeker meetings had become Quakerly.

Nothing can rob George Fox of his eminence as the prophet of the Inner Light and Life in an age of scholastic refinements. But he neither needs nor seeks any honor but what belongs to him.—S. S. Times.

Samuel Atkinson.

Samuel Atkinson was a minister highly esteemed for soundness of principle, and genuine integrity, but these were accompanied by a remarkable quaintness and singularity, which sometimes obstructed his way in the minds of his friends.

The following occurrence connected with his ministry was related by one who was present on the occasion:

Having been furnished with a minute to attend Ohio Yearly Meeting, he was taking tea at the house of a Friend at Mount Pleasant; during the period of silence before eating, so great a weight and solemnity appeared to cover the mind of Samuel Atkinson, that the Friend at whose house he was, forbore to wait upon her guests, supposing he would relieve his mind. They thus sat for one hour, Samuel still remaining silent. She attempted to proceed, but was again checked by his deep solemnity.

This continued for three hours, when a child suddenly opened the door, exclaiming, "Are you all dead?"

After this they ate their supper. It was afterward ascertained that a company of young people who were at the table, had engaged to join an evening party for pleasure and amusement, which was defeated by this singular delay, although the circumstances were entirely unknown to Samuel Atkinson or the Friend at whose house he was.

Samuel Atkinson has been deceased about twenty years; he was well-known to the writer 1870. P. H.

Funeral Reforms.

The Presbyterian commenting on the Pittsburgh clergymen's recommendation* of reform in funeral services, says: "Friends and associates desire to have the departed praised. Memory calls up their virtues rather than the faults, and it is expected that whatever can be said in their favor shall be expressed over their coffin. But too many overdo the thing by fulsome flattery. Qualities that were quiet and latent are dragged into the light and unduly extolled. Saints are discovered that had previously been unknown. All this has a bad tendency. It may be agreeable to a certain class of mourners, but reacts upon the eulogist and weakens his influence with the outside world. Generally, we believe it is best not to indulge in the eulogistic, but to leave each life to speak for itself. Those present at the services know it better, usually, than the officiating clergyman. It is his business to bring the gospel to the attention of the bereaved for solace, and to the living for admonition and quickening. There may be special persons and occasions when the good accomplished may be mentioned, but it should be done modestly and sparingly and to the glory of divine grace.

"Only the very rich can afford to bury their dead these days. An extravagant taste at a standard now call for costly outlay in caskets, flowers and carriages, taxing the resources of those in moderate circumstances to the utmost. Nor will the poor be kept behind in this respect. The greatest sacrifices will be made by all classes to give those whom they love and honor the best possible funeral. As a result, expenses are incurred that impose upon the living many a hardship and burden, oftentimes ruining their credit and causing family privations of a trying character. Reform in this point is urgently demanded, but it will never be effected until the wealthy take the lead and set the example. This they should do, for the sake of others, who cannot stand heavy funeral expenses. It may be argued that they ought not to attempt to keep pace with those better off, but human nature, when bereft and afflicted, does not stop to reason, and only thinks of giving its dear ones as good an interment as the best receive. This may be, and is, wrong, for no one should go beyond his means at any time in showing affection for either the dead or the living. . . .

Due deference to others, then, requires economical expenditure on such occasions. In addition is the consideration that money should not be needlessly wasted. The dead cannot appreciate the lavish expenditure and the living are often all the worse off on account of it. A decent and respectful funeral is that any one is justly entitled to. . . .

"The greatest protest will be experienced when it comes to the doing away with the wearing of mourning apparel, but as re-on takes the place of sentiment, and as people rise above the power of custom, the more all it appear that it is wise and proper to lay aside. Through it more harm than good results. The garment of gloom does not necessarily honor the departed. Nor does it harmonize with the hope of the gospel. It is not aid, but often a hindrance, to health. It is a sad reminder when both body and mind all for a cheery spirit and activity. But all cannot see it in this light. Many sensible people cling to it, and think they are not doing justice to a precious memory if the usual signia of mourning are unworn. While their feelings are to be respected, a counter education is in place, the full benefit of which may be realized during the twentieth century, which many are looking forward to as the era of vervellous reformations and developments."

*See No. 12, page 90 of our present Volume.

Religion and Morality.

There is a strange propensity in men to divide their duties into two classes, viz.: those of religion and those of morality. Now we are persuaded there is, in fact, no such division to be made. The duties that hang upon the second great commandment are no less binding, in a religious sense, than those which hang upon the first. They cannot indeed be severed. No division has ever been a striking feature of degeneracy in true religion.

The binding nature of the moral law as laid down in Scripture, and manifested in the conscience, is strangely blinked and evaded in the ordinary transactions of life by men who appear to please themselves with the hope that they love God, and are anxious for the progress of his kingdom. Nor would we speak of these deflections as confined to men of trade. The evil spirit haunts, alas, the men of so-called liberal professions; and, being gifted with ubiquity, is found alike in the kitchen, the stable, the drawing-room and the senate, it is said the family must be supported. No business cannot be carried on without the arts which are not strictly right. Adding all this to be true, what then? Is there any reason why a man should be willing to suffer all he can suffer, for the sake of what he calls his religious scruples, and not do the same rather than break the law of Divine Justice? Shall a man refuse to swear because Christ has commanded him not to swear, and, at the same time, not hesitate to defraud his neighbor? Shall he refuse the verbiage of an oath to his neighbor, and, at the same time, endeavor to circumvent him? Shall he deny himself the pleasure of the theatre or the ball-room, as dangerous amusements to his spiritual health (as indeed they are), and shall he at the same time bury himself in his counting-house, and devote all the energies of his mind and body to the mere accumulation of wealth? We assuredly believe that it is to the full as much our duty to suffer, rather than to break the divine law in its plain statements of truth and justice, as it would be our duty to suffer if we were now called upon to worship the images of idolaters, or the pretended consecrated bread of the papist.—Samuel Tuke.

TRUE ability is shown in vigor of thought in honest argument rather than in antagonistic manners and cutting remarks.

Some Account of the Early Experience and Subsequent Travels of Ruth Newlin.

(Continued from page 186.)

"First Mo. 14th, 1863.—To-day the Monthly Meeting liberated me to attend to a concern that has impressed my mind for several months—to visit in the love of the gospel Pleasant Plain Quarter and some of its meetings, and to appoint some meetings where Friends are remotely situated within the limits of our own Quarter.

"15th.—Severely cold.

"16th.—Very busy making arrangements for leaving home.

"18th.—Set out early this morning in company with Wm. Kivett and Rebecca Hadley, to visit an aged Friend who lives eighteen miles distant. She was rejoiced to see us. Had a meeting at the house of —, where she resides, to the comfort of many. Returned home the 19th.

"20th.—Left home this evening to attend to my concern. Oh! how I feel for my dear orphan children, knowing it is a great trial to them to be left alone.

"21st.—At Benjamin Smith's. They are to accompany me and cannot start until to-morrow.

"22nd.—Started this evening very poor and destitute, yet quiet in mind.

"23rd.—Staid all night at Joseph Beesley's. The roads are very rough and muddy. Traveled twenty-eight miles. Feel quite tired and depressed in spirit.

"24th.—Word has been given out for a meeting at Laport at two o'clock. Ah! I have not language to express the feeling of responsibility that rests upon me.

"25th.—Had hard work to relieve my mind yesterday at meeting. Feel burdened this morning, but I must learn to bear what is laid upon me.

"26th.—Reached Indianola last evening. A trying little circumstance occurred, but I believe the right thing was done. Arrived at — for late dinner; several Friends away from home. Concluded to wait until to-morrow at eleven o'clock to have meeting.

"27th.—I do not remember when I felt the responsibility of an appointment to be greater. Deep poverty seems to be my portion. Yet I feel to say, 'Not my will but thine be done.' I have none but the Lord alone to trust in. I feel that I am the poorest one that is preparing for meeting.

"28th.—Traveled thirteen miles after meeting yesterday. Am favored with all the peace and comfort a poor unworthy creature can expect. Went to South River meeting to-day, feeling very empty, but near the close a few words were given to say in a close way to some present.

"31st.—Reached — in good time after traveling thirty miles over rough roads. Although I was turning my face farther from my dear family, the love of the Saviour so filled my heart, that I did not feel the weariness of the ride till evening.

"Second Month 1st, 1865.—First-day had a laborious meeting. Sick all night and next day till evening; went to —.

"3rd.—Started on about noon. Arrived at — very weak and feeble. Word is given out that we will be at meeting to-morrow. Oh! what am I, that I should be traveling up and down in the land inviting the people to seek to know the Lord for themselves, the God of our salvation. What great need I have to watch and pray, lest after having preached to others I myself become a cast-away!

"4th.—Attended a very exercising meeting, till near the close was able to relieve my mind in part. After noon my mind was turned toward visiting a Friend who is not able to attend meeting, which brought me into close searching for fear I might run without being sent. After trying the fleece wet and dry I gave up to go. Had a very comfortable time, believing we were owned by the Great Head of the Church, who was pleased to give us a renewal of strength further to trust in Him.

"5th.—At Pleasant View. A very trying meeting. What I had to communicate did not relieve me and I came away burthened. Religion seems to be at a low ebb here. I spent an almost sleepless night feeling my unfitness for such great work. Prospects seem to be closed up before me. I am ready to call in question my being here or even ever having been called to the ministry. To go forward I cannot, to go backward will not do.

"Second Month 6th.—Went to — expecting to stay till the way opened before me. In the evening I opened the Bible, and my eyes fell on the seventh verse of second chapter of the song of Solomon, 'I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the roses and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love till He please.' I read on to the fourteenth verse of the same chapter and closed the book, rejoicing that the Lord had not forsaken me, but was leading me in a way I knew not, for my own good, no doubt. I then felt my own will laid low and willing to wait the Lord's time in all things.

"7th.—This morning my way seems clear to attend Sugar Creek meeting to-morrow, which had not been my intention until on my return home through these parts. Here the old reasoner came in with, 'What will people think, after staying around two or three days, and then go to another neighborhood. But my appeal was unto the Lord who knows what is best.'

"8th.—I believe we had a good meeting. I felt to rejoice."

There seems to be no account of the remainder of this visit.

The gift bestowed upon this dear Friend was discerning and prophetic. Many instances might be given of forewarnings extended. One most striking instance of this character is here remembered, perhaps while on this visit, as it was during the war. Two young men sought to evade her visit, but by repeated effort an opportunity was obtained in the family with one of them present, wherein he was warned to turn his course in life and seek an interest in the redeeming love of his Saviour. If he continued in his present course he would come to an untimely end in a miserable condition. The next day she visited where the other one was. Previous to her coming, he said he wondered if Ruth Newlin would preach his funeral as she did —'s yesterday. She not knowing what he had expressed, delivered almost the same message as before. They did not heed the warning, but soon joined the army, were taken prisoners with others, fell sick and died in such a crowded place that there was not room for them to lie down.

At one time she had an appointed meeting at a town where they knew little or nothing about Friends. Those who went to circulate the word over the town were told that they had been having meetings and the solicitations for money had been all they were able for and had no more to spare. They were assured that no money would be expected; that Friends did not preach for money. Consequently quite a number assembled. She did not know what the people had said. But arose with the words, "We want neither your silver or your gold," but from love to their never dying souls, had come to persuade them to seek an interest in the free gift of God, which is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord. The meeting ended well, and the people were well pleased.

These broken sketches represent (it might almost be said) a mere minimum of her labors. Although none of her journeys were at any great distance, they were frequent, and extended over most of the territory in the western states where Friends resided. She has left no memoranda of many of these.

Consider, dear reader, what an example of devotion to the cause of Christ we have before us. That of a frail delicate woman leaving her family and temporal interests so frequently, and resigning all into the hands of Him who had called her into his great harvest-field. We have her testimony that after having given up to a required duty, she often returned home to find that even outwardly the little was blessed beyond her expectation, and she could resume her domestic duties with cheerfulness and peace of mind. While in some instances, when she had given way to feel that she could not go, they met with some loss or she was visited by sickness, and the benefits of her remaining at home were overbalanced.

Minutes were granted for religious labor according to the following dates: First Month 14th, 1865; Tenth Month 14th, 1865; Fifth Month 27th, 1866; Seventh Month 27th, 1867; Tenth Month 30th, 1868. No account is left of any of these visits except the last, which reads, "I was liberated to visit all the meetings of Friends in the States of Kansas and Missouri, and to appoint some meetings outside where way opened for it.

"Eleventh Month 26th, 1868.—We arrived at Des Moines. Lodged at —'s all night. Had a refreshing time with the family in the morning.

"28th. Attended Oskaloosa meeting. Had a meeting at Bloomfield at six o'clock in the evening.

"30th. Reached Salem. Attended the students' meeting, and a good time we had.

"Twelfth Mo. 1st.—Attended Salem Meeting.

"3rd.—Quite sick.

"4th. Late in the evening rode to —'s.

"5th. Attended Gilead Monthly Meeting. Had some plain work to do. Some very trying things took place in the Meeting for Discipline.

"6th.—Attended the same meeting. My way was closed up as to the ministry. Near the close it seemed my duty to stay and visit the families, in which my faith has been very closely tried; yet I am made to rejoice in the name of the Lord in pointing out my way so clearly before me.

(To be continued.)

Selected for "THE FRIEND."

"GOD MADE MANIFEST."

AN ACTUAL OCCURRENCE.

A hard, stern man upon a sick bed lay,
More and more feeble with each passing day;
No hallowing dream of Heavenly peace was there,
No ray of love divine, no breath of prayer.
Kind Christian friends on holiest mission bent,
Came bright and hopeful—sad and anxious went;
Harder and sterner the atheist grew,
The flinty heart no answering softness knew.
Angry at last at each persistent call,
With firm refusal he denied them all;
The Saviour's sacred name he would not hear,
His loving words could find no listening ear.
"Wife, fetch the blackboard and a bit of chalk!
One way remains to stop this senseless talk;
I will write something which is truth indeed,
And have it placed where everyone may read."
The thin, weak hand that scarce the chalk could hold,

Wrote "God is nowhere," large and bold.
The fearful sentence met his waking sight
In wretched mockery, by day and night.
Time crept along—hour after hour passed o'er,
While the death-angel still his touch forebore;
Lower and lower burned the flickering flame,
And slower yet the fitful pulses came.
Then happier change repaid the anxious view,
And hope, so long denied sprang forth anew;
Through every vein a fuller current flowed,
And Heaven once more the gift of life bestowed.
Soon the fond father sought his banished child,
Who erst with prattle sweet his heart beguiled;
Charmed to come back, she told her little news,
And showed her "nice new gown and pretty shoes—
And that's not all"—the tones grew eager now,
"For I can read; my auntie taught me how!"
"Nonsense, my dear!" the father quick replied,
"You cannot read, I'm satisfied."
"Yes, father dear! Oh yes! I truly can,
For auntie taught me," and the child began
To look around, perchance to find some way
Of proving what her words had failed to say.
The father smiled, and pointing to the wall,
Said, "Well, read that if you can read at all."
She hesitated and the father spoke:
"I told you so; I knew it was a joke."
But still she kept her deep and earnest eyes
Fixed on the board, and soon in glad surprise Exclaimed, "I know it now! Oh, yes, I see!
'God—is—now—here;' the last word puzzled me."
The conscience-stricken man in mute amaze
Covered his face to hide his startled gaze,
While from the rocky fount, untouched for years,
Burst forth a flood of pure and holy tears.
"My God! my child, and has my darling learned?
What I, with death so near, denied and spurned?
Father, forgive, and fill with love divine,
That life Thy mercy spared, now wholly Thine."

'God broke our years to hours and days, that hour
by hour

And day by day,
Just going on a little way,
We might be able all along
To keep quite strong.
Should all the weight of life

Be laid across our shoulder, and the future, rife
With woe and struggle, meet us face to face

At just one place,
We could not go,
Our feet would stop; and so

God lays a little on us every day,
And never, I believe, on all the way
Will burdens bear so deep,
Or pathways lie so threatening and so steep,
But we can go, if by God's power
We only bear the burden of the hour."

Something About the Post Office.

The Scientific American of Ninth Month 15th, contains an interesting article entitled, "The Greatest Business Concern in the World," by which it means the postal establishment of the United States. Here are some of the interesting facts stated:

A letter can be sent in thirty days from Florida to the Klondike for two cents. To carry the same by courier would cost something like three hundred dollars. The total length of the routes traversed by the mail service is 496,948 miles, or more than a round trip between the earth and the moon. The number of miles traveled in carrying the mails per annum is over 445,000,000, or more than two round trips to the sun. The cost per annum in carrying the mails is over $53,000,000.

